Venezuela proclaims its belief that the cause of human rights must and will prevail, and we agree. Venezuelans are working to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons, and so are we.

The leaders of your country believe that each nation of the world should be free to manage its own internal affairs, free from unwarranted outside intervention, and the same belief exists among the leaders of our people in the United States.

We both believe that people in every part of the world, under every economic system, should have democratic rights to participate in their own government and to shape their own destiny. We both know that nations with wealth to spare have an obligation to share it. And here, as in other areas, Venezuela has set an example for us to try to equal. We both are aware of the increasing sense of regional need and common purpose that exists among the nations of the Caribbean and of that nation's tremendous potential for future growth and harmony.

Venezuela and the United States are both attempting to restrict the excessive trade in weapons and to reduce the arsenals which already exist, and we will redouble our common efforts in the near future to realize this hope.

We both believe that nations must cooperate in the world's energy problems through conservation, better distribution, research and development, and exploration of new energy sources. We both believe that direct consultations and negotiations among nations can resolve even major differences and are the surest path to peace.

We both have learned through happy experience that exchanges among our people, especially students, can build permanent bonds of understanding between us.

Venezuela again has shown how these bonds are built with the Ayacucho Foundation, which permits students from each country to study in the other. Because of this visit and others on my journey, and in memory of your friend, our great American statesman, Hubert Humphrey, I would like to announce tonight my intention to establish a program of Humphrey scholarships which will bring poor but outstanding students from Latin America and throughout the world to study in the colleges of the United States.

In this spirit of harmony and obvious cooperation, in the warmth of personal friendship which I feel around us tonight, I offer a toast to the leader and to the nation with whom we share so much and from whom we learn so much.

To President Pérez and to the people of the great nation of Venezuela.

NOTE: The President spoke at 8:40 p.m. at La Casona in response to a toast by President Pérez.

Caracas, Venezuela

March 29, 1978*

Señor Presidente del Congreso, Señor Vice Presidente, Señores Senadores, Señores Diputados, Señora Blanca de Pérez, señoras y señores:

I'm honored today to stand in this free assembly of one of the greatest nations on Earth, to bring warm greetings from the people of the United States, whose love of liberty is as deep as your own.

Our nations are joined not just by common interests but by the strongest and the most lasting bond of all—that of shared ideals.

Venezuela stands high among those who have defended the cause of democracy.

A century and a half ago, you gave to the world Simón Bolívar, a symbol of liberty whose example reaches far beyond the Americas. Now Venezuela provides unmistakable proof that political liberty and economic progress need not be conflicting ideals, but can strengthen one another.

Nearly 200 years ago, General Francisco de Miranda traveled through my own country as he prepared for the struggle to free Venezuela. And last year, your President and my friend, Carlos Andrés Pérez, retraced that journey, and with each step he took in my own country, he understood even better our traditional, common commitment to democratic values.

Your country has worked tirelessly and with success for wider adoption of the American Convention on Human Rights and strengthening of the Inter-American Human Rights Commission. We believe, as you do, that none of us can enjoy true liberty when others are oppressed.

Your country and others in Latin America and in the Caribbean have taken the lead in another area, which will have an equally profound effect on the world of the future: the relationship between the advanced industrial nations which have the greatest share of influence and material goods on the one hand, and the poor and developing nations of the world, who are understandably seeking a larger and more equitable share.

Before the Organization of American States last year, I stated that the economic issues of central concern to the United States and to Latin America are global issues and that they need to be addressed in a continuing dialog between the rich and the poor nations.

Closer consultation among our nations would lead to greater harmony, better collective judgment which can avoid mistakes, and the prevention of inadvertent injury to those who are weak and most vulnerable.

Today I would like to discuss with you the responsibility we share—developed and developing countries alike—for creating a more just international order.

I want to discuss a vision of what our world can become—whether it will be a world of inequality and want, or one of partnership and fulfillment; whether we anticipate the changes that must inevitably come and adopt them, or turn our backs on the future, vainly believing that change can be forestalled.

Last night, as President Pérez said in his eloquent and significant address, and I quote him, "Of all Utopias, the most dangerous is the one of those who think that the world can continue as it is or as it was conceived 30 years ago."

These reflections lead us to the fundamental statement that the crisis that affects the world now has very deep roots. We are living through a moral crisis, a crisis of ethical principles.

Political, economic, and social changes have already transformed our modern world. The old colonial empires have fallen, and more than a hundred new independent nations have risen in their place.

Our nations are more dependent on one another economically, more willing to deal with each other as equals, more able to influence one another—either for good or for ill—than ever before in human history.

We must all acknowledge this basic fact: that we share responsibility for solving our common problems. Our specific obligations will be different, our interests and our emphases will, of course, vary, but all of us, North and South, East and West, must bear our part of the burden.

If the responsibility for global progress is not shared, our efforts will certainly fail. Only if the responsibility is shared may we attain the goals that our people want and that our times demand.

We share three common goals: first, to accelerate world economic growth through greater involvement of the developing nations, for their progress is essential to global prosperity for us all; second, to make the most beneficial use of the world's greatest wealth, its human potential; and third, to ensure that all nations participate fully in basic decisions about international economic and political affairs.

Only by acting together can we expand trade and investment in order to create more jobs, to curb inflation, and to raise the standard of living of our peoples.

The industrial nations share the same problems and cannot by themselves bring about world economic recovery. Strong growth and expansion in the developing countries are essential, and as they succeed, they must be prepared—and this is difficult—for the responsibilities of success in this highly competitive world economy.

There are five steps we must take together: increasing capital flow to the developing nations; building a fairer and a more open system of world trade; working to moderate disruptive price movements in the world economy; co-operating on energy conservation and development; and strengthening technological capabilities in the developing world.

None of these tasks is simple, and each demands efforts from all sides.

Private institutions and investors will continue to play the major part in increasing capital flows, but capital supplied by public institutions and governments is also, of course, critical to development.

We in the United States will do our part. In managing the international economy, we place particular importance on the expansion of the International Monetary Fund, which helps both developing nations and also the industrial nations to overcome their balance of payments problems.

We in the United States will press for swift congressional approval of our own substantial contribution to the supplementary financing facility, $10 billion, recommended by Mr. Witteveen.<sup>1</sup>

The international development banks are fundamental to the health of the world economy. They contribute to the growth and development of many nations and thus to the expansion of world trade.

In the years ahead, the United States plans to increase its contributions, and we will work with other nations to ensure that these institutions receive the support they need.

Bilateral economic assistance also has a major role to play. I've requested, for instance, that Congress approve a 28-percent increase in our program just for the coming year alone.

I applaud the efforts of Venezuela and other developing countries to expand your own programs of economic assistance. All of the OPEC nations have a responsibility to use their surplus wealth to meet the human needs of the world's people.

In some cases, the burden of repayment of official development aid has become an impediment to development. My administration is supporting legislation, now before the Congress, which will allow us to ease the terms of past American aid loans to some of the least developed nations.

We must work towards an expanded and more equitable trading system. In no area of economic relations is the opportunity of Latin America greater—nor the responsibility more serious—than is expanded trade.

The multilateral trade negotiations now going on in Geneva are the focal point of continued efforts to liberalize trade and to strengthen the rules for international commerce. Both developed and developing nations have an enormous stake in the success of these negotiations.

We must all resist the temptation to impose new restrictions on imports. We must all strive to reduce existing barriers to trade, both tariffs and other measures, while giving special consideration and benefits to the developing countries.

We must also work to moderate disruptive price movements in the world economy and to stabilize the prices of primary commodities. Reasonable and stable export prices can hold down inflation and encourage better income and a more regular flow of new investment capital to those who produce raw materials.

All nations can therefore gain from the negotiation and effective implementation of commodity agreements and from the creation, with the help of the United States and other major countries, of a common fund for price stabilization.

We've already begun to cooperate and plan for the wise use of the Earth's limited resources, such as food, and now we must do the same with energy.

Both the industrial and the developing countries must conserve energy and devote more of our vast technological efforts and resources to worldwide efforts to develop new sources of energy, such as the Sun and, as Latin American nations have already shown us, even from sugar and from other agricultural products. We must do so without either destroying our environment or creating a world of proliferating nuclear explosives.

For the rest of this century, the greatest potential for growth is in the developing world. To become more self-reliant, developing nations need to strengthen their technological capabilities. To assist them, I am proposing a new United States foundation for technological collaboration.

Through private and public foundations and through our increasing participation in the United Nations conferences, we can make technical and scientific cooperation a key element in our relationship.

Our main task as members of a world community is to work toward the day when every person has a fair chance to achieve a full measure of human potential.

The population of the world is increasing rapidly, and within two decades, it is expected that two-thirds of the world's population, even more, will live in Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

We want every child to be a wanted child, and we realize that already three of every five children in the developing world do not receive the basic requisites of a healthy diet, and nearly two-thirds of the world's population in the Third World do not have access to water that is safe to drink.

These conditions and others offend the conscience of mankind, for the human rights we believe in so deeply include not only the right to be free and to avoid mistreatment from government but also the right to a fair chance for a decent life.

Throughout the world, the fruits of growth have been very unequally distributed. Among nations and within nations, wealth coexists with abject poverty and suffering.

Our economic progress is inadequate if its benefits do not reach all the people. Rich and poor nations alike should devote more attention to raising the minimum standards of living for the poorest of our fellow human beings.

The United States will increase its efforts, particularly in those countries where governments are themselves most committed to meeting the basic needs of their people for health, education, shelter, and to increasing their own food production.

We will contribute, for instance, a minimum of 4.5 million tons of grain to a new food aid convention. We support the international food aid target of 10 million tons, and we are willing to join other nations in increasing the amount, particularly in years of severe food shortages.

As for the political liberties that are also part of basic human rights, we believe that democracy provides the best system to attain this goal and that the international community has a special responsibility to support countries that are moving to institute democratic procedures and institutions.

There can be no question that the institutions we have created must adapt to a changing and diverse world. And that is our third goal.

The individuality and the sovereignty of nations must be respected. Intervention in the internal affairs of others must be opposed.

There must also be a reversal in the massive and excessive weapons sales that are being made from my own and from other industrialized countries to the poorer nations, which still have profound and unmet social and economic needs.

Just as all people should participate in the government decisions that affect their own lives, so should all nations participate in the international decisions that affect their own well-being.

The United States is eager to work with you, as we have in the past, to shape a more just international economic and political order.

Both the industrialized nations, which have greater influence in institutions like the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, and the developing nations, with great influence in organizations like the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development, must share the responsibility for opening the international system to different views.

The Conference on International Economic Cooperation, in which Venezuela, as you know, played such a major and pivotal role, was a useful start toward the global dialog which we seek. A newly created committee of the United Nations General Assembly will carry on that work.

As we move toward an improved international economic order, we must think beyond institutions and measure the impact of change on the daily lives of people.

We recognize our differences, but we cannot allow them to blind us to the problems and the tremendous opportunities which we share.

When I was growing up in the Deep South of the United States, we farmed exactly as our grandfathers had farmed, rising before dawn and laboring manually until sunset. We had no tractors and little machinery of any kind, and even as we worked, we often knew that we were reducing our future yields, that the richness of our land was blowing away in the wind or washing away in the rains.

When we farmed out our land, we had no choice but to keep on farming it and working in the same fields, because many of us lacked the knowledge or the means to make it fruitful again.

I remember the almost unbelievable change the coming of electric power made in the farm life of my childhood. Electricity freed us from the continuing burdens of pumping water and sawing wood and lighting fires in the cooking stove. But it did even more—it gave us light by which to read and to study at night. It gave us power—not just to perform the old exhausting tasks, but power to make our own choices. Because electric power came to us through cooperatives, in which we all had to share the responsibility for a decision, it changed our lives in other ways.

Farmers began to meet together to discuss local needs and national issues and to decide how to influence government and to negotiate with large, far-off companies that provided their supplies. I've seen the farm life that I knew in my childhood transformed by energy and by technology and increased knowledge, and by the opportunity to participate in the decisions that affect ourselves and our families.

I can understand the unfulfilled yearnings of other people in developing nations to share these blessings of life. All nations must work together to acknowledge the validity of these yearnings, to take into full account the need and diversity of developing nations, and to promote mutual participation in making the international decisions that affect us all.

I've spoken to you of shared obligations. The industrial nations must provide long-term capital and reduced trade barriers. The developing nations must assume the obligations that accompany responsible participation in an evolving world economy.

Real progress will come through specific, cooperative actions designed to meet specific needs—not through symbolic statements made by the rich industrial nations to salve our conscience, nor by the developing countries to recall past injustices. We need to share a responsibility for solving problems and not to divide the blame for ignoring the problems.

I believe that your great country and mine share a vision of an international system in which each individual and each nation has a part, in which each individual and each nation has the hope of a better future. Only in such a world can life be good for all its people.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 8:30 a.m. in the Senate Chamber of the Congress. In his opening remarks, he referred to President of the Congress Gonzalo Barrios and Vice President of the Congress Dagoberto Gonzalez.

Following his remarks, the President proceeded to the Palacio de Miraflores for meetings with President Pérez.

Caracas, Venezuela

Joint Communiqué Issued at the Conclusion of Meetings Between President Carter and President Pérez. March 29, 1978

The President of the United States of America and Mrs. Jimmy Carter visited Caracas March 28–29, 1978, at the invitation of President Carlos Andrés Pérez. The President and Mrs. Carter were accompanied by the Secretary of State and Mrs. Cyrus Vance, Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs Terence A. Todman, and Director of Policy Planning for the Department of State W. Anthony Lake.

The visit reflected the close relations between Venezuela and the United States and served to continue their dialogue initiated in 1977 on the occasion of the visits which the Venezuelan President made to Washington.

The two Presidents reaffirmed their commitment to the preservation and strengthening of democracy and placed particular emphasis on the importance of human rights as a duty of all societies and their commitment to the charters of the Organization of American States and the United Nations. Both Presidents expressed the hope that the American Convention on Human Rights will soon enter into force and manifested their Governments' interest in seeing both the autonomy and resources of the Inter-American Human Rights Commission increased, agreeing in their belief that the Commission has an essential role to play in the effective promotion of Human Rights in the Hemisphere.

The Presidents discussed the ratification of the Panama Canal treaties signed at the OAS Headquarters in Washington by the President of the United States of America and the Head of Government of Panama which is now being considered by the Senate of the United States of America. They expressed the hope that the process will be successfully concluded to strengthen a new spirit of cooperation in the relations between the United States of America and the Peoples of Latin America.

The Heads of State examined the present state of the world economy, including the prospects for international cooperation on the issues of development, trade, basic commodities, energy, the effects of inflation and the international monetary system.

Both Presidents agree on the need for an international code of conduct relating to the activities of transnational corporations. They condemned the practice of bribes and illicit payments and called for support of an international convention on illicit payments.

The Presidents reaffirmed the importance and the utility of additional consultations within the context of the North-South dialogue within the United Nations and other world organizations. They agreed on the importance of early implementation of the commitments made at the Conference of International Economic Cooperation, in which Venezuela played a leading role. Both Presidents expressed their support for a more just and equitable international system, with both developed and developing countries sharing responsibility for it.

The Presidents examined the world's political situation and condemned the presence of foreign forces in Africa. They reiterated their condemnation of apartheid as an unacceptable negation of human rights. They expressed their total support for the independence of Zimbabwe in accordance with norms of the United Nations and for the independence of Namibia within the framework of United Nations Resolution 385.

The Presidents exchanged views concerning the situation in the Middle East and deplored the recent violence which occurred in that area. They agreed that it is necessary and urgent to intensify efforts to achieve a just, comprehensive and durable peace based on UNSC Resolutions 242 and 338. They stressed the importance of withdrawal on all fronts pursuant to Resolution 242 and the resolution of all aspects of the Palestinian question.

They noted their meeting coincided with the opening of the Seventh Session of the United Nations Conference on Law of the Sea, which held its first substantive meeting in Caracas four years ago. They agreed that it is essential that the conference reach agreements which are just and fair for all countries.

The two Presidents dedicated an important portion of their time to the consideration of the idea already agreed to in Washington in 1977 concerning the development program for the Caribbean basin. They examined the role played in the preliminary studies by the World Bank as well as by other international institutions. Even as they manifested their satisfaction with the process already under way, they agreed that it is urgent to bring this idea to fruition and to promote cooperation between the countries of that area and the rest of Latin America in such a way as to help the states of the Caribbean in their effort for a viable development which satisfies their own aspirations.

The themes concerning Latin American economic integration were the object of particular attention. The Presidents examined the progress of the Andean Pact, its important program agreements signed in 1977, the functioning of LAFTA and the progress of SELA. Both Presidents recognized the important cooperative effort of the countries of the area reflected in the different programs of regional integration and manifested their sympathy and support for these programs.

With relation to nuclear non-proliferation the two Presidents took note of the necessity for implementing greater safeguards and making greater use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes once the risks, not yet resolved, are taken care of. The Presidents gave special importance to the entry into force of the Treaty of Tlatelolco, and noted with satisfaction the progress in the International Nuclear Fuel Cycle Evaluation.

The Presidents exchanged ideas about arms restraint in Latin America. They expressed their disquiet with growing arms purchases and in the resurgence of old conflicts. They agreed that it is urgent to restrict the transfer of conventional weapons as was envisaged in the 1974 Ayacucho Declaration.

They discussed the United Nations Special Session on Disarmament and agreed that the Session should provide a stimulus to further concrete disarmament efforts.

Insofar as bilateral matters are concerned they confirmed the importance of cooperation in the field of energy and the continuing participation of Venezuelan petroleum exports in the United States market. They considered useful the results of the meeting held at the beginning of March between the Venezuelan Minister of Mines and Energy and the U.S. Secretary of Energy pointing out the possibility of cooperation for the development of heavy crudes. The two Presidents reaffirmed their desire to continue consultations both at the technical level and at the political level on energy matters as well as to establish periodic consultations on economic and commercial matters.

The two Presidents took note with satisfaction of the signature during the visit of the Treaty on Maritime Boundaries between the two countries and a Memorandum of Understanding on Narcotics and of the prospects of negotiating other agreements, reflecting the spirit of cooperation existing between the two countries.

The two Chiefs of State expressed their complete personal satisfaction with the results of their conversations and took note that this state visit, the third meeting between them during the last year, was a demonstration of their interest in continuing their consultations on world matters of importance to the two countries.

Upon ending his stay in Venezuela, President and Mrs. Carter thanked President Pérez for the cordial hospitality offered them and their official party by the Venezuelan people and government.

NOTE: The text of the joint communique was released at Caracas, Venezuela.

Brasília, Brazil

PRESIDENT GEISEL. Your Excellency, President of the United States of America:

In the name of the Government and the people of Brazil, I should like to express my warmest words of welcome to Your Excellency and to Mrs. Carter, as well as to the members of your party, and wish you a happy stay in Brazil.

Your Excellency's presence in our country well reflects the stage reached by the traditional friendship that links Brazil and the United States of America. I am happy, therefore, that Your Excellency was able to carry out your plans for travel. And I must state that I understood perfectly well the decision you had to take regarding the postponement of the original date foreseen for your visit.

Your Excellency has already been to our country before taking on your heavy responsibilities, and Mrs. Carter more recently gave us the pleasure of her agreeable company when she visited us last year.

As it has happened before, Your Excellency and Mrs. Carter will be welcomed as friends by the Brazilians. The hospitality with which we greet those who visit us cordially will be with you during all the time you are in our country. We will be extremely satisfied if the present visit may assist Your Excellency and Mrs. Carter in forming a fair opinion about the Brazilian reality.

Personally, I believe that our talks will be rewarding and that they will allow for a renewed trust in the relations between our two countries.

PRESIDENT CARTER. Thank you, Mr. President, for your kind words of welcome.

This is my second visit to your beautiful capital city of Brasília, and this time I am pleased to bring not only my own personal words of personal greeting but those of the people of my country as well. And I come to Brazil with a full realization that our two nations share the responsibilities of great world powers.

There are many things in our histories that make us understand one another, that have taught us both to treat the other with friendship and respect. We both earned our freedom from European colonial powers, and in this century our soldiers fought side by side in Europe during the World Wars to bring peace and freedom to others.

We have both expanded through our great national frontiers which have provided our most difficult challenges and our best opportunities, and we have applied the determination and the talent of our people to conquer them.

The frontier spirit truly has shaped the attitudes of Brazil and of the United States. We both built new capitals as acts of faith in our own future—you, 18 years ago here in the Sertao; our ancestors, nearly 200 years ago along the Potomac River.

We are both proud of the human diversity of our national population, and we value our unique cultures, which we are determined to preserve.

I have seen the greatness of Brazil during my visits to Manaus, to Belém, Recife, to São Paulo, and to Rio de Janeiro.

Brazil's rise to world leadership has earned the admiration of the people everywhere in the world, but nowhere more so than in the United States. Yours is the fifth largest nation and the sixth most populous. Your national product is already the world's eighth largest, and it is growing at one of the fastest rates in the world.

You have the vision, the energy, and the creativity of a truly great power, and the world must depend upon you to apply those talents to the problems that affect us all.

Both our nations are turning to nuclear power as one of the answers to our energy problem, and we both believe that peaceful use of atomic power is not incompatible with the need to prevent nuclear proliferation.

Like you, my Nation is concerned that the system of world trade be made fairer and more open and that all nations have an equal chance to participate.

Today all of us are joining in the worldwide struggle to advance the cause of human freedom and the rule of law. This is a struggle that will prevail only when we are willing to recognize our own limitations and to speak to each other frankly and with understanding.

Our friendship with Brazil is an old one. In 1824 the United States was the first nation to recognize your independence. Our friendship can be even stronger now as we accept as equals the responsibilities the world asks of us.

Mr. President, I must not fail to mention with gratitude your sharing with us one of Brazil's greatest treasures, perhaps the greatest athlete of all, the incomparable Pêlé. He is a friend of mine, and his courage on the playing field has been an inspiration to the people of the United States.

My wife, Rosalynn, visited you last year, and her accounts of your hospitality and your very useful discussions, Mr. President, made me all the more eager to visit Brazil once more.

We both know that personal contact between leaders can build understanding between nations, and I believe that our conversations will result in a reaffirmation of the mutual respect and friendship that has blessed our two nations for so long a time.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The exchange began at 5:08 p.m. at the Aeroporto Militar. President Geisel spoke in Portuguese, and his remarks were translated by an interpreter.

Following the ceremony, President Carter proceeded to the Palácio do Planalto for meetings with President Geisel.

THE PRESIDENT'S NEWS CONFERENCE OF MARCH 30, 1978

Held in Brasília, Brazil

THE PRESIDENT. Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. I'm very delighted to be here in Brasília to participate in a live press conference, and I will alternate questions between the Brazilian and the American press.

I'll begin with Mr. Bonfim.

U.S.-BRAZILIAN RELATIONS

Q. [in Portuguese] Mr. President, at the beginning of your administration there was a clear tendency to isolate and treat Brazil coldly in favor of democratically elected governments, elected by the people.

Yesterday at the airport you stressed the need for cooperation between Brazil and the United States as equal partners. Who has changed, Brazil or you?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I certainly have not changed. The experience that I have had in Brazil as Governor of Georgia before I became President made Brazil the most important country to me. I and my wife visited it frequently. We had a partnership arrangement between my own State and the State of Pernambuco.

We studied the background, the history, the culture, and the government of Brazil. And there has not ever been any inclination on my part or the part of my administration to underestimate the extreme importance of Brazil as a major world power, nor to underestimate the extreme importance of very close and harmonious relationships between the United States and Brazil.

There are some differences of opinion between ourselves and Brazil which have been very highly publicized. But on the long scale of things, both in the past history and in the future, the major factors which bind us in harmony with Brazil far transcend, are much more important than the differences that have been published between our approach to human rights, for instance, and the subject of nonproliferation of nuclear weapons.

But our commitment to Brazil as a friend, our need for Brazil as a partner and a friend has always been the case and is presently very important to us and will always be that important in the future.

Helen [Helen Thomas, United Press International].

THE MIDDLE EAST

Q. Mr. President, in recent days, you've seen the use of American military supplies to invade a country and to cause untold suffering to hundreds of thousands. Some say this is the violation of U.S. law. In view of the facts that you have before you, is it a violation; and two, has it caused you to reassess your warplane package for the Middle East?

THE PRESIDENT. Are you referring to the Lebanon question?

Q. Yes.

THE PRESIDENT. As you know, when the terrorist attacks in Israel precipitated the countermove by Israel into Lebanon, which has been a haven for the Palestinian terrorists, the United States took the initiative in the United Nations—I might say, without the approval of Israel—to initiate United Nations action there to expedite the removal of Israeli forces from Lebanon.

We have obviously attempted to comply with the law, and this is a matter that we are still addressing. The other part of your question?

Q. Has it caused you to reassess your package of warplanes for the Middle East, and how do you say you have attempted to comply with the law?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we're attempting to terminate as rapidly as possible the military presence of Israel in southern Lebanon through United Nations action. I believe this is the proper way to do it, rather than unilateral action on our part, which would probably be unsuccessful in any case to get Israel to withdraw. The presence of United Nations forces, the French, the Swedes, and others, I believe, is the preferable way, and it marshals the opinion of the entire world, through the United Nations, against the Israeli presence being retained in Lebanon.

This has not caused me to reassess the American position on the sale of warplanes and other equipment to the Middle East. This is a very well balanced package. It emphasizes our interest in military security of the Middle East. It does not change at all the fact that Israel still retains a predominant air capability and military capability. There is no threat to their security. But it also lets the nations involved and the world know that our friendship, our partnership, our sharing of military equipment with the moderate Arab nations is an important permanent factor of our foreign policy.

U.S. COMMERCIAL BANK LOANS TO BRAZIL

Q. Mr. President, from Jornal do Brasil. The American commercial banks are the main Brazilian source of external credit. It seems to some people in Washington that sooner or later a Congressman may try to establish a link between the commercial banking loans and the human rights policy. I'd like to know your opinion about this subject.

THE PRESIDENT. Brazil is a major trading partner of the United States in commercial goods and also in loans and, I might say, timely repayments. The debt of Brazil is very manageable. The loans of the American banks to Brazil are sound. Additional loans are being pursued by the American banks as an excellent advantage for their future investments in Brazil, based on the strength of your country. It would be inconceivable to me that any act of Congress would try to restrict the lending of money by American private banks to Brazil under any circumstances.

This would violate the principles of our own free enterprise system, and if such an act was passed by Congress, I would not approve it.

FREE ENTERPRISE AND HUMAN RIGHTS

Q. What comes in the first place for you: the private enterprise and the private system or the human rights policy?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, they're both important to us. And I don't see any incompatibility between a belief in a free enterprise system, where government does not dominate the banks or the production of agricultural products or commercial products on the one hand, and a deep and consistent and permanent and strong belief in enhancing human rights around the world.

I might say that the American business community, the Congress of the United States, the general populace of the United States supports completely a commitment of our Nation to human rights. It's a basic element of our national consciousness that has no violation at all—or no conflict between human rights on the one hand and the free enterprise system on the other.

NAMIBIA

Q. Mr. President, tomorrow you fly to Africa. What can you tell us today about the revised five-power proposals on Namibia?

THE PRESIDENT. As you know, under the auspices of the United Nations, our own country, Canada, Britain, France, and the Federal Republic of Germany have been working jointly to present to South Africa and to the so-called SWAPO organization, South West Africa Political Organization, a compromise solution to restoring majority rule in Namibia.

We have presented this proposal this week to the South African Government, which now controls Namibia, and also to the SWAPO leaders. We are hopeful that if the proposal is not completely acceptable to both those parties, that it will at least be acceptable enough to prevent unilateral action on the part of South Africa to hold elections in complete violation of the United Nations resolutions and in complete violation of the principle of restoring majority rule to Namibia.

I can't tell you what the outcome of those consultations will be. I will get a more complete report when I arrive in Lagos. Ambassador Young has been in Africa now for about a week. This is one of the reasons that he is there. And I will be glad to give you a more detailed report after I get additional information.

NUCLEAR ENERGY AND NONPROLIFERATION

Q. Mr. President, now that you have a broad nonproliferation act in your hands, do you expect you can persuade Brazil to give up reprocessing and enrichment technology being acquired from Germany? And in that case, what are the carrots you might specifically use to further the power of your arguments in your meetings with President Geisel?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we strongly favor the right of any country to have part of its energy supplies come from nuclear power. As you know, our country has been the leader in the evolution of atomic power for peaceful uses, and we would do nothing to prevent this trend continuing, both in Brazil and in other countries around the world.

Our own nuclear nonproliferation policy, however, tries to draw a distinction between the right and the meeting of need of countries to produce energy from atomic power on the one hand, and the right of the country to evolve weapons-grade nuclear materials through either enrichment processes or through reprocessing.

We have no authority over either West Germany nor Brazil, nor do we want any. But as a friend of both countries, we reserve the right to express our opinion to them, that it would be very good to have, and possible to have, a complete nuclear fuel system throughout a country without having the ability to reprocess spent fuel from the power reactors. In the United States, for instance, in the last 25 years or so, on several occasions major investments, multibillion-dollar investments in all, have been made in reprocessing plants.

So far as I know, for the civilian nuclear technology, all those plants have now been abandoned as being noneconomical.

So, this is a difference that does exist between Brazil and the United States. The right of Brazil and West Germany to continue with their agreement is one that we don't challenge, but we have reserved the right and have used the right to express our concern, both to the Brazilian Government and to the West German Government.

I think it's accurate to say that the European nations have now announced that in the future, they will not make reprocessing plants part of their overseas sales inventory. And we are very deeply concerned about this. Of course, Brazil has announced that they have no intention of producing nuclear explosives. Brazil is a signatory to the Treaty of Tlatelolco. So far, however, Brazil has retained a caveat that it will not apply to them until all the other nations sign it. And Argentina, Cuba, France, Russia have not yet signed the Tlatelolco Treaty.

We would hope that every effort would be made by Brazil and other countries, as it is on the part of our own country, to prevent the spread of nuclear explosive capability to any nation which does not presently have it.

Q. Mr. President, what are the carrots?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we have no specific carrots to offer, except that we are making available to countries—and now in a much more predictable way with the new congressional law—enriched uranium, which is suitable for production of power but not suitable for explosives, and technological advice and counsel, both in the use of uranium, with which Brazil is not blessed as a natural resource, and also thorium, which we have in our own country and which Brazil already has.

The new thorium technology is a much safer one to provide power without going to plutonium. Recently Brazil—and I think very wisely—signed an additional agreement with West Germany which would open up advice and technological ability to use thorium. But the right of Brazil and the advisability of Brazil to have a very advanced nuclear power capability is one that we don't dispute, but on the other hand, approve.

I might add one other point, and that is that we see a clear need for all nations to sign the nonproliferation treaty. We're signatories of it; so are the Soviet Union, the Germans, most of the countries in the world. And this, combined with International Atomic [Energy] Agency safeguards, is a good guarantee within a country and throughout the developed and developing world that there will not be a trend in the future toward other nations developing nuclear explosive capability.

PRIME MINISTER MENAHEM BEGIN

Q. Mr. President, have you or any other top U.S. officials—Dr. Brzezinski, for instance—suggested that Prime Minister Begin may not be the right man to head that government in the present circumstances? And apart from what may or may not have been said, do you now think the Begin government can make the hard decisions necessary to move the peace process forward?

THE PRESIDENT. I can say unequivocally that no one in any position of responsibility in the United States administration has ever insinuated that Prime Minister Begin is not qualified to be Prime Minister or that he should be replaced. This report, the origin of which I do not know, is completely false.

I think that Prime Minister Begin and his government are able to negotiate in an adequately flexible way to reach an agreement with Egypt, later Jordan and other of the neighboring countries. This is our hope and this is also our belief. We have not given up on the possibility of a negotiated peace settlement in the Middle East.

Under the Begin government, with him as Prime Minister, recently arrangements have been made between Israel and Egypt for Ezer Weizman to go to Egypt again, which will be a continuation of the probing for a compatibility. I think it is obvious now that with the issues so sharply drawn, that key differences remain that must be addressed on the side of Israel. The things that are of deepest concern is Israel's refusal to acknowledge that United Nations Resolution 242 applies clearly to the West Bank, their unwillingness to grant to the West Bank Palestinians, the Palestinian Arabs, a right to participate in the determination of their own future by voting at the end of a 5-year period, and so forth, for the kind of affiliation they would have with Israel or Jordan or under a joint administration. And this is a problem for which I have no clear solution yet. But I believe that the Begin government is completely capable of negotiating an agreement with Egypt.

FUTURE TRAVEL PLANS

Q. I am from Channel 13, Argentina. In connection with your visit now in Latin America, do you expect in the future—do you consider the possibility of another visit to the other countries of Latin America, as in my case, to Argentina, and do you have an eventual date for this visit?

THE PRESIDENT. We have not yet set any date nor made any plans for future visits. As you may know, I have visited Argentina in the past, and so has my wife. And this year, this past year, Secretary of State—our Secretary of State, Cyrus Vance, visited Argentina, too, and your own leader, Videla, came to visit us in Washington. I have no plans now for any additional trips anywhere after I return to Washington.

PRESIDENT'S MEETINGS IN BRAZIL

Q. What's the purpose of this meeting that you are having in Rio with Cardinal Arns and five other people? I mean, what specifically are you intending to discuss with them and hear from them?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't have any agenda prepared for my visit with Cardinal Arns and the others. In a diverse society like you have here in Brazil, it's important for me to visit with different persons who represent different views. I will have thorough discussions, as you know, with President Geisel and his administration, and I want to meet with as many other people as I can. I have, by the way, met and talked to Cardinal Arns previously in the United States. I think this is typical of leaders who visit other countries. I noticed, for instance, with some interest, that when President Geisel visited the Federal Republic of Germany recently, he not only met with Chancellor Schmidt but he met with the leaders of the opposition parties.

And as a leader of a nation, I reserve the right to meet with whom I please. And I think this is a constructive thing, which will give me a much better overall understanding of what exists in Brazil. And I think the right of people to speak to me as a foreign visitor is one that's important to Brazil to preserve and to cherish. And I am thankful that I have that right when I visit your country.

INFLATION

Q. Mr. President, when you return from this Latin American and African trip, do you have any specific plans to combat the number one concern of the American people? I refer to inflation. Specifically, do you have any changes in mind in your, up to now, voluntary program of price and wage restraints?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. My administration, during the last couple of weeks, has been evolving a complete analysis of what we can do, both through administrative action, through public statements, through working with the business community and the labor community, and through congressional action to control inflation, which is becoming an increasingly important problem for us.

I think the Consumer Price Index figures that were released this week, the day we left Washington, were much better than we had anticipated, but still a cause for concern.

So, when I get home, one of the first acts that I shall take is to make public the decisions that we are now putting together.

Q. Will they change the voluntary nature of the program, Mr. President?

THE PRESIDENT. I'll address the details when I get back home.

GENERAL FIGUEIREDO

Q. [in Portuguese] I'd like to know whether in your meeting with General Figueiredo yesterday you discussed the program of the political opening up of the Brazilian Government and the implementation of that plan?

THE PRESIDENT. I did not have an opportunity to discuss any matters of importance with General Figueiredo. I only met him very briefly in a larger group of people, 30 or 40 people, and in the receiving line when I came into the airport. So, I've not had a chance to discuss this with him.

Ann [Ann Compton, ABC News].

STEEL PRICES

Q. Mr. President, despite some jawboning pressure from your administration, U.S. Steel has raised its prices again. How does that fit in with your overall plans on inflation that is going to have some substantial impact nationwide?

THE PRESIDENT. It fits in very poorly. [Laughter] I think the prices that were announced by U.S. Steel, as their plans, are excessive. And although I've not been thoroughly briefed on what the Council on Wage and Price Stability has recommended—I will get that report today—but I think any such increase, as I've heard, approximately $10 a ton, is excessive and does cause additional, very serious inflationary pressures in our country, and I think is much greater than would be warranted by the recent coal settlement.

BRAZILIAN POLITICAL PROCESS AND HUMAN RIGHTS

Q. [in Portuguese] I am from the State of São Paulo. My basic question was the same as he asked, but I'd like to know how you view the succession here in Brazil, and how do you view the problem of political and civil rights in Brazil?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think the type of succession and the process through which you choose your leaders, or your leaders are chosen, is one to be decided in Brazil. I'm not here to tell you how to form your government. I have no inclination to do that. The Brazilian people are completely aware of the process, and that's a judgment for you to make.

Brazil, like the United States, is struggling with the very difficult question of identifying human rights and civil rights violations, enhancing the democratic processes, and also encouraging confidence among the people in my government, in the United States, and in the government here in Brazil and other countries.

The differences that have arisen on the human rights issue is not based upon the lack of commitment to enhance human rights. I think great progress has been made in your country and also in ours. We do have a sharp difference of opinion, however, on how the human rights issue should be addressed, how specific allegations should be investigated, and what action can be taken to correct any defects that exist in your country or mine or others.

We believe that this is an international problem, that the focusing of world attention and world pressure on us and other countries is a very beneficial factor, that high publicity should be given to any proven violation of human rights. It's a commitment that our Nation has that I want not to abandon but to enhance and strengthen.

Brazil, on the other hand, also struggling with the same problem, trying to give greater human rights, does not believe that the international organizations and multinational opinions should be marshaled. However, I do note that recently Brazil did vote for an increase in the financing of the Inter-American Human Rights Commission.

We think that when an allegation is made in our own country, in Brazil, in the European countries, or wherever, that some responsible delegation from the Inter-American Human Rights Commission or the United Nations should go in, get the facts, make the facts public. If there is an actual violation, this would be a great incentive to the government involved, ours or yours or others, to correct the defect. If the allegation is false, then the exposition of the error or the false allegation would be good for the world to know.

So, I think this is a very deep and important consideration. One of the best things about the development on human rights in the last year or so has been the worldwide attention to it. It was kind of a dormant issue for too long, and now I doubt that there's a world leader who exists that doesn't constantly feel the pressure of considering the human rights questions—to analyze one's own administration, one's own country, what the rest of the world thinks about us, and how we could correct any defects and prevent allegations in the future, either true or false.

POSSIBILITY OF MIDDLE EAST VISIT

Q. Mr. President, with the new movement which is now apparent in the Middle East question, is there any possibility of a Middle East stop on your way back home?

THE PRESIDENT. No. No, I have no intention to stop in the Middle East. I'll go from here to Nigeria, from there to Liberia, and then back home.

Maybe one more question.

U.S.-BRAZILIAN RELATIONS

Q. [in Portuguese] The restraint of your public words until now, your specific desire to meet with the new President, all these facts amount to a virtual blessing of the Brazilian regime. Is your interest in civil rights and political dissidents fading away, or are American economic interests in this country so strong that Brazil is already a special case?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I might say that the history, the culture, common defense requirements, trade, common purpose binds the people of Brazil—all bind the people of Brazil and the people of the United States together in an unbreakable commitment, regardless of the identity of the leaders in our own country or yours. The people of Brazil and the United States are bound together. There is no lessening of our commitment to the principles that you described. The basic freedoms to democratic government, to the protection of human rights, to the prevention of nuclear proliferation—these commitments are also very deep for us.

Obviously, the overwhelming responsibility when I come to a foreign country, no matter where it is, is to meet with the leaders who are in office. But I also will be visiting the Congress this morning. I'm sure that I will be meeting the chairman of a Senate foreign relations committee who's also a candidate for President.

We've already pointed out I will be meeting with religious leaders, and I hope that in this process that I'll have a chance to get views from all elements, at least some of the major elements of the Brazilian society. But I'm not endorsing any candidates, and I think that the overwhelming sense of my visit already has been that the strength of our friendship and the mutuality of our purposes, now and in the future, far override any sharply expressed differences of opinion on even the major and very important issues of human rights, nonproliferation, trade, and so forth.

FRANK CORMIER [Associated Press]. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much.

NOTE: President Carter's twenty-eighth news conference began at 9 a.m. in the Ballroom of the Hotel Nacional in Brasilia, Brazil. It was broadcast live via satellite on radio and television in the United States.

Several of the reporters spoke in Portuguese, and their questions were translated by an interpreter.

Brasília, Brazil

March 30, 1978*

Distinguished leaders of the great Government of Brazil, the Senate, the House of Deputies:

One of the greatest honors of my life is to meet with others who share with us in the United States a common background, a common commitment to the common future.

I particularly want to thank Senator Enrico Rezende and my good and old friend, Deputado Erasmo Martins Pedro, for those inspirational words. There is no way that I can match your eloquence. There's no way that I can improve upon what you have said. And your complimentary words to me, undeserved, will be an inspiration in the years ahead.

I've been here before in this chamber, in your country. I've been impressed with the greatness of Brazil. I've seen the compatibility between your own people and ours—the origins of your country; the struggle for freedom against colonial rule; the courage, the tenacity, the dedication that was required in our country and yours to explore new frontiers, to carve out for ourselves a better life, a greater life, and a position of leadership throughout the whole world.

I recognize that in your country and in mine there is a great diversity of interest, differences among people, and a constant, unceasing, most often successful struggle to bring harmony among differences and to carve out common commitments that will add the strength of all those different people together to reach a destiny even more inspirational than the past history has already given to us.

We share a common religion among many of our people, a common hope for peace. We share a feeling that our nations are bound together with unbreakable chains. We share a realization that while friendship is strong enough to sustain transient differences of opinion, that we can exchange ideas freely and without constraint and, in the process, learn about one another and perhaps improve the attitudes of people in the United States and also in Brazil.

We are learning together in the Western Hemisphere, which still has the vigor of newness, how we can exert our leadership throughout the rest of the world in dealing with hunger and despair, in dealing with the struggle for basic human rights.

We understand the broad definition of these two important words—the right to freedom, the right to criticize a government, the right of people to contain within themselves, collectively, the ultimate authority, the right to an education, the right to good health, a place to live, food, the right to share more equitably the riches with which God has blessed us, the right to express opinions, the right to enhance our own individuality, the right to seek collective solutions to private and public problems, the right to expose the greatness of our own nations which we love.

I'm grateful for the invitation to appear before this great Congress as one whose own political career began in a legislature. I've seen the importance of a good relationship between a Governor and a State legislature, between a President and a national Congress. And I join you in honoring the ultimate purpose of any legislative body, that of ensuring that individual people who have small voices may participate through you in the decisions that affect their lives.

Thirty-one years ago, another American President stood before the Brazilian Congress, another Congress in a different city, since your vision of Brasília had not yet been fulfilled. I'd like to quote from the words of Harry Truman: "It is not too much to describe our relations as those of life-long friends," he said. And then he asked, "Why are the ties between Brazil and the United States so close? The distance between our countries is great. And until recent years communications were slow and difficult. It is not physical proximity that alone makes friends and neighbors; it is rather the fact that we have common interests, common principles, and common ideals.”

Those words still apply today, and they are the overriding concepts which bind our nations together permanently and on which we base our realization and our hope and our expectation for future friendship, stability, and mutual strengthening in the years to come.

In the intervening years, Brazil has come into an even fuller realization of your rightful place in the world, though it has not yet reached the limits of your enormous potential. And after all those years, we can still call on one another as friends, for that bond recalls the sacrifices that we have made together in a common struggle, with the loss of Brazilian and American lives, and it implies the right to disagree on occasion, even vigorously, without bitterness or mistrust.

As I said when I met your President yesterday, the world needs, the world expects, and the world will benefit from your creativity, your energy, and your success. Many of the problems that we share as members of a human family will never be solved unless the ablest among us devote their best to efforts to that cause. Economic development with a fairer distribution of the world's riches, a trading system that is open and equitable, cooperative solutions to our common energy problems, peaceful use of atomic power without the risk of proliferation, reducing the excessive trade in weapons, and encouraging consultations and negotiations about even the most troubling issues, advancing the cause of human liberty, democratic government, and the rule of law—these are efforts in which the United States needs your friendship, your partnership, and the world needs your help and your leadership. And I'm sure we will not be disappointed.

Since my friend has quoted the Bible, I would like to do the same. In Portuguese, as well as English, the Bible tells us that to whom much is given, much will be required. Our two nations have been greatly blessed by God, and we have much to give in return.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 11 a.m. in the Chamber of Deputies of the Congress. In his remarks, he referred to Enrico Rezende, majority leader of the Senate, and Federal Deputy Erasmo Martins Pedro.

Prior to his remarks, the President met at the Supremo Federal Tribunal with Minister Carlos Thompson Flores, president of the Supremo Federal Tribunal, and upon his arrival at the Congress, the President met in the Salon Nobre with senior members of the Senate and Chamber of Deputies.

Following his remarks to the Congress, the President proceeded to the Palácio do Planalto for meetings with President Geisel.

Brasília, Brazil

Joint Communique Issued Following Meetings Between President Carter and President Geisel. March 30, 1978

The President of the United States and Mrs. Jimmy Carter visited Brazil March 29–31, 1978, as part of a series of visits to major nations. Accompanying President Carter were Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski, Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs Terence A. Todman, Director of Policy Planning for the Department of State W. Anthony Lake and Robert Pastor of the NSC Staff.

The President of the Federative Republic of Brazil and Mrs. Ernesto Geisel received the President of the United States and Mrs. Carter as official guests of the Brazilian Government. President Geisel welcomed the visit as a clear expression of the importance of the relationship and the historic ties that link the two countries.

During the course of their stay in Brasília, President and Mrs. Carter visited His Excellency, the President of the Supreme Federal Tribunal, and other members of the Tribunal. President Carter also called on the National Congress meeting in solemn joint session. President and Mrs. Carter expressed their deep appreciation for these opportunities to meet with the Tribunal and the National Congress.

The visit testifies to the desire of both Presidents to increase their mutual understanding and build on the broad areas of agreement that exist between the two Governments. The visit also recognizes the growing importance and complexity of relations between the two countries and the need to minimize the inevitable differences in perspective that flow from that complexity.

The conversations between the two Presidents took place in an atmosphere of frankness, cordiality and mutual respect. They reviewed recent international developments on the global and regional plane and exchanged views on the policies and perceptions of their Governments. Recognizing the respective responsibilities of their two countries in the resolution of important global issues, the two Presidents stressed the common interests and goals both countries share for the construction of a just and peaceful international order. They reaffirmed their strong support for the principles of the Charter of the United Nations and of the Organization of American States, and for the principles of sovereignty, equality, and non-intervention in the domestic affairs of states, non-use of force in international relations and for other principles of international law governing relations among states. They agreed on the need to persevere in efforts to maintain international peace, strengthen world security, intensify cooperation among states, and settle outstanding international issues in accordance with the peaceful means envisaged by the Charter of the United Nations.

In the context of this global review, the two Presidents noted the importance of the United Nations and other international and regional institutions in the resolution of international issues and disputes, and agreed that their two Governments should maintain and expand their cooperation in support of these mechanisms and their increased effectiveness. They also agreed to expand the annual consultations between their two Governments preceding the UN General Assembly sessions, and to bring within the purview of these consultations negotiations and meetings under UN auspices such as the Law of the Sea Conference and the United Nations Conferences on Technology and Development and Technical Cooperation among Developing Countries.

The Presidents exchanged views concerning the situation in the Middle East and deplored the recent violence which occurred in that area. They agreed that it is necessary and urgent to intensify efforts to achieve a just, comprehensive and durable peace based on UNSC Resolution 242 and 338. They stressed the importance of withdrawal on all fronts pursuant to Resolution 242 and the resolution of all aspects of the Palestinian question.

The two Presidents emphasized their concern with the arms race and reaffirmed that they strongly favor the adoption of disarmament measures under strict and effective international control. Additionally, the Presidents expressed their mutual dedication to the positive participation of their respective countries in the UN Special Session on Disarmament and affirmed their mutual desire that the Special Session lead to positive steps towards a reduction and eventual elimination of armaments and the alleviation of international tensions.

Drawing on their deep common heritage of respect for the Rule of Law and their determination to improve the conditions of life of their peoples, both Presidents reaffirmed and agreed that the progress of mankind will be measured in large part by advances made in guaranteeing and assuring the political, economic and social rights of all peoples.

President Carter emphasized the fundamental commitment of his country to the promotion of human rights and democratic freedoms as basic to the process of building a more just world, and stated that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the OAS Charter provide a framework for international concern in this area. In this regard President Geisel recalled that international cooperation for the affirmation of human rights, in all their aspects, is one of the noblest tasks of the United Nations. He stressed the preoccupation of the Brazilian Government with the observance of human rights and noted the essential role of economic, social and political development in attaining progress in this area.

President Carter reviewed the global scope of the non-proliferation policy of the United States, illustrated the practical implementation of this policy within the United States itself, and described the ongoing efforts of his Administration to prevent both vertical and horizontal proliferation on a worldwide basis. He emphasized that U.S. policy is designed to curb the spread of nuclear weapons, while encouraging international cooperation in the development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy. President Geisel noted Brazil's equal concern for non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, both vertical and horizontal. In this connection, he stressed that Brazil strongly supports international efforts towards disarmament; that Brazil's nuclear program has strictly peaceful objectives and is designed to meet her energy needs; and that Brazil favors the adoption of the IAEA's international non-discriminatory safeguards.

The two Presidents reviewed the conditions and prospects of the world economy. They discussed the critical relationship of developments in the U.S. economy to global stability and growth, and examined Brazil's rapidly expanding role within the global economic system. Both Presidents stressed that it is important that the industrialized countries as a group pursue appropriate policies to ensure the resumption of more rapid worldwide economic growth, which also requires appropriate policies in the developing countries to maintain healthy economies. They welcomed the decision of OPEC taken in Caracas in December to maintain the prevailing level of petroleum prices.

President Carter emphasized his Administration's commitment to freer trade. President Geisel stressed the importance of export growth to Brazilian development. In this connection, both Presidents emphasized their resolve to work toward a more open and fair global trading system, to fight protectionism and to cooperate in bringing the Multilateral Trade Negotiations to a successful conclusion. The two Presidents agreed that the major contributions in this field should be made by the developed countries. President Carter emphasized the determination of the United States to negotiate special and differential treatment for developing countries, where feasible and appropriate. He also noted the desirability of contributions by the developing countries toward trade liberalization. President Geisel expressed Brazil's readiness to contribute, together with other countries, to the lib-eralization of world trade. The two Presidents agreed on the importance of reaching an understanding on codes on export subsidies, countervailing duties, safeguards and other trade policy mechanisms. They also agreed on the need for close consultations as the Geneva negotiations approach the final stage.

The two Presidents agreed that the Fifth Session of the Brazil-US Sub-Group on Trade would take place in Brasília in May. The principal purpose of the session will be a bilateral examination of the substantive issues existing in the current phase of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations.

The two Presidents strongly endorsed the key role of international financial institutions such as the World Bank and the Inter-American Development Bank. In this connection, they reviewed the various measures taken in the past year and agreed on the importance of an increased level of funding of these institutions. The two Presidents emphasized the importance of the contributions of the developed as well as of the developing countries to these institutions, and also noted and welcomed the expanding efforts among the developing countries themselves to strengthen mutual cooperation in support of their development. They noted with satisfaction the efforts made to create a group for economic cooperation in the Caribbean.

The two Presidents agreed on the importance of stabilizing commodity prices at levels fair to producers and consumers and of the role which well-designed funding arrangements can play in relation to commodity price stabilization agreements.

Both Presidents stated that they would continue their support for the close working relationships that have been established between the economic and financial authorities of the two countries.

The two Presidents discussed their common interest in reducing dependence on imported oil and reviewed their countries' programs in energy research and development. They agreed to establish a program of cooperation that would emphasize both nations' areas of advanced expertise and ensure a two-way flow of benefits: in coal mining, processing and conversion, the production of alcohol from sugar and other agricultural products, and industrial and transportation energy conservation. This agreement will be followed by meetings of experts to design specific cooperative programs including the possibility of joint funding of such programs.

The two Presidents also noted the world agricultural situation and agreed that the United States and Brazil, as the world's leading exporters of agricultural products, can make an important contribution to easing world problems in this field. They decided to establish, under the Memorandum of Understanding of February 21, 1976, a Sub-Group on Agriculture. The Sub-Group will address problems of mutual interest and will hold its initial meeting in the near future.

The two Presidents also noted that the shared experiences which derive from private sector, professional, cultural and educational exchanges constitute a valuable base of lasting friendship and mutual understanding between the two countries. The two Presidents specifically noted the celebration last year of the Twentieth Anniversary of the Bilateral Fulbright Exchange Program which has involved university scholars of a wide variety of disciplines.

The two Presidents emphasized the shared goals of their peoples in a new era of peace and progress which will contribute to a more just economic relationship between North and South, promote increased economic security for all countries, assure a better quality of life for all peoples, provide a more equitable sharing of the benefits of growth, and encourage more rapid national development.

The two Presidents agreed on the importance of frequent consultations and close cooperation between the two Governments. They agreed that the mechanisms and procedures of consultation established under the Memorandum of Understanding of February 21, 1976, should continue to be used and instructed their Foreign Ministers accordingly. The two Presidents expressed their intention to continue in close personal communication so as to permit their direct and prompt address to matters of special interest to their two countries.

The two Presidents expressed their great personal satisfaction that their conversations, conducted in an atmosphere of friendship and mutual respect, had resulted in a very useful, comprehensive and mutually beneficial exchange of views on a wide range of multilateral and bilateral issues, and a full appreciation of each other's views.

Upon ending their visit, President and Mrs. Carter thanked President and Mrs. Geisel for the cordial hospitality offered to them by the Brazilian people and government.

NOTE: The text of the joint communique was released at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

Lagos, Nigeria

Remarks of the President and Lt. Gen. Olusegun Obasanjo at the Welcoming Ceremony. April 1, 1978

GENERAL OBASANJO. President and Mrs. Carter, on behalf of the people and Government of Nigeria, I would like to take this opportunity to welcome you to Nigeria and, indeed, to Africa on this historic visit.

In the interest of peace and stability in Africa, in particular, and in the world in general, and for the mutual benefit of our two countries, contact and consultation between our countries, especially since your arrival in the White House, has been on the increase. We welcome this development.

I fondly remember my visit to your great country only last October and the warm and generous reception accorded me. That visit afforded us an opportunity for frank and cordial exchange of views and ideas on contemporary issues of interest to our two countries. I hope this visit, the first of its kind and so timely, will be as rewarding and as fruitful as my memorable visit last October.

The whole of Africa, and indeed the whole world, will be interested in your visit to our country as marking a significant redirection in American policy towards black Africa.

This visit will afford you, Mr. President, and Mrs. Carter and, through you, the majority of American people a closer understanding of Africa today and African aspirations.

We as leaders cannot afford to disappoint our two peoples, in particular, who have great expectations from this exchange of visits. There are present issues which must engage our attention during this visit. Your personal commitment to human values, rights, and dignity, based on the principles and ideals of the Founding Fathers of your great country, have given us some hope in our joint endeavor to eradicate racialism on this continent and to ensure improvement of peace, justice, and fairness on our continent and in the world.

We believe that world economies are complementary and interdependent, and we hope this visit will afford us the opportunity of exploring the areas of cooperation and collaboration between our two countries for our mutual benefits, and finding ways and means of bringing about a more equitable world economic order.

May I especially once again welcome Mrs. Carter to Nigeria and wish you, President and Mrs. Carter, and all the members of your entourage, a pleasant stay in Nigeria and a safe journey back home at the end of what we expect to be a rewarding visit and experience. You are welcome.

THE PRESIDENT. Your Excellency, General Obasanjo, distinguished officials of the Military Government of Nigeria, and the people who are friends of the people of my country, the United States:

It is a personal privilege for me to begin this first state visit of a President of the United States to the sub-Saharan region of Africa. It also reflects the increasing role which so many nations of this diverse continent are now playing in international affairs.

I am pleased to come to Nigeria, where the vision of your own government in meeting African challenges has been an inspiration far beyond the borders of your own great country.

Quite apart from the great political events which are shaping our times, the American people have a longstanding but growing interest in the continent of Africa—its history, its cultural richness, its increasingly developed economic potential.

During the past years, we in the United States have been enriched—and particularly the last few months—by significant visits of Nigerian painters, sculptors, musicians, and other artists. Our awareness of your 2,000-year-old artistic tradition is being enhanced even now, by such events as the exhibit this month, in Washington, of regional arts of the Nigerian people.

As I told General Obasanjo earlier on his visit to Washington, I, myself, and my family are avid readers of the fine literary works of Chinua Achebe and others who write of the past and present life in your great country.

It is in this context of growing awareness about African culture that so many people in the United States are looking back with increased interest to their family origins here. But the relationship between the United States and Nigeria is based on current realities and common hopes, as well as ancestral ties. We share with you a desire to see all the people of Africa at peace with each other, preserving their diversity and their national character, living in mutual respect, and enjoying the fruits of development and of democracy.

The presence of more than 15,000 Nigerian students in the United States and many Americans here underlines the depth of our cooperation in the field of education. We are also bound by economic interests, and we are learning from each other about trade and about industrial and agricultural development.

Our relationship with you is one of mutual dependence, and our goals should always be to find ways of making this relationship even more beneficial to both our peoples. And we share the hope of achieving peace with justice in southern Africa.

I am particularly happy to renew my close acquaintance with General Obasanjo. We first met last October, when he paid an official visit to the United States. Since then, I have benefited from his counsel in many ways.

I am especially pleased that the Nigerian people and Government, your leaders, are so deeply committed to democratic principles. A freely elected assembly is even now debating the draft of your nation's new constitution. This demonstration of faith in the judgment of Nigerian citizens is heartening to all of us in America who care so deeply about self-determination, majority rule, and human rights.

I'm looking forward to even closer cooperation with Nigeria and with other nations in Africa. And during this visit,

I expect to learn firsthand about some of Africa's problems and opportunities from your distinguished leaders.

General Obasanjo, thank you for your welcome. It is a great pleasure for me, for my wife, for my daughter, and other American officials, to be with you in your great and growing country.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The exchange began at 10:12 a.m. at Dodan Barracks.

The President had arrived in Lagos on the evening of March 31. He was met at Murtala Muhammed Airport by General Obasanjo, Head of State of Nigeria, and then went to the State House Marina where he stayed during his visit to Lagos.

Following the welcoming ceremony, the President and General Obasanjo went to the VIP Room at Dodan Barracks for meetings. The President then proceeded to Tafawa Balewa Square, where he placed a wreath at the memorial cenotaph, dedicated to the memory of Nigerian soldiers who died in the two World Wars and the Nigerian civil war.

Lagos, Nigeria

*Remarks at the National Arts Theatre.
April 1, 1978*

DR. AKINYEMI. Your Excellency, President Jimmy Carter, Mrs. Carter, Your Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen:

It is a great honor for me to welcome you and Mrs. Carter this afternoon on behalf of the Nigerian Institute of International Affairs.

All of us here this afternoon are privileged to be present at this significant occasion, when the President of the United States speaks to the Nigerian people. This occasion is an indication of the President's recognition of the need to talk not only to governments but also to peoples; to share his views not only with government officials but also with the general public. This occasion is also a recognition of the formidable role which informed and articulate public opinion plays in the formulation and development of a nation's foreign policy.

Commentators on the present foreign policy of the United States are quick to point out the constraints which are placed on the President in the development of policies towards other nations. This plurality of society is one of the things which Nigeria has in common with the United States.

In the case of Nigeria, this pluralism manifests itself in enormous pressures on our Government to pursue our foreign policy objectives as rapidly and vigorously as possible. This occasion is a recognition of the pluralism of Nigerian society.

Mr. President, the Nigerian public has noticed the new direction which you have given to the foreign policy of the United States, the sincerity of your crusade against violations of human rights throughout the world, and your commitment to the right of individual nations to self-determination. But at the same time, the Nigerian public has learned to measure policy pronouncements by results and not by expectations.

The Nigerian public believes that the United States has a duty to mankind to take positive policy initiatives in southern Africa. The Nigerian public hopes that your deep concern for human rights, Mr. President, will be translated into action aimed at destroying institutionalized violation of human rights in southern Africa.

As representatives of the Nigerian public privileged to be here this afternoon, we await your voice, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Director Akinyemi, Commissioner Garba, distinguished officials of the Government of Nigeria and of the United States, distinguished guests from other countries, and my friends, the Nigerian people:

I come from a great nation to visit a great nation. When my voice speaks words, they are not the words of a personal person but the words of a country.

It's no coincidence that I come here to this institute, where free and open discussions and debate contribute to the comprehension and understanding and the reaching of agreements that solve problems that have separated people one from another.

It is no coincidence that I come to Nigeria to talk about our bilateral relationships and the problems of Africa. And it is no coincidence that our Nation has now turned in an unprecedented way toward Africa—not to give you our services but to share with you a common future, combining our strengths and yours, correcting our weaknesses and correcting yours. And this departure from past aloofness by the United States is not just a personal commitment of my own, but I represent the deep feelings and the deep interest of all the people of my country.

I'm proud and deeply moved to be the first American President to make an official visit to your country. And I'm especially grateful for the warmth and the generosity of my reception by the Government and by the people of Nigeria.

I don't know who's doing the work, but many Nigerians are standing beside the roadway to make me and my family feel welcome, and I thank you for it.

During my first year as President of the United States, I've been pleased to work closely with General Obasanjo, learning from him and from other African leaders. Our cooperation has had a special meaning for me, since Africa has been so much in my thoughts during the past 15 months.

Our countries have much in common. Nigeria and the United States are vast and diverse nations seeking to use our great resources for the benefit of all our people. That's the way it is now; that's the way it will continue to be in the future.

Americans admire the energy, the wisdom, the hard work, the sense of optimism of the Nigerian people, for these are exactly the same qualities which we admire in my country.

The Nigerian Government has shown these qualities in your own national accomplishments and in your efforts for worldwide peace and economic progress—in the Organization for African Unity, in the United Nations, and in other councils where nations seek common ground so as to resolve differences and to work together.

We admire also the humane and the creative way which Nigeria has come through a divisive time in your own history. Through public debate and far-reaching planning, you are designing a democratic future for a new "One Nigeria," and we're grateful and excited about this prospect.

Our bonds of friendship go back many years. Nigerian students first came to the United States in the 19th century. Your first President, Nnamdi Azikiwe, studied in our country. In applying to Lincoln University, he wrote that he believed in education for service and service for humanity.

Tens of thousands of young Nigerians have followed him to America to prepare themselves for service here in their homeland. Many are present or future teachers, who will help you achieve your goal of universal primary education.

We in the United States are learning from you as well, for we are enriched by our ties and heritage in Africa, just as we hope to contribute to the realization of African hopes and African expectations.

Our nations and our continents are bound together by strong ties that we inherit from our histories. We also share three basic commitments to the future of Africa.

We share with you a commitment to majority rule and individual human rights. In order to meet the basic needs of the people, we share with you a commitment to economic growth and to human development. We share with you a commitment to an Africa that is at peace, free from colonialism, free from racism, free from military interference by outside nations, and free from the inevitable conflicts that can come when the integrity of national boundaries are not respected. We share these things with you as well.

These three common commitments shape our attitude toward your continent. You have been among the leaders of international efforts to bring the principles of majority rule and individual rights into reality in southern Africa.

During the past year, we've worked closely with your Government and the other frontline states in the quest to achieve these goals in Namibia and in Zimbabwe.

Our efforts have now reached a critical stage. On Namibia, there has been some progress, with the parties showing some degree of flexibility. It is important that accommodation be now reached. This past week, we and the other Western members of the United Nations Security Council have presented to the disputing parties our proposals for an internationally acceptable agreement based on free elections.

These proposals provide the best hope for a fair and peaceful solution that will bring independence to Namibia in a manner consistent with Security Council Resolution 385. No group is favored at the expense of another. They protect the rights of all. They should be accepted without further delay.

The tragic assassination of Chief Kapuuo should not lead to an era of violence and recrimination, but to an internationally supervised choice by the people of Namibia to elect leadership that will unite their country in peace and not divide it in war.

On Rhodesia, or Zimbabwe, Great Britain and the United States have put forward a plan for the solution, based on three fundamental principles: first, fair and free elections; secondly, an irreversible transition to genuine majority rule and independence; and third, respect for the individual rights of all the citizens of an independent Zimbabwe.

This plan provides the best basis for agreement. It is widely supported within the international community and by the Presidents of the frontline nations who surround Zimbabwe itself. Its principles must be honored. Let there be no question of the commitment of the United States to these principles or our determination to pursue a just settlement which brings a cease-fire and an internationally recognized legal government.

The present challenge to our diplomacy and to yours is to help all the parties get together, based on the Anglo-American plan, and build on areas of agreement. Only a fair arrangement with broad support among the parties can endure.

The transition to independence of a new Zimbabwe must ensure an opportunity for all parties to compete in the democratic process on an equal footing. The past must lead irrevocably to majority rule and a future in which the rights of each citizen of Zimbabwe are protected, regardless of tribal or ethnic origin or race. That is our Nation's position. We will not depart from it.

The hour is late with regard both to Zimbabwe and to Namibia. The parties must choose. They can choose a path of agreement and be remembered as men of vision and courage who created new nations, born in peace, or they can insist on rigid postures that will produce new political complications, generating new conflicts, growing additional bloodshed, and delay the fulfillment of their hopes.

We in the United States remain committed, as do the people of Nigeria, to the path of genuine progress and fairness, for the sake of all the nations of the region and for the sake of international peace.

In the name of justice, we also believe that South African society should and can be transformed progressively and peacefully, with assured respect for the rights of all. We've made it clear to South Africa that the nature of our relations will depend on whether there is progress towards full participation for all her people, in every respect of the social and economic life of the nation, and an end to discrimination, an end to apartheid, based on race or ethnic origin. We stand firm in that message as well.

I grew up in a society struggling to find racial harmony through racial justice. Though our problems were different, I know that progress can best be found if the determination to see wrongs righted is matched by an understanding that the prisoners of injustice include the privileged as well as the powerless.

I believe we should therefore combine our determination to support the rights of the oppressed people in South Africa with a willingness to hold out our hands to the white minority if they decide to transform their society and to do away with apartheid and the crippling burdens of past injustices.

I also believe that progress can be made. As Andrew Young said here in Lagos last August, a belief in dreams for the future is not naive if we are ready to work to realize those dreams.

Our concern for human rights extends throughout this continent and throughout the world. Whatever the ideology or the power or the race of a government that abuses the rights of its people, we oppose those abuses.

We in America welcome the real progress in human rights that is being made in many countries, in Africa as well as in other regions.

Americans were particularly encouraged that the African group at the United Nations Human Rights Commission moved this year to consider the oppressive policies of two of its own member nations.

We are encouraged, too, by the movement towards democracy being made by many nations. Nigeria is an outstanding example. The free and fair elections that you held in the past year leave no doubt that your Government is determined to pursue its decision to establish civilian rule in 1979. This action will be an inspiration to all those in the world who love democracy and who love freedom. And we congratulate you on this.

Each country must, of course, adapt the instruments of democracy to fit its own particular needs, a process now being completed by your constituent assembly. The basic elements are participation by individuals in the decisions that affect their lives, respect for civil liberties through the rule of law, and thus, protection of the dignity of all men and women.

Wherever these fundamental principles exist, a government can accommodate to necessary change without breaking, and its people can demand such change without being broken.

These principles are necessary for democracy, and they sustain development as well. For in a democracy, the people themselves can best ensure that their government will promote their economic rights, as well as their political and civil liberties.

I believe, as I know you do as well, that every person also has a right to education, to health care, to nutrition, to shelter, to food, and to employment. These are the foundations on which men and women can build better lives.

This is our second great, common goal between the United States and Nigeria—human development made possible by fair and equitable economic progress.

My country is ready to do its fair share in support of African development, both because it's in our own interest and also because it's right. More and more, the economic well-being of Americans depends on the growth of the developing nations here in Africa and in other parts of the world. A good example is our relationship with Nigeria, which is marked by respect for each other's independence and a growing recognition of our interdependence.

Nigeria, for instance, is the United States second largest supplier of imported crude oil. The United States is the largest market for Nigeria's petroleum, and thus the largest source of the revenue which is so vital to Nigeria's dynamic, economic development program.

But the scope of our commerce is much broader than in petroleum alone. Our growing trade serves the interests of both countries. When we purchase Nigerian products, we contribute to Nigerian development. But unless we can also share our technology and share our productive capacity with you, our own economy slows down, American workers lose their jobs, and the resulting economic sluggishness means that we can buy less from you.

Financial encouragement to developing nations is therefore in our interest, because a world of prosperous, developing economies is a world in which America's economy can prosper.

We are increasing our bilateral development assistance to Africa, and on my return to Washington, I will recommend to the Congress that the United States contribute $125 million to the second replenishment of the African Development Fund.

I'm happy to announce, also, that just before leaving Washington, I authorized our Corps of Engineers to offer to participate, as requested by you, in the comprehensive development of the Niger River System.

We are giving new priority to cooperating in international efforts to improve health around the world. We would like to study with you how we can best work with Nigeria and other nations of Africa to deal with the killing and the crippling diseases that still afflict this continent.

Three days ago I spoke in Caracas, Venezuela, about our commitment to international economic growth and equity. All of us can gain if we act fairly toward one another.

Nigeria acted on this principle in helping to negotiate the Lomé Convention and the birth of the Economic Community of West African States.

All nations can act on this principle by making world trade increasingly free and fair. Private investment can help, under arrangements benefiting both the investors and also the host countries like your own. And sharing technology can make a crucial difference. We are especially pleased that Nigeria is sending so many of your young people to the United States for training in the middle-level technical skills.

There must be fair international agreements on such issues as stabilizing commodity prices, the creation of a Common Fund, and relieving the debt burden of the poorest nations.

Every government has the obligation to promote economic justice within its own nation, as well as among nations. American development assistance will go increasingly to those areas where it can make the greatest contribution to the economic rights of the poor.

Progress towards economic development requires the pursuit of our third goal as well—again which we share with you—a peaceful Africa, free of military intervention, for economic progress is best pursued in times of peace.

Africans themselves can best find peaceful answers to African disputes through the Organization of African Unity and, when needed, with the help of the United Nations.

We support your efforts to strengthen the peacemaking role of the Organization of African Unity, and we share Nigeria's belief in the practical contributions the United Nations can make.

U.N. peacekeeping forces are already, today, playing a crucial role in the Middle East. They can help bring independence and majority rule, in peace, to Namibia and to Zimbabwe.

The military intervention of outside powers or their proxies in such disputes too often makes local conflicts even more complicated and dangerous and opens the door to a new form of domination or colonialism. We oppose such intervention by outside military forces. We must not allow great power rivalries to destroy our hopes for an Africa at peace.

This is one reason we applaud the leading role of Nigeria in seeking to find peaceful solutions to such tragedies as the recent struggle between Ethiopia and Somalia in the Horn of Africa.

We are concerned that foreign troops are already planning for military action inside Ethiopia against the Eritreans, which will result in greatly increased bloodshed among those unfortunate peoples. Although I will remain careful to see that our friends are not put at a disadvantage, I am working to curb our own role as a supplier of arms, and we urge others to show similar restraint.

We prefer to seek good relations with African and other nations through the works of peace, not war. America's contribution will be to life and development and not to death or destruction.

Plainly, military restraint by outsiders can best be brought about if all nations, including those who buy weapons, actively seek that constraint. We would welcome and support voluntary regional agreements among African leaders to reduce the purchase of weapons as a major step towards peace and away from the economic deprivation of the poor, when badly needed money that could give them a better life goes to purchase weapons to take lives.

I've talked about many subjects this afternoon, very briefly, but in one way or another, I've been talking about change in the world that we all share. Sometimes we grow impatient or cynical about that change, thinking that it's too slow, that it may not come at all.

I know something about social change. In my own lifetime, I've seen the region of my birth, the southern part of the United States, changed from a place of poverty and despair and racial division to a land of bright promise and opportunity and increasing racial harmony.

I've seen the towering wall between the races taken down, piece by piece, until the whites and the blacks of my country could reach across it to each other.

I know that our own society is different from any other, and I know that we still have much to do in the United States. But nothing can shake my faith that in every part of the world, peaceful change can come and bless the lives of human beings. Nothing can make me doubt that this continent will win its struggle for freedom—freedom from racism and the denial of human rights, freedom from want and suffering, and freedom from the destruction of war and foreign intervention.

Nigeria is a great and influential nation, a regional and an international leader. We stand by you in your work. We know that Africans will always take the lead in shaping the destiny of your own people. And we know that this continent will enjoy the liberation that can come to those who put racial division and injustice behind them.

I believe that this day is coming for Africa. And on that day, blacks and whites alike will be able to say, in the words of a great man from my own State, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., "Free at last, free at last, great God Almighty, we are free at last."

Thank you very much.

DR. AKINYEMI. Mr. President, Your Excellencies, the biggest honor which we in this country confer on people whom we respect is not to ignore them. In the next coming days, weeks, and months, every word you've uttered here this evening is going to be analyzed, is going to be dissected. And, Mr. President, we'll keep you informed of it.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: Bolaji Akinyemi, director general of the Nigerian Institute of International Affairs, spoke at 3:45 p.m. In his opening remarks, the President referred to Joseph Nanven Garba, Commissioner for External Affairs.

Lagos, Nigeria

*Question-and-Answer Session With Reporters Following Meetings Between the President and General Obasanjo.
April 2, 1978*

SOUTHERN AFRICA POLICY

Q. Mr. President, is there any connection between your public position on southern African policy and how you take your votes at the Security Council on southern Africa?

THE PRESIDENT. We have, as you know, only recently as a nation been deeply involved in trying to bring peace to southern Africa. We have taken the initiative, along with the British, in Zimbabwe, to try to bring out a resolution of those very serious problems—peace, majority rule, the melding of the liberation forces as a base in the future security of Zimbabwe. And we have also taken the initiative, along with Germany and France, Great Britain and Canada, under the United Nations, to bring a resolution of the problem in Namibia—again, majority rule, free elections, the right of the blacks to have their rights honored.

I think that is accurate to say, too, that the recent action by the United Nations to implement an arms embargo against South Africa was preceded by our own unilateral action implementing an arms embargo long before the U.N. acted, and we support that arms embargo completely.

U.S. INVESTMENTS AND ASSISTANCE TO NIGERIA

Q. Can you tell us if you talked about the oil situation and the fact that Nigeria wants more technology from the United States?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. We discussed the oil situation in Nigeria. We also discussed the prospect of purchasing liquefied natural gas, which Nigeria will be ready to produce by 1983, and the need of Nigeria for technical assistance not only in petroleum, but in other aspects of economic development.

There are now, as I said in my speech yesterday, 15,000 Nigerian students and, in addition, a thousand more who are getting specific middle-level technical training in the United States. Five hundred are already there, 500 more are coming. In addition, the Nigerians have requested senior assistance, retired executives from the United States who have knowledge in economic development and petroleum to come here to work with them. And we will pursue that through the Secretary of State.

The Eximbank loans, the OPIC insurance, which I think we now have 31 applicants who are ready to come into Nigeria to make investments—this will be expedited.

In addition, we have established, after General Obasanjo's visit to the United States in October, detailed discussions between our own Commerce Department and other officials and the Nigerians on how we can increase investment and technical assistance for Nigeria.

It is a very good country in which to invest. There is a stable government with a prospect of constitutional government that will be equally stable. I think the past problems with American investors have now been overcome. I know that several major companies—Ford, Mack Truck, Bechtel, and others—are now coming into Nigeria to invest.

So, I would guess that all the needs of Nigeria—technical assistance and development—will be met.

EMBARGOES AGAINST SOUTH AFRICA

Q. Did the General ask you, Mr. President, to take stronger action toward South Africa and Rhodesia, perhaps more embargoes?

THE PRESIDENT. I think the General would be more inclined to take additional embargo action against South Africa than would we. As I have said, we have cooperated in the United Nations actions, and even before the U.N. action, we took unilateral steps to declare a complete arms embargo against South Africa.

U.S.-NIGERIAN COOPERATION

Q. Mr. President, what specific areas of bilateral cooperation would you like between your country and Nigeria on any issue, or on any important project to use for this important visit?

THE PRESIDENT. We have got now four committees set up, one for the development of Nigerian agriculture. This is a joint effort where we help Nigeria and we learn in the process. Another one of the subcommittees is on education. And we have always had, for many years, a very good relationship here. We want to improve it.

Another one is in economic development. I mentioned that we have 31 applicants right now of American business investments that are waiting to be made in Nigeria. And the fourth one is technical assistance, where we will provide technical training in the United States and send technicians here who are expert, to help with the future development of the Nigerian economy.

These efforts are all very fruitful, and they will be better in the future. We have decided, for instance, this morning that the joint study commission that was set up last October, that already met in Nigeria in November, will have another meeting in the United States in April, this month, the last of this month, will make a report to me and to General Obasanjo by the end of May to identify any remaining problems, so that he and I can personally resolve those problems and remove the obstacles to the further economic development, on a joint basis, between our country and Nigeria.

MEETINGS ON ZIMBABWE AND NAMIBIA

Q. You said the General would be more inclined to have stronger embargoes. Did he urge you to do anything that your administration is not doing now to take steps in other areas in support of the change in South Africa?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. We have had a very thorough discussion not only between myself and General Obasanjo and his Ministers (Foreign),<sup>1</sup> but yesterday we had a foreign-level discussion with other nations, including the frontline countries around Rhodesia.

We now will move as quickly as possible to call together the parties who are in dispute concerning Zimbabwe, those who are identified as a patriotic front, the frontline nations who surround Rhodesia, and also the parties to the internal settlement—Smith, Muzorewa, Sithole, and Chirau.

We will begin now to explore the earliest date when this might be accomplished. We and the British will act as hosts, and we will, of course, encourage United Nations participation as well.

In the case of Namibia, the five-nation group operating as a committee of the United Nations Security Council—these are the permanent committee members in the Security Council that I have named earlier, the Western members—will contact the South Africans to put forward our proposal and also to contact the SWAPO leaders.

The frontline president, then the Nigerian leaders will be in contact with Sam Nujoma, who is head of the SWAPO group. So, in these two major areas of dispute, Zimbabwe and Namibia, we will expedite our action at the urging of and with the cooperation of the Nigerian officials.

In the case of the Horn of Africa, Nigeria has long played a leading role, has been chairman of the subcommittee—under the Organization of African Unity—for the Horn of Africa, and they have begun now to make attempts to get the Ethiopians and the Somalians to meet, to make permanent the peace that has been established in recent weeks, in recent days.

We also hope that there will be an avoidance of bloodshed as it relates to the Eritreans. So, I think in these three major areas, we have reached a common purpose. And so far as I know, there are no remaining differences between myself and General Obasanjo.

Q. At what level will this Rhodesian meeting be?

THE PRESIDENT. At the Foreign Secretary level. The plans are that Secretary Vance and, perhaps, David Owen from Britain would be present and in person.

VALUE OF THE DOLLAR

Q. Mr. President, did you reach an agreement with General Obasanjo about stabilizing the dollar?

THE PRESIDENT. I wish that General Obasanjo and I could act on a bilateral basis to completely stabilize the dollar. The dollar is a very sound currency. It is based primarily upon the economy of the United States, which is strong, growing stronger.

There are several factors that will tend to increase the value of the dollar this year. Our imports of oil will be level this year. They were increasing rapidly last year, which was a bad factor last year. The interest rates in our country are higher now than they were before, which will encourage additional investment in our country, which will also help the dollar.

We need very urgently to have the Congress of the United States act on my proposals concerning the comprehensive energy policy. This will stabilize the dollar, and the prospects for that success in the Congress are good. And I believe that there is a general feeling that our economy will continue to grow at about the same rate that it did last year.

Last year we were growing much faster than our major trading partners—Germany, Great Britain, Italy, France, Japan, and others. This year those other nations will have a faster growth, which means that they can buy more of our goods and cut down on our adverse balance of payments. So, for all these reasons and others that I could describe, I think the prospects for a stable dollar are very good.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Q. Did you discuss human rights and any specifics at all, and particularly, did you discuss Uganda and Idi Amin in regards to human rights?

THE PRESIDENT. We did not discuss Uganda. I did mention in my speech yesterday my gratitude that the Organization of African States has shown fit not only to condemn white nations when they deprive persons of human rights but also condemn black leaders, as well, where human rights are abridged.

We did discuss the question of human rights. There is no difference, of course, between our Government, Nigeria and the United States, because we recognize that within our own countries, we have made every effort to enhance human rights. I think political oppressions and the right of people to participate in their government is one that has good prospects of even greater improvement in the future.

We also discussed the problem of human rights that accrue because of poverty—deprived of a right of a place to live and to adequate food and clothing and education and health care. And through our own contributions to the African Development Bank, our own contributions to the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank, through direct bilateral aid, which primarily goes to the very poor countries, and through increased trade and technical service to countries that have had good success, like Nigeria, we are trying to alleviate those human rights and deprivations that come from poverty.

So, we have a very close relationship in our commitment to human rights between ourselves and the Nigerians, and also we have a very good, permanent, personal friendship between myself, General Obasanjo, and other leaders of our Government, which is very helpful to us.

We have benefited just as much in the United States from our good relationships with Nigeria as have the Nigerians, and although it has been very good historically and at the present time, we believe that those relations are going to be even better than in the years to come.

REPORTER. Thank you, Mr. President.

NOTE: The session began at 12:25 p.m. at the State House Marina, following the departure of General Obasanjo.

As printed above, the item follows the White House press release.

Lagos, Nigeria

Toasts at the State Dinner. April 2, 1978

GENERAL OBASANJO. President Jimmy Carter and Mrs. Carter, distinguished guests:

It gives me great pleasure and satisfaction, Mr. President, to once again welcome you and Mrs. Carter to Nigeria on behalf of the Government of Nigeria and in the name of the entire people of our country.

Your presence with us, historic in itself as the first state visit ever undertaken by a President of the United States of America to this part of the world, is of unique significance.

It is also gratifying that you are visiting Nigeria so soon after my own visit to your great country, thus affording us the opportunity to reciprocate, even in a modest way and in the traditional African manner, the warmth of the reception, the generosity, and the meticulous care and attention which were accorded me and my delegation during our visit to your country.

In the conduct of international relations today, direct, personal contacts and consultations among those who are charged with the responsibilities of guiding the affairs of their respective nations are a vital instrument for promoting international understanding and respect for one another's views and positions. We are pleased for this opportunity, offered by your visit, to continue the dialog and exchange of views on the various matters of mutual interest to our two countries which were initiated in the course of my visit to the United States.

Our discussion then, as now, centered on our joint search for international peace and stability; the restructuring of interstate relations to ensure freedom, understanding, and justice, as well as a more equitable economic quota between the rich and the poor nations; the improvement of fundamental human rights and the dignity of man everywhere, whatever his race, color, or creed.

We believe that in our efforts to attain these goals, every nation has an obligation to fulfill and a contribution to make, irrespective of size, circumstance, or geopolitical status. To many of us in Nigeria, and, if I may venture to say, in Africa generally, the United States as a nation evokes sentiment of admiration, since your country has come a long way from casting away the yoke of colonialism to building a relatively free, united, and strong society, where the freedom of the individual and his rights remain supreme.

This strength of your society lies not merely in the breathtaking capacity of its astronauts, nor in America's unequaled mastery of the skills of science and technology, not even so much in the quality of life, but, above all, in the constant endeavor to live up to the ideals of its Founding Fathers.

I believe many will accept and agree that herein lies the greatest attribute of the American society.

Besides, Mr. President, the continuing American aspiration and contribution to the noble ideals of social justice and human liberty, at home and abroad, have made its influence felt within your borders and across the vast seas and farflung frontiers of states.

The search for these noble ideals is a never-ending process, whether in developed societies like yours or in developing societies like ours.

Your personal commitment to decent human values and service to mankind is not in doubt. We remember with admiration that your mother, Miss Lillian, at the age of 70, did serve with the Peace Corps in India in 1968, long before you became the President. This deep-rooted family concern for humanity has provided the inner strength of your own personal sincerity on matters of human and civil rights and underlies the understanding of our two Governments on issues affecting the life and dignity of the black man.

Mr. President, we consider it, therefore, a logical development that Africa should now occupy its rightful place in the heart of America's foreign policy.

In your brief stay in this capital city of Lagos, you will perhaps already have gained some impression of some of the urgent and critical problems with which we are coping in our endeavor to build up Nigeria into a progressive and virile society, not only with a strong economic base but one founded on respect and dignity for human values.

We have assiduously embarked on the implementation of a political program that will lead to a stable, dynamic, and elected democratic political system where the weak and the strong will equally feel secure and protected.

On the economic front, our program is designed not only to provide a firm and strong industrial base but also to progressively gain control of the commanding heights of our economy and to spread the fruits of development evenly through our society.

In this challenging enterprise we have always welcomed and we will continue to welcome the understanding and active cooperation and collaboration of all genuine friends from outside our borders. And we will continue, as we have done in the past, to ensure security of all investments made in our economy, in accordance with our laws and our regulations.

We share in common with the rest of the developing world the usual disabilities of inadequate food and shelter, weak economic structures, poor health facilities, mass illiteracy, lack of an adequate technological base, and an unflattering human environment—all mainly caused by colonialism.

While we count our own modest achievements in our struggle for development, we can only do so in marginal and relative terms. Besides, our low level of development stands out in bold relief, because we live in a continent where poverty, illiteracy, ignorance, disease, and squalor are the rule, rather than the exception, and where a majority of the least developed nations in the world are found.

The development objectives and achievements of Nigeria, therefore, cannot be viewed in isolation from continental obligations and situations on the one hand, and internationally acceptable definition of development on the other.

On the political plane, Mr. President, one outstanding and most welcome development in contemporary relations between Nigeria and your great country, particularly since the inception of your administration, as I had occasion to say when I welcomed you in Dodan Barracks, is the growing contact and consultation between us.

As a result of this development, you are now, no doubt, better equipped to understand the reason for our persistent reference to the grave threat to international peace and security caused by the explosive situation in the southern part of Africa.

For obvious reasons, and by virtue of our position, we cannot remain indifferent while the racists in southern Africa oppress, repress, and subject to inhuman degradation the overwhelming majority of the indigenous people of the area and deny them the most basic human rights and elementary freedoms.

You will, no doubt, understand and appreciate, therefore, our uncompromising insistence on dismantling the present inhuman systems in southern Africa in favor of a fair and just society.

From all indications our two Governments share identical views in this regard, which I believe is perfectly understandable, judging by your own country's great struggles, soon after its foundation, for the attainment of these same ideals.

In our endeavors to achieve these goals, our choice of means and methods and our precision of timing may differ. But from our exchange of views from this visit, we are convinced that our common desires and dedication to the task cannot be called in doubt. On our part, we shall therefore continue to extend all necessary moral and material assistance to the victims of injustice, oppression, and apartheid in southern Africa.

I believe, also, that it is pertinent to mention our deep concern about the present level of foreign collaboration with the South African regime, particularly in economic and military matters, which tend to sustain the apartheid machinery of repression and persecution of the majority, indigenous African population. Your country's little gestures of disengagement in this regard are welcome, and we hope, Mr. President, that they mark the beginnings of a realization that, put together, black Africa as a whole offers wider economic possibilities as an alternative choice than South Africa alone, and that without a peaceful change of policy of apartheid now, any investment in South Africa is a risky and insecure investment.

In Zimbabwe, your country and the British colonial authority have, over the past 1 year, embarked together on a search for a durable, just, and acceptable settlement, leading to an early transfer of power to the majority population of the land.

We have joined those who believe that the Anglo-American proposals for a peaceful settlement ought to be given a chance, and we were quick to say so. This we have done because we believe that these proposals contain sufficient positive elements to serve as bases for bringing about true independence in Zimbabwe, and we think it will not be wise to throw away the baby with the bath water.

We expressed our concern when it appeared to us that these proposals were not being pursued with as much candor and enthusiasm as Africa had hoped. With total rejection of the so-called internal settlement of Ian Smith by the world community, and your personal continued support for the Anglo-American proposals, we are gratified to note that the proposals are back on the rails once again.

We assure you of our positive support in the search for an early establishment of unqualified democracy in a truly independent Zimbabwe. Similarly, in Namibia, we are encouraged to note the positive role which the United States of America is playing in collaboration with other Western powers to usher in an era of independence and so end South Africa's illegal military occupation.

We stand firmly by SWAPO in their struggles for the freedom of their fatherland, and we also pledge to work ceaselessly to see that peace and justice return to that part of our continent in the context of true independence.

We believe that a truly independent Namibia and a South Africa, rid of the inhuman policy of apartheid, can live together as good neighbors in harmony and cooperation.

As you will be fully aware, our newly independent states in Africa have not been spared the ordeal of spending their meager resources in the prosecution of fratricidal and often futile wars, in many cases with encouragement by powers from ideological camps outside the continent who are seeking ideological, economic, and strategic spheres of influence.

It is Africa's desire to settle her own disputes our own way, if necessary under the auspices of the Organization of African Unity.

While we are naturally preoccupied with peace and security in the African continent in the first instance, I believe the point is worth emphasizing here that Africa is equally interested in the current efforts at détente between East and West, as this is the only dependable means of ensuring peace and stability in the world and development all around, especially in new states. For the same reasons, we are vitally interested in an early restoration of just and durable peace in the Middle East.

On the question of world peace, Mr. President, what applies to Africa in terms of congenial atmosphere and conditions for development applies equally to the rest of the developing world generally. The problems of development of these countries are of such immense dimensions that they demand global perspectives and strategies because, as we have all seen, the conventional and piecemeal approach of donors and receivers of aid and technical assistance has proved itself totally inadequate. A completely fresh approach, therefore, may serve to emphasize the interdependence of our resources and, hopefully, also stem the tide of deep frustration that now pervades the underprivileged half of the world and which the developed world sees as lack of opposition of their efforts.

We believe in this regard that what we require is a fundamental restructuring of the international economic system to modify drastically and modernize the rules governing international trade, access to markets and development capital, the unimpeded flow of technology, and a demonstration of a greater sense of commitment and political will on the part of all concerned to concretize the demands of a new international economic order.

Unfortunately, there has so far been no demonstrable evidence of that sense of commitment or even of concern at international forums, where discussions are currently proceeding on relief for the least developed countries, or agreement on an acceptable form of common fund to provide a mechanism for ensuring uninterrupted and regular flow of earnings for the exports of the Third World.

Your country, Mr. President, has the necessary capacity and the influence and is well placed to play a leading role in this regard. We can bring the developed and developing worlds together in the harmonious cooperation to inspire reforms and to adopt new development initiatives.

We share your concern about the dangerous, high level of armament and about the enormous economic resources consumed by the armament race.

We continue to follow the progress of the strategic arms limitation talks, and we hope that there will be an early agreement that will lead to a reduction in the production and stockpiling of armaments and subsequent freeing of more resources of the world for social programs that will directly lead to improvement of quality of life, especially in developing countries.

Mr. President, let me end by saying once again what a great pleasure it has been for the Nigerian Government and people to welcome you and Mrs. Carter. We hope that even in spite of its brevity, your visit has nevertheless offered you some closer, personal insight into our conditions and our way of life.

As you leave our shores after this historic visit to Africa, you do so, Mr. President, with the sincere good wishes of the Government and people of Nigeria and the appreciation of the value of your memorable visit here.

Your Excellencies, distinguished guests, ladies and gentlemen, may I ask you to kindly join me in drinking a toast to the United States of America, to the strengthening of relations and friendship between the Nigerian and American peoples, and to the personal good health and well-being of President Jimmy Carter and Mrs. Carter.

THE PRESIDENT. General Obasanjo and distinguished officials of the Military Government of Nigeria, officials from other countries, including our own, and ladies and gentlemen, and friends:

Yesterday I had an opportunity to speak at your great civic center to several thousand people assembled there by the Institute on Political Studies. I spelled out the position of our own Nation as it relates to the interrelationship between ourselves and Nigeria, and to Africa, in particular, among the other continents and communities of the world.

So tonight, I would like to refer more personally to my impressions of the visit that I have had with General Obasanjo.

I noticed when the entertainment was introduced, the first statement made was, "No one knows where we go when we die." General Obasanjo and I have discussed our future when we die as political leaders in a few years, and—[laughter]—since we both come from great peanut-producing nations, we decided we would go into a farming partnership. [Laughter] I'll share my farm with him in Georgia, and he'll have to share some farmland with me in Nigeria. And we'll have a chance to travel back and forth to learn to like each other even more and to get better acquainted even with the people in our two countries.

I also noticed that the ancient custom of not being able to tell an oba bad news is one that I would really appreciate as President of the United States. [Laughter] The only problem is I'm afraid that no one would ever have a chance to talk to me about anything, because bad news is all I have a chance to talk about as President of our country. [Laughter]

We have formed a good relationship, a friendly one, one based not just on serious things but on discussions that show that we are at ease with one another. And we share the responsibilities of leadership of two of the great nations of the world.

Today when I was getting ready to leave for Tin Can Island, I invited General Obasanjo to go with me on the trip. He said he couldn't stand to go and look at how much money Nigeria was spending on new port facilities. But when I got there and saw the tremendous new capabilities that Nigeria has now opened up to trade with the rest of the world, I realized what a wise government Nigeria has and how the present investments will pay rich dividends in the future.

Your growth has been extraordinary, very rapid. And I know, even from a nation that has been in existence now for more than 200 years, how difficult it is to deal with rapid change and rapid growth and a yearning among our people for a better life, a proper distribution of wealth and opportunity. And these are the kinds of things that we learn, one from another.

As I mentioned in church this morning, I first began to learn about Nigeria more than 40 years ago, as we studied in a small Baptist church in my town in Georgia about the common religious faith that aroused our interest as Christians in your country. We are a highly diverse nation with a wide range of religious beliefs, as are you. But there is a fundamental faith in a higher authority on which we've predicated our laws, our customs, our beliefs, and our hopes and confidence in the future.

This is one thing that binds us together, and it has done it for many ages in the past, and it will be a basis for a common purpose and a common sharing of life in the future.

We've had a chance during the few hours we've been here—I, my wife, my little daughter—to learn about the ancient culture of Nigeria, much more advanced than ours, beautiful artifacts of 2,000 or more years ago, where you had an already existing culture, well based on the intelligence and the beauty of your people's minds, that has existed down to the present day. And I believe it's accurate to say that when a country is dynamic, is growing, is struggling, is challenged on occasion—as Andy Young said yesterday, it's when we learn to appreciate our ancient culture, our roots, and our past even more.

You have much to be admired, and we have new things as well from which we can learn and teach one another. There is a growing participation of your people in government, and I've never known a more idealistic approach to the future in government than the one that now is being considered by your constitutional body as you write a set of permanent laws to guide your nation toward absolute, true democracy very shortly in the months ahead.

This will indeed be an inspiration to the whole world. You've also had a common experience with us of overthrowing colonial rule, and even after that, as did we, experiencing a very tragic civil war.

I doubt that there's been a case in history when, after a deeply divisive war, more immediate and successful attempts were made to bind a nation back together and to heal the wounds of that division. And all the people in this room, and particularly the leaders of the military government, can be congratulated for the recovery from your tragic war.

This is something that we've shared and we know very well in the southern part of the United States. I think your national motto, ahead of me on your emblem, "Unity and Faith," is a very fine, constant reminder of what you have cherished in the past, what you have in the present, and what you will have in the future.

There's another thing that we share—us with a newness and you, also, with a newness of approach—and that is tremendous international influence. You are a powerful nation. You are a strong nation. You're a large nation. And you have a very influential nation.

I think the fairness and the benevolence of your attitude is increasing on a daily basis the confidence of other leaders of the world in the Nigerian leaders. It's obvious that in spite of your strength, your relative wealth, your military prowess and force, and the size of your population, you have nothing but a good attitude toward your immediate neighbors and the other countries of Africa.

And it's indeed a reassuring thing for me, as a President of the United States, to have a sense of partnership and an opportunity to have the counsel and advice from the leaders of your great country. We have discussed in the last 2 days some of the most difficult areas of the world, where peace and good will does not exist, but where our influence, combined with yours and others, might correct those defects in the relationship among neighboring peoples.

We've discussed our talks with the Soviet Union. We've discussed our efforts in the Middle East to bring the Israelis and the Arab countries and peoples together for a permanent peaceful settlement. We've talked about the Horn of Africa, where you, again, are playing a leading role. We've discussed Zimbabwe—as General Obasanjo has already described—our efforts and the British efforts jointly, working under the principles of international law and the United Nations, guided by the frontline Presidents, by General Obasanjo and others, to do the right thing in Africa, constantly being reminded of the need for rapid action and learning from you how that rapid action might be ensured. This is very beneficial to us, to you, to all the countries in Africa, indeed, the world.

We've also learned a great deal about the attitude of people in Namibia, your closeness with SWAPO and its leaders, our influence, along with other Western nations, in inducing South Africa to deal fairly with the people in Namibia under the auspices of and in compliance with United Nations resolutions. And our abhorrence of racial prejudice, discrimination, and apartheid has been demonstrated again here, and our strength of commitment against this blemish on Africa has been renewed and strengthened by our discussions with the great Nigerian leaders.

Together, I believe we can bring a change that will make all of us proud in Africa in the months and the years ahead.

The last thing I would like to say is this: The bilateral relationships with your country is of great benefit to the United States. You're one of our most important trading partners. And as I spoke at the Institution on Political Affairs yesterday, the director of that Institute told me afterwards, among the 3,500 or so people there, that more than half of them in the audience had had at least part of their education in the United States. We learn as much from you as you learn from us.

In the field of agriculture, we see a new era of additional consultation, mutual work, mutual learning, mutual benefit. So, the tremendous potential of your country can be used not only to feed your own people but to export to an increasingly hungry world, because land can no longer be wasted, and your tremendous natural resources in land, with which God has blessed you, can be used much more efficiently in the future and will benefit not only us but others who look to you for meeting their growing needs.

We are a great technological nation, highly advanced, and only with the investment of our technology in growing nations like your own can we benefit economically in the future. This is important to us as well.

And, of course, our mutual trade gives our own people a better life, materials which we must have for a good life for American citizens and, in the process, makes it possible for you to prosper again economically.

I'm particularly proud at the personal friendship that has been shown to us by the people of Nigeria. We arrived here in the middle of the night, and we were surprised and deeply moved at the number of average, happy, welcoming Nigerian people who stood along the highway to let us know that they cared for me, cared for the United States and what our Nation stands for. It's an experience which I shall never forget.

And this has been mirrored in countless encounters between myself and your people, my wife Rosalynn and your people, and my little daughter, Amy, and your young people, which has meant so much to us already.

This is a trip that I will never forget the rest of my life. I hope that I might come back again. And I hope that General Obasanjo can continue to share with me his wisdom and his judgment, derived from you, and his knowledge of this great country and this great continent.

In closing, I would like, on behalf of the people of one of the greatest nations on Earth, the United States, to propose a toast to a great leader, General Obasanjo, and to the people of one of the greatest nations on Earth, the people of Nigeria.

NOTE: The exchange began at 9:15 p.m. at the Federal Palace Hotel.

Remarks on Signing the Joint Communiqué. April 2, 1978

GENERAL OBASANJO. I once again would like to take this opportunity to express our honor for this historic visit and the opportunity which we have had during the visit to examine issues of mutual interest to our two countries and issues which have been reflected in the communiqué. Of course, we did have two sessions of discussion, one yesterday and one immediately after the church service today. And we used the opportunity to examine during the first session political issues affecting Africa in particular, and we were able to examine the areas of particular interest—the Horn of Africa, southern Africa, and the aspirations of Africa in general.

Now, in the Horn of Africa, we, as the Chairman of OAU's Good Offices Commission, have been charged with special responsibility of bringing about the conciliation between the two parties, between the two countries, and we have accepted that challenge.

We have taken steps to bring about understanding and reconciliation between Ethiopia and Somalia, and we hope that in a matter of weeks we will be able to achieve some measure of reconciliation, which will at least make peace endure in that part of our continent and which will also make the need for further acquisition of armaments by either side unnecessary, and which will make these two countries, who need economic and crucial improvement of their people, concentrate on these needs. And anybody who wants to help, be that in Africa or from within Africa or from outside Africa, who will channel such help or such assistance through economic and social areas which the people of Somalia and the people of Ethiopia need most.

We, of course, looked at southern Africa, and as the President has rightly said and as I did mention in my short toast—[laughter]—in honor of the President, we have been able to agree on—and in fact all along—agreement on what is bad has not been our problem. We know what is bad, and that we have agreed upon.

We also know what is required. That we agree upon. In terms of how to achieve what is required expeditiously, particularly for us to get going, that I believe that during this visit we have been able to agree on how to get going and thereby bring about what is desirable in Zimbabwe and Namibia.

And also I believe we agreed that the evils of apartheid will not be encouraged. We agreed that apartheid is a policy that must be eradicated. We also agree that it will be not so easy. Therefore, the two of us, working together in areas we can work together and working separately in areas where we have to work separately, we must work to bring about the change of policy in South Africa.

We then moved on from Africa to, politically, to other parts of the world. We considered the Middle East, and we appreciated the efforts which the United States has made and which the United States is making. We support all the efforts that have been made to bring about just and honorable peace in the Middle East. And we will continue to support such effort.

We discussed the East-West, because, as I did say, it is in the interest of the world and definitely in the interest of the developing half of the world that there must be peace in the world. And we believe that there may be no enduring and lasting peace in the world unless there is accommodation between the two great powers of the world.

And we were very delighted to note that substantive effort has gone into the SALT talks, and the progress that has been made is very encouraging.

Then we discussed on the economic side what is called the bilateral relations in this respect between Nigeria and the U.S., between the U.S. and Africa. And we noted with satisfaction the new effort the U.S. Government is making in the direction of providing more money for the African Development Fund. We also note the concern, which is also our concern, of the United States for getting satisfactory new world economic order. And the lack of political will, which seems to have been what has bedeviled the efforts in this direction in the past, seems to have been realized. And there is a definite commitment on the part of our two countries to bring about this, the needed political will, which will have to be brought about not only on our own part but on the part of countries in a different situation, the industrialized and the developed countries, which have the responsibility of President Carter and the United States country and the developing countries, which we will bring as much of our efforts to bear on, countries in the type of position to see the need for us to work together and bring about the political support for working out something at least that will be better than what is now in existence.

These are the areas we have covered, and it is the coverage of these areas that has led to what I believe we have signed. Mr. President, am I right?

THE PRESIDENT. General Obasanjo, that was an excellent summary of the points that have been made and described in the joint communique. This is not a typical communique signed at the end of a visit which has no substance and no meaning. It's been very carefully drafted as a result of what, unfortunately, is the first official visit of any American President to this region of the world.

Nigeria is recognized in this continent and throughout the world as one of the major nations of the modern day. And what they say through their leaders will have a profound impact not only on us, during these discussions, but on governments everywhere, who will study this communique to determine how is it that Nigeria and the United States can agree on a common statement, what are these principles that they espouse, what is the action that they envision for the future.

The first few sentences that General Obasanjo said when I began my discussions with him were, "We are very glad that finally the United States has turned its eyes and its interest and its influence toward Africa, because the principles that are the basis for the American Constitution and Government and people are exactly the principles that Africa needs to study and to adopt whenever possible in our own country and in our own continent."

We have seen common themes go throughout every stop we've made. The overwhelming single two words that describe this theme is "human rights" in all its aspects. And the hunger for freedom, the hunger for liberty, the hunger for individuality, the hunger for a right to be free of oppression, to participate in one's own government, to shape one's own destiny, to have something to eat, a place to live, food to drink, and education for one's children, are deprivations that are deeply felt. And the more that leaders of strong nations can speak out openly and aggressively on these subjects for the poor and deprived and the illiterate and the inarticulate people who can't speak out and have their voices heard, the better off will be the whole world.

I think in every respect that we've discussed—that General Obasanjo has outlined and I won't repeat—to solve the Middle East, Zimbabwe, Namibia, South Africa, there is an abhorrence on our part against the gross abuses of human rights and the threat to world peace.

The last point I would like to make is one that he has referred to several times, including his toast a few minutes ago, and that is our belief that Africans are completely able to resolve their own differences in Africa as it relates to political and military encounters. And the intrusion of outside forces into African disputes can only aggravate them and exaggerate the death and suffering of people in this continent.

Nigeria plays a major role in the Organization of African Unity. That's a proper forum to go to get a resolution of differences that still exist in the Horn of Africa. And the OAU, and the United Nations is a proper forum through which we and the Soviet Union, Great Britain, and other great countries can act from outside Africa to help give aid and support in the resolution of differences. And, of course, on a bilateral basis we can help economically and with trade and a common understanding.

I'm very grateful to have an opportunity to come and meet with these leaders of a great country and to learn from them and to help shape the policies of my own Government and to educate my own people and myself so that we can, with greater dispatch, more enthusiasm, and sounder judgment, remain involved deeply in the growth and prosperity to peace and a better life that is inevitable in the future for the people of Africa.

Thank you very much.

Lagos, Nigeria

Joint Communiqué Issued at the Conclusion of Meetings Between the President and General Obasanjo. April 2, 1978

At the invitation of His Excellency Lt. General Olusegun Obasanjo, Head of the Federal Military Government, Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the Federal Republic of Nigeria, the President of the United States of America, His Excellency Jimmy Carter, and Mrs. Carter paid a State Visit to Nigeria from 31st March to 3rd April, 1978. This visit reciprocated the visit to the United States of America by the Head of the Federal Military Government from 11th to 13th October, 1977. It was the first State Visit by an American President to sub-Saharan Africa, providing President Carter an opportunity to witness firsthand the aspirations, achievements and problems of contemporary Africa.

In the course of the visit, the two Heads of State met in plenary sessions during which they discussed bilateral and international issues.

President Carter and his host, Lt. General Obasanjo, examined extensively the current state of affairs in the African region and devoted particular attention to the situation in Southern Africa.

They were fully agreed on the need for peace and stability in Africa and expressed the hope that a spirit of reconciliation will prevail in those areas of North-West Africa and in the Horn of Africa that are still victims of fratricidal conflicts.

President Carter expressed satisfaction with Nigeria's efforts in its capacity as Chairman of the OAU Good Offices Commission to restore peace between Ethiopia and Somalia. It was agreed that Nigeria should persevere in its efforts to get the parties in the dispute to negotiate a mutually acceptable and therefore durable solution. With the fighting in the Horn of Africa now ended, the two leaders expressed the hope that the remaining problems in that region will be settled by peaceful means.

On Zimbabwe, the two Heads of State expressed support for the Anglo-American proposal and reiterated their conviction that, in the present circumstances, only a settlement which is based on its principles can bring about racial harmony, prosperity and just and lasting peace in Zimbabwe. The two Heads of State agreed that the arrangements made under the Salisbury Agreement of March 3 do not change the illegal character of the present regime and are unacceptable as they do not guarantee a genuine transfer of power to the majority nor take into consideration the views of all the Zimbabwean nationalist groups.

The situation in Namibia was also carefully examined. Lt. General Obasanjo emphasized his Government's full support for SWAPO as the authentic leaders of the people in their just struggle for the genuine independence of Namibia, with its unity, sovereignty and territorial integrity full guaranteed. President Carter stressed the need for a settlement of the Namibian issue which would guarantee that all political groups would have an equal and fair opportunity to compete in free elections in which the people of Namibia would make their own choice about their future government. The two leaders agreed that it is essential for the peace and security of Africa that Namibia achieve its independence on the basis of United Nations Security Council Resolution 385.

They reviewed the current efforts of the Five Power Western Contact Group and discussed the settlement proposal which the five have developed as a means to a prompt and peaceful transition to genuine majority rule in Namibia.

The two Heads of State renewed their condemnation of the evil and oppressive system of apartheid in South Africa. They pledged their joint efforts to work toward the elimination of this system and the establishment of justice, equality and human dignity for all races in South Africa within a free society where all citizens will exercise their democratic rights to install a government of their choice. They appealed to all States to do their part toward the realization of this objective.

The Nigerian Head of State, Lt. General Obasanjo, expressed his Government's strong disappointment at the lack of impact of the many concrete proposals put forward in the past to eradicate the obnoxious system of apartheid. This he ascribed to the inadequacy of the measures adopted as well as the lack of political will on the part of Nations called upon to implement these measures. He noted that some of these Nations have pursued policies of outright collaboration with South Africa, in both military and economic matters. Finally, the Head of State re-emphasized his Government's determination to continue to extend all possible political and material support to the nationalist liberation movements in South Africa, to ensure an early end of the racist minority domination.

President Carter and Lt. General Obasanjo expressed the intention of the United States of America and the Federal Republic of Nigeria, as members of the Security Council, to work closely in the Council in the interest of strengthening international peace and security. They expressed particular approval of the Security Council's prompt action in establishing a United Nations Interim force in Lebanon and pledged their full co-operation to achieve the objectives of the mandate granted by the Security Council.

The two Heads of State exchanged views concerning the situation in the Middle East and deplored the recent violence which occurred in that area. They agreed that it is necessary and urgent to intensify efforts to achieve a just, comprehensive and durable peace based on United Nations Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338. They stressed the importance of withdrawal on all fronts pursuant to Resolution 242 and the resolution of all aspects of the Palestinian question.

The two Heads of State underscored their commitment to the principles of the United Nations Charter, particularly those concerning the importance of human rights in all societies. To this end they cited the importance of strengthening the human rights machinery of the United Nations.

In their review of the International economic situation, the two Heads of State stressed the urgent need for measures to secure a prosperous, just and equitable international economic order. The two leaders placed special emphasis on the importance of close consultations between Nigeria and the United States in the North-South Economic Dialogue and in the work of the General Assembly. They agreed on the value of the United Nations Overview Committee dialogue in enhancing an understanding of global issues of common concern and in promoting development cooperation. They appealed to all nations to strive vigorously for the achievement of the goals specified in the Seventh Special Session of the United Nations General Assembly, in particular with respect to issues of vital importance to the developing countries. In this regard, Lt. General Obasanjo invited attention to the slow pace of progress concerning the establishment of the Common Fund and alleviation of the debt problems of the developing countries. The two Heads of State agreed to cooperate in order to intensify action within the United Nations system towards finding solutions to the problem of global inflation.

The two leaders discussed the United Nations Special Session on Disarmament which opens in May of 1978. As leaders of countries which have played a significant role in United Nations disarmament matters, both Heads of State agreed that the session should provide a stimulus to further concrete disarmament efforts.

The two Heads of State expressed satisfaction at the progress that had been made in recent discussions between the two Governments on bilateral cooperation in economic, commercial and technical fields and agreed to further strengthen relations in these areas. Mutual efforts will be made to expand and diversify trade and development activities and to facilitate investment in areas of key importance to Nigeria's economic growth. For this purpose the two leaders agreed to set up joint working groups on investment and trade, technology transfer, agriculture and rural development, and education.

The President of the United States of America and Mrs. Carter expressed their profound appreciation to Lt. General Obasanjo, the Nigerian Government and all the people of Nigeria for the gracious hospitality afforded to their party during their visit to Nigeria.

The President was impressed by the visible evidence of the pace of Nigerian economic progress and the vigorous and determined efforts being undertaken by the Federal Military Government to provide for the social and economic development of the people of Nigeria.

The President of the United States was accompanied on his visit to Nigeria by Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, National Security Council Advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski, United Nations Ambassador Andrew Young, Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Richard Moose, and a team of senior officials.

His Excellency the Head of State and Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the Federal Republic of Nigeria was attended by Chief of Staff (Supreme Headquarters) Brigadier S. M. Yar'Adua, Commissioner for External Affairs Brigadier J. N. Garba, Commissioner for Petroleum Colonel M. Buhari, Federal Commissioner for Agriculture Mr. B. O. Mafeni, Commissioner for Economic Development Dr. O. Adewoye, and a team of senior officials.

The President's Trip to Africa

Remarks During a Briefing for Reporters on Board Air Force One en Route to Monrovia, Liberia. April 3, 1978

SECRETARY OF STATE VANCE. Why don't we start off by talking about the release which was just issued on the meetings which the United Kingdom and ourselves are going to call on the Rhodesian question.

As we announced this morning, this follows the meetings which the President had with General Obasanjo and which I subsequently had with the foreign ministers of several of the frontline states. As we indicated, there will be two meetings.

The first of the meetings will be with the participants to the Malta Conference, namely, with the leaders of the Patriotic Front, plus the Foreign Ministers of the frontline states and Namibia, who will be invited to attend as well.

That will lead up to an all-parties meeting which we hope to have with all of the parties to the Rhodesian matter.

As to the dates on which these meetings will be held and the exact places, they are being worked out with the respective parties in the capitals. The first meeting, I would hope, would take place around April 15. If that's convenient to all of the parties, that would be convenient for both David Owen and myself and Andy Young, who will be there, and it would also be convenient to the foreign ministers of the frontline states in Namibia.

We have not heard yet whether that will be a convenient date for the leaders of the Patriotic Front, and I also will have to check with the Secretary General tomorrow to see whether General Prem Chand can attend on that date.

Q. Is he head of the OAU?

SECRETARY VANCE. No. Prem Chand is the U.N. Representative who was appointed by the Secretary General to work on the Rhodesian problem and to report back to the Secretary General and the Security Council.

Q. Where would this meeting be, at the U.N.?

SECRETARY VANCE. No. It will be in Africa. The final place of the meeting has not yet been selected. But if I had to guess, I would guess it's going to be in Dar Es Salaam.

Q. That means you will have to go back.

SECRETARY VANCE. That means I'll have to go back.

Q. Shortly?

SECRETARY VANCE. Shortly.

Q. Oh, joy. [Laughter] Strike that. [Laughter]

SECRETARY VANCE. As I say, the invitations are being conveyed to the various parties by the British and American representatives today.

Q. Have you sounded out anyone preliminary to the invitations to see whether they'd accept them or not?

SECRETARY VANCE. I am informed that the leaders of the Patriotic Front have agreed to attend such a meeting and to also attend—

Q. The leaders of the Patriotic Front?

SECRETARY VANCE. And when I say such a meeting, I mean both the meeting, the preliminary meeting with the leaders of the Patriotic Front, and an all-parties meeting as well.

Q. Is Ian Smith and the internal settlement group going to be the toughest nut to crack?

SECRETARY VANCE. Yes. We haven't heard from them, of course, because the invitations to attend such a meeting are merely being extended today, and we haven't heard anything from them yet. And I don't expect to hear from them in the immediate future.

Q. Do you anticipate they'll be the most difficult to get into the meeting?

SECRETARY VANCE. I would think so, yes, because we already heard from the others. We know the others are going to come.

Q. Were invitations to both meetings going out today, Mr. Secretary?

SECRETARY VANCE. Yes.

Q. Is that what you are indicating?

SECRETARY VANCE. They are.

Q. Have you sounded many out at all on the subject?

SECRETARY VANCE. We have not, no. As I say, the invitation will be conveyed to him today.

Q. What is new about this from yesterday?

SECRETARY VANCE. From yesterday, we have now set specific times for the meeting and have confirmed that the Patriotic Front is prepared to attend both sets of meetings, so that we have more specificity on that. We also know that the frontline states will attend both meetings, and that is in addition to what we had yesterday. And now we are getting down to the specifics of how to put it all together and get it going.

Q. What is your thought for a date on the second meeting, then?

SECRETARY VANCE. I would hope—this is just my hope—that it could be around the 25th or 26th of April.

Q. The same place?

SECRETARY VANCE. No. I think it would probably be in another place, but where it would be is still very much up in the air—in Africa, but where, I don't know.

Q. Was there any reason to stress this to Great Britain today?

SECRETARY VANCE. No, no. The British are with us all the way on this.

Q. What are our expectations now as far as Smith and the three internal leaders? Do we expect that they ultimately will come?

SECRETARY VANCE. Well, we certainly hope that they will come, because if one wants to find a way to stop the fighting, then you have to get all of the parties together. And that's everybody's ultimate objective, to have a cease-fire, and then to move on to free elections. And the way to get that is to get all the parties together and have them sit down around the table and agree on the transition arrangements necessary to bring that about, to bring about a cease-fire, and then to move on to elections.

Q. Who else, the transition people and the interim government?

SECRETARY VANCE. Yes, the internal people.

Q. You haven't heard from them either?

SECRETARY VANCE. We have not.

Q. How did you interpret paragraph 5 of page 6—or paragraph 6 of page 5, where General Obasanjo talked about external groups being involved?<sup>1</sup>

SECRETARY VANCE. I interpret that as being a strong statement on his part that it is Africa's desire to settle their own disputes in their own way, and he was merely emphasizing the fact that when outside powers intervene, that this makes the settlement of African disputes more difficult because it gets them involved in the ideological concerns of the great powers. And I think what he's saying, really, quite clearly there is, let the Africans handle their own problems in their own way, and there it specifically refers to the OAU. And it's quite logical that he should emphasize this because Nigeria itself has the responsibility in, for example, the Horn, as the head of the Special Committee which is charged with the responsibility of trying to bring about a peaceful solution of that problem.

Q. Why was not something to that effect included in the communique? I mean, you certainly would've liked that.

SECRETARY VANCE. We didn't press for anything like that in the communique, because they have a special role to play, as they are the head of the mediation group. But I think it's well and that we were very pleasantly surprised to see that on his own he stated this.

Q. He could be talking about the French, Biafra, or us in Angola, as well as the Cubans, too?

SECRETARY VANCE. Yes. I think he's got his general principle. He's stating a general principle which I think he believes in very strongly, that African problems ought to be settled by Africans, and we agree with that.

Q. Did the question specifically of Cubans in the Horn come up?

SECRETARY VANCE. Yes. That was discussed in our conversations with President Obasanjo and his advisers.

Q. But he doesn't seem to be as concerned as we are.

SECRETARY VANCE. I think he should speak for himself on that issue. I think, you know, you have the language as contained in his toast last night, and I would think you could draw your own conclusions from that.

Q. The implication that we got yesterday was that Nigerians had expressed somewhat different views on that, and that specifically they had taken the position that African countries have the right to have whatever relations they want to have with the Soviets and the Cubans. That is what we were told by State Department officials in the backgrounder yesterday.

SECRETARY VANCE. Well, I think that it is true that they believe African countries do have a right to have such arrangements as they want with outside powers, but he is expressing in his toasts his views that, basically, African countries should settle their own problems.

Q. Is it a matter that they think African countries should settle their own problems or they just don't like being told by the United States?

SECRETARY VANCE. I don't think it's the latter.

Q. What is the relationship? This is the primary result of the meeting, isn't it?

SECRETARY VANCE. No. I think that that's one of the important results of the meetings in Nigeria, but I think, also, the discussions which we had on a number of our bilateral matters were of great importance. The trade relationships—

Q. Was there any difference in the 40-60—you know, the 40 percent-60 percent Nigerian management in foreign investment?

SECRETARY VANCE. Well, there are three different sets. Forty-sixty is only one of the various percentages. They have three categories, and the percentage of Nigerian ownership of the local corporations depends upon the importance of that particular industry to Nigeria. And certain ones where it's not that important, then there's a lesser percentage, and it increases in percentage up to a figure of 70 percent in the most critical kind of industries.

Hi, Mr. President. Do you want this seat?

THE PRESIDENT. No, no.

Q. How did you enjoy your trip to Nigeria? We were talking about the results.

THE PRESIDENT. I thought it was a great trip to all three countries so far, much better than we had anticipated in every way. Of course, our ties with Venezuela have been permanent and assured by two former visits between me and President Pérez, but I think the results of the Brazilian trip were more than we had any reason to expect.

The response by the Brazilian Government and people was extraordinary in my opinion, and Nigeria is a country with which we have just entered a new era of consultation, improved trade and diplomatic relations, and obviously it's one of the major new national leaders in the world.

We also enjoyed the trip very much. It was a good experience for us.

Q. There any low points?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I thought the translations—[laughter].

Q. You only have yourself to blame.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. In Nigeria, was very bad.

Q. I've got a question for you.

THE PRESIDENT. I understand that when we get to Liberia, we're going to be having some southern accents instead of British accents.

Q. Listen, I had a little trouble understanding Obasanjo.

THE PRESIDENT. That's British, but you won't have any trouble in Liberia because they still speak with a southern accent.

Q. Which is hotter, Nigeria or a peanut field in Georgia?

THE PRESIDENT. A peanut field in Georgia. [Laughter] I think it was 87 in Washington yesterday.

Q. It was. I talked to my wife last night.

THE PRESIDENT. It was a good trip, though.

Q. You were pleased with your meetings with Obasanjo? You really thought you had some new understandings or anything? We're mainly concerned about this business in the Horn, that they don't seem to put the same emphasis that you do on it.

THE PRESIDENT. I think his comments last night, both when we signed the joint communique and at his toasts, showed that he's very concerned about foreign troop presence in Africa.

I know that Tolbert in Liberia has been even more outspoken on this subject. Mobutu in Zaire is very concerned about increasing Cuban presence in the nations around him. Secretary Vance is much more conversant with the latest developments.

SECRETARY VANCE. The same is true with respect to Senghor and to Houphouët-Boigny, too. They both expressed concern about this.

Q. On Brazil, Mr. President, how do you read the communique statement on human rights, the expression of preoccupation with the subject by General Geisel, in view of the fact that there obviously are deficiencies in the country? Is there a real indication that they're going to return to democracy any time soon?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, there are real deficiencies in our own country as well, but I think if you judge the progress over the last 10 years, it is a matter of some satisfaction on the part of President Geisel.

I was there 6 or 7 years ago, and there was no room for public debate or controversy. The press was very reticent in their criticism of the government. I think Cardinal Arns' ability to speak as freely as he does is all a sign of improvement. The number of political prisoners has been reduced 90 percent. There are still a few.

Q. Do you think General Obasanjo shares your concern? Did you get the impression from your private conversations with him that he shares your concern about the Horn and the Soviets and Cubans there?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. I think that there's a difference in emphasis. Obviously, we don't see everything from the same perspective. He has been deeply concerned, as he expressed to me in months past, that the international borders in Africa be observed rigidly because, as is the case all over the continent, these were arbitrarily drawn by European colonial powers in decades gone by, and for any of those international borders to be changed sets a precedent that concerns all the national leaders in Africa.

So, the invasion of the Ogaden area was of deep concern to him because of that reason. We, of course, joined in with Obasanjo, the frontline presidents, and all others, to urge the Somalis to withdraw. I think that was his main preoccupation.

Our main concern there is the permanence of any Cuban or Soviet military forces in Ethiopia. He shares their concern. But I think the emphasis has been different.

We have a difference in approach to South Africa. I think he would be much more aggressive in total embargo against South Africa. We feel that the interest of southern Africa is best served by the policy that we are now pursuing.

Q. Did he understand the difficulty of your position there?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as I say, I don't think we have any disagreement. I understand his position; he understands mine. We understand that we looked at it from a different perspective, but we honor each other's differences. There's no dispute between us.

He realizes that we had an arms embargo against South Africa before the United Nations acted to impose a worldwide embargo on arms shipments to South Africa.

Q. What did you sense his feelings are on a price increase in OPEC?

THE PRESIDENT. It's obvious that both Nigeria and Venezuela prefer a price increase.

PRESS SECRETARY POWELL. We've only got about an hour to get this wrapped up. It is about 1 hour.

Q. I thought in your speech that you were hinting on stronger action on South Africa if they continued the policy of apartheid.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we are approaching a time of testing of the South African Government's position on Namibia. We don't have a final and definitive answer from them on the United Nations proposal, which we and the other four Western powers on the Security Council are putting forward.

I think if South Africa should reject a reasonable proposal and move unilaterally on Namibia, it would be a serious indication of their unwillingness to comply with the legal position of the United Nations and the rest of the world. This would be one thing that can precipitate a more serious difference between us and South Africa.

MR. POWELL. Thank you all.

REPORTER. Thank you.

Monrovia, Liberia

Remarks of President Carter and President William R. Tolbert, Jr., at the Welcoming Ceremony. April 3, 1978

PRESIDENT TOLBERT. Mr. President, Mrs. Carter, Amy, distinguished ladies and gentlemen, friends:

Just over 30 years ago, Mr. President, on January 27, 1943, another American President transited this land in connection with the victorious Allied effort of World War II.

Liberia's President Edwin James Barclay received President Franklin Delano Roosevelt at that time on an asphalt airstrip of 7,000 feet. In the intervening years, United States-Liberia cooperation has here afforded one of the most modern and expanding civil aviation facilities in West Africa, spanning a reinforced 11,000 feet.

And today, we are deeply honored to pay homage to America's first third-century President who has come in the larger pursuit of permanent peace, of human rights, and of economic justice in our one world; who has come in furtherance of continuing friendship and closer cooperation between the United States of America and the Republic of Liberia.

Standing here beneath the sunny expanse of Africa's skies, we most heartily salute you, Mr. President, Mrs. Carter, Amy, and members of your suite, and with intense warmth, embracingly welcome you on behalf of Mrs. Tolbert, our family, the Government and people of Liberia, to this land of love and liberty by God's command.

Mr. President, by your sincere leadership you are restoring to a weary world, particularly in the troubled Middle East and in Africa, refreshing new hopes of enterprise and prosperity, of liberty and morality.

By your profound example, mankind is beginning to feel again, as Thomas Paine once articulated, I quote, "the power of America to create a happy world," and may I add, free from human oppression, free from human distinction.

By your vision and love, peoples and nations can once more rejoice that the United States still cares, that its actions resound of lasting verities.

Upon this continent where the majority of least developed countries can be found, nature's fury often fuels unyielding economic frustrations upon its people. On this continent where persist heinous repression and racism, hatred and injustice, human beings appealingly demand justice against human cruelty, against brutal violence, and against human indignity.

On this continent of contemporary intrigue and intransigence, bloody assassinations and fratricidal conflicts, armed proxy interventions and potential big-power confrontations tend to postpone freedom and justice and the enjoyment of human rights. These further imperil the solemn pursuit of international peace and security.

In Africa, yea the world, we can sense through your dynamic moral leadership fresh evidences of positive change. This new momentum to enhance mankind was manifested again by your outstanding foreign policy address on Africa, recently delivered in Lagos, Nigeria, for which we heartily commend you. And we earnestly hope that all conditions, both political and economic, which contribute to permanent global reconciliation and lasting partnerships can be sturdily established in the coming years.

In 1943, Liberia stood with America, Mr. President, an unswerving friend and selfless ally, a developing democracy. We are confident today that with closer cooperation and more fulfilling creative United States policies and programs, Liberia can become a more brilliant star of democratic ideals in Africa, a more convincing showpiece of humanistic capitalism and progressive development.

Offering once more our hands in hearty welcome to you, Mr. President, Mrs. Carter, and your entourage, we affirm and pledge our best efforts with you in the global campaign of extending the frontiers of human liberty and advancing the principles of genuine peace and stability.

We will remain one with you, Mr. President, in surmounting the tyranny of energy and in healing the injuries of economic uncertainties.

Ever steadfastly, we pledge our total resources with you in securing the victory we courageously seek over inequity and injustice, over ignorance, disease, and poverty, to the lasting benefit of our children's children and even endless future generations, throughout this our one world.

May Almighty God bless our endeavors and hasteningly bring peace to mankind everywhere.

PRESIDENT CARTER. President Tolbert, distinguished officials of the Liberian Government, members of the diplomatic corps, and America's valued and dear friends, the people of Liberia:

I am very happy to be here in Liberia, a country which is one of America's oldest friends, and to arrive at this historic airfield. During the Second World War, as President Tolbert has described, when it was known simply as Roberts Field, it was a vital link in the supply line to Europe and to North Africa in our common fight for freedom.

Now, reborn as Roberts International Airport, with a new terminal recently opened, it symbolizes the pride, the achievements, and the great potential of your nation.

Liberia was born out of mankind's eternal desire for freedom, and you have achieved it here. The free black people who came from America to this beautiful coastline in the 19th century were determined to build a society which reflected the dignity in their souls and their hope in their hearts. They joined here in Liberia with others who longed for a better life. These two streams united to form the first independent republic in Africa.

During the past century of colonialism, your independence was preserved. And now you can look back with pride on 130 years of uninterrupted independence and freedom, which gives Liberia a respected senior status among the nations of this continent.

Franklin Roosevelt did stop here at the airport in 1943 to meet with President Barclay, but this is the first official state visit of an American President, and it is long overdue. The bonds between our two countries are too strong for such a long period ever to elapse again.

We have been very grateful that you have added to the pleasure and the honor I feel in arriving here by declaring today a national holiday. It's a national holiday in my heart, as well.

Our friendly relationship is of great mutual advantage and exists on many levels—in the intertwining of our histories, in the democratic tradition established in our own Constitutions, and in the similarity in our forms of government. It exists in education, in trade, and religion. It was perhaps most meaningful in what President Tolbert has called the "war against ignorance, disease, and poverty."

The American people are proud to join Liberians in this effort through bilateral relationships between our two countries and in multilateral programs involving many countries. Our two Governments agree that these should be directed toward improving the basic conditions of life for those who most need help.

In coming to Liberia, I am reaffirming a friendship that is very old, but I am also drawing to a close a series of visits that reflect a world that is new. Less than three decades from now, four-fifths of all the world's people will live in Africa, Asia, and Latin America—in the sorts of developing nations that I have visited this year.

Only three decades ago, many nations of these continents were largely colonies of foreign powers. Their rise to independence means a world in which we must treat each other as equals. And one of the purposes of these trips has been to demonstrate the genuine respect my Nation feels for its partners around the world and our opposition to the continuation or reestablishment of colonialism in any form whatsoever.

The world economy has changed, bringing the hope of economic improvement and justice to millions and making each of us far more dependent than ever before on the cooperation of our neighbors.

If we create a world economy of fairness and growth, our mutual well-being will be ensured. If we are shortsighted and let inequality, selfishness, and injustice persist, all of us will suffer.

Even the ideas that motivate mankind have been changing. The traditional rivalry between East and West continues, even as we try to reduce the competition and expand the areas of potential cooperation.

But other visions, those of national identity, of self-determination, of racial equality, of the individual rights of all human beings, rise more and more to dominate the human horizon.

It is indeed a new world, and I would like to reemphasize briefly the three themes that dominate our vision of this new age.

The first is economic justice, both among the nations of the world and for those within each nation who now lack the material requirements for a decent life.

Economic justice imposes a special obligation on nations like my own, which have resources to share with the rest of the world. This is a responsibility we intend to honor. But sustaining the world economy is ultimately a shared responsibility in which every nation must do its part.

The second element is a respect for human rights—the right to be treated properly by one's own government, to be able to participate in the decisions that affect one's own life, to have the basic human requirements of food, shelter, health, and education.

If there is any development that has heartened me in my time as President, it is the extent to which the cause of human rights has taken its rightful place on the agenda and in the conscience of the world. This is a cause that the United States and Liberia are proud to claim as our birthright. But we know that it is now spreading, not because of our efforts but because the times demand it.

The third element on which all our other hopes eventually depend is a search for peace.

My Nation has now, as it has had for the last 30 years, a responsibility to work constantly for peace with its powerful rivals. But in this new age, the search for peace leads in other directions as well. It means relying on mutual conciliation, negotiation, discussion of even the most intractable and difficult international issues.

In this area your own President Tolbert's philosophy of conciliation and moderation has been an outstanding example. It marks him as a man with a profound understanding of human nature and a firm commitment to preventing potential conflicts through wise and just agreements.

We share with you a commitment to an Africa that is at peace, an Africa free from colonialism, an Africa free from racism, an Africa free from military interference by outside nations, and an Africa free from the inevitable conflicts that arise when the integrity of national boundaries is not respected.

And the search for peace means anticipating changes that must inevitably come, such as those in southern Africa, so that they can come peacefully, rather than with their pent-up tensions erupting into violence.

These are the goals America is pursuing, and I am looking forward to discussing them with one of Africa's leading statesmen, your own President Tolbert.

His idealism, his determination, and his energy have won widespread admiration in Africa, in America, and around the world. His recent statesman-like sponsorship of the reconciliation summit gathering of West African heads of state, here in Monrovia, has helped to inaugurate a new era of cooperation among these nations for the good of all.

Next year he will be hosting, and will become a major leader of, the Organization of African Unity here in Monrovia. He has worked tirelessly for national self-determination, racial justice, and a better life for all the people of the African Continent.

As we go now together to Monrovia, we will in a sense close the circle that has opened between our people more than a century and half ago.

On behalf of the people of the great Nation of the United States, I would like to say to the people of the great nation of Liberia, this is a journey which is a privilege for me to make.

Thank you very much.

Monrovia, Liberia

PRESIDENT TOLBERT. Mr. President, we deeply share your benign concern for the human family—that its members should not be disgraced by racism, oppression, and repression—from mutual understanding and respect for our fundamental pedestals to the attainment of permanent peace. But in southern Africa, evidences lead one to conclude that the ugly cranium of apartheid is intent on the course of dangerous self-perpetuation. And the scenario of its mischievous maneuvers is protracted, unproductive talks, brutal murders and assassinations, resulting in almost irreparable chaotic upheavals and deep internal divisions.

The heinous hammer of repression must be stayed in all nations of the world, of whatever description. Indeed, Mr. President, in southern Africa, where racial bigotry and minority rule defy and deny human dignity and basic freedoms, the conscience of mankind is being terrorized into desperation.

In this, we would urge a positive American policy of creativity which would inhibit, rather than prevent or bewail, the occurrences of external subversion and armed intervention, particularly between proxies of the super powers.

World opposition to apartheid must be more resolute and positive. Full and legal transition to majority rule and multi-racial accords must follow from more consistent, speedy, and dynamic initiatives.

We deeply share your concern for the well-being of civilization as a whole, that it should not mercilessly fall beneath the increasing burden of destructive weaponry and economic exploitation, but rise to lift the heavy loads of development, for the armaments of peace are at once the premise of progress and widespread productivity.

We would welcome a more positive approach to the implementation of deferred decisions regarding improved trade and aid among nations, at better terms and a more valuable composition, at new levels and rewarding benefits.

The gulf between privilege and deprivation can be narrowed in Third World countries as industrial capacities are established, as rural, traditional agriculture is transformed by modern metals.

Beyond the periscope of infamy in southern Africa lies the periphery of fertile, potential, and productive cooperation across this continent.

There is the persistent realization that Africa can benefit tremendously by significantly closer cooperation and greater economic aid.

In this connection, we would urgently suggest a policy of concentration and impact in an area like rural agriculture, particularly in labor-scarce economy. Perhaps one commodity or a few commodities could be selected for productive transformation and be made the objective of intensive capital and managerial assistance; channeled through a corporate entity, will spread effects to a constellation of small farmers.

This may alter what moves in trade, but it could change the living of millions through the exchange of more capital goods as well as technical assistance. And it could thoroughly magnetize other countries towards the fruit of peace and productivity, towards material necessities and spiritual indispensables.

Let us see the challenge not so of controversy, but let us fulfill in Africa the challenge of humanity and the promise of developing democracy, to ship them and to make them vibrant examples of international peace, human rights, and economic justice.

Mr. President, in over 130 years of Liberia's independence, you are the first United States President ever to visit our capital city of Monrovia, named for another American leader, President James Monroe. And we sincerely wish that you will be first to return and abide with us for a much longer period.

Mr. President, you have called for close cooperation among the rural, industrial democracies of the world. Mindful of Liberia's intractable commitment to the community of the free, we are gratified that you, in the spirit of interdependence, are fostering by this visit strong cooperation between the powerful nations of the First World and the small democracies of the Third World.

Mr. President, we consider this visit an all too brief one. Albeit, it brightens the horizon of our hopes that the flower of more sublime friendship, greater cooperation, and development will emerge from the seeds we sow today.

We'll be content when there is more in Africa, the real spirit and meaning of United States-Liberia unique and special ties. We'll be truly satisfied in mutual, enthusiastic endeavors to make our example of democracy in Africa a clear, magnetic, and convincing one.

Mr. Secretary of State, Dr. Brzezinski, visiting guests, officials of government, friends: May I ask you to rise and raise your glasses with me and drink lustily to the success and continued well-being of our great and good friend, the President of the United States of America, and to the ever-accelerating cooperation between the great United States of America and the Republic of Liberia.

To President Jimmy Carter.

PRESIDENT CARTER. President Tolbert and distinguished leaders of the great country of Liberia, whose very name reminds us of the commitment that you have espoused through a century and a half and more, a commitment to individual human freedom and to the liberty of the human soul:

As you know, my own Nation suffered during the time of the War Between The States as we struggled to achieve equality of opportunity and freedom for all our people. And the example that you have set in Africa has indeed been inspirational not only to us in the United States but also to others in this continent who have seen the stability and the enlightened leadership provided from your great country.

I've also known and admired your President, President Tolbert, long before I became President of the United States, even before I became Governor of Georgia.

As a Baptist, he was recognized in religious circles as a preeminent person in our denomination. As president of the Baptist World Alliance, he again showed the commitment to equality of opportunity among all people. He was the first black man who ever honored Baptists by serving as our leader. And during that time when he was a religious leader, he was also Vice President of your country, and he combined the knowledge of his frequent travels throughout Liberia, to the most distant recesses of your country, with his travels around the world, to shape his own mind and his own heart toward better service for you and for his fellow men even to today.

I noticed the first sign as we rounded the corner coming from the airport taught us something in America. It said, "No joke, no imported rice in 1980." [Laughter] I'm going to take this message back to Dr. James Schlesinger in our country and have a slogan, "No joke, no imported oil in the future, because we're going to do a good job on energy." But I noticed that as we rode in, and he gave me a very instructive presentation of the problems and opportunities, the achievements and the challenges of your country, how much he knew intimately and personally about the needs of the average citizen in Liberia, who's not yet been blessed adequately.

The President tells me that he grows his own rice now, and he not only has enough for his own family but he shares it with his neighbors. And this spirit of self-sufficiency, even in the face of poverty in some parts of your country, is indeed again an inspiration to us.

I've had a chance to talk to him briefly about some of the other problems in Africa.

As black men struggle, black women struggle to achieve the right to shape their own lives, to choose their own government, to manage their own future—we've not reached this goal in your continent. And in Zimbabwe, in Namibia, in South Africa, we share a common hope of majority rule of freedom of expression of one's own will in shaping the family and the human life, and a freedom from racial discrimination, apartheid in all its heinous aspects.

I think that you all recognize, as a very close friend of the United States, that our intimate involvement in using our influence in Africa in a beneficial way has been a recent development. It's not an initiative of mine or other leaders of our country who came before me. I think it's a true expression of the growing interest that existed in the hearts and the minds of American citizens before Government leaders accurately represented what our people truly wanted.

The black citizens of the United States have reminded those of us who happen to be white of a need and the opportunities for us here. It's not been a matter of the United States doing a favor to the people of Africa. It's a matter of the United States acting in its own best interests, because we know, now and in the future, that our economic well-being, the political stability of the world, the peace that we all desire and cherish, can only come with a stable, free, and independent Africa and—as your President has just so wisely said—free of interference of military or other nature from outside forces or from their proxies.

This is especially true today in Angola, in the Horn of Africa, where we want to see outside military forces and outside influence depart, because we are convinced, as are you, that the people of Africa are completely capable and have the desire to shape their own affairs and need no outside help, except in a mutual bargaining position related to economic development, better health care, better education, better housing, better food, better clothing for the people here.

I might add one other point. I think it's also true, if President Tolbert would forgive my saying so, that he is now beginning to enjoy a much more profound influence in the affairs of the continent of Africa. His leadership qualities are now being recognized by others. And with this vigor that is being shown here in Liberia, the beneficial influence of your societal structure and your deep commitment to the basic human rights values can be of additional help to other struggling nations not nearly so blessed as yours with the long history of commitment to freedom.

I think it was a superb exhibition of leadership recently when, under President Tolbert's leadership here in your capital of Monrovia, the leaders of almost enemy nations, ones who had not had a peaceful relationship with one another, were brought together, the West African nations, and left this meeting with a new public commitment to resolve their differences peacefully, and not in a spirit of animosity or distrust or hatred.

This was a superb demonstration of regional leadership. And if my information is correct, when the Organization of African Unity meets here next year, your leader will be blessed again and Africa will be blessed again with a new, additional assignment that will let the good influence of Liberia be felt and also recognized throughout this continent. We look forward to that bright prospect with a great deal of interest and appreciation.

I might say that the most memorable experience of a very fine trip for us was the overwhelming welcome of your people this morning.

In a nation with less than 2,000 total inhabitants, only about 20 percent of whom live here in the seacoast area, I was amazed at the number of people who came forward to express a welcome to us all. And my only question is, where did they all come from? And who was doing the work in Liberia today while all your people came to make us feel welcome? It was an overwhelming experience, and I could tell in the gestures that they made and in the friendship on their faces that they, like the people of the United States, recognize the historic warmth that has existed between our countries, the mutual advantage that comes from this strong friendship, and the prospect of an even stronger and deeper and brighter friendship in the months and the years ahead.

I would like to propose a toast at this time. On behalf of the people of the United States, I would like to propose a toast to your great leader, President Tolbert, and to the wonderful people of the great nation of Liberia.

The President's Trip to Latin America and Africa

*Remarks on Arrival at the White House.
April 3, 1978*

THE VICE PRESIDENT. Mr. President, if you'll pay attention here—[laughter]—

Mr. President, Rosalynn, Amy, we're delighted to welcome you home after a most successful journey to Latin America and to Africa.

Mr. President, this afternoon's papers featured a dramatic, front-page photograph of you, from Africa, with hand raised and four fingers extended. An interdepartmental task force was convened to determine what it meant. [Laughter] It returned with a split opinion. A few said that you were confirming the number of countries that you had visited, but most thought you were telling me to hold my remarks below 4 minutes, and I shall do so. [Laughter]

Mr. President, your trip to Venezuela, to Brazil, Nigeria, and Liberia underscored your desire to cooperate more closely with the newly influential countries of Latin America, Africa, and Asia. And certainly the marvelous demonstration of affection witnessed by all of us in Monrovia today showed their desire for that same friendship and cooperation with us.

On your trip you once again reemphasized the fundamental American values of human rights, of individual liberty, majority rule, and economic justice.

Mr. President, we are delighted by the success of your journey and pleased to welcome you home again with us. Welcome back.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as the Vice President said, this has been a good trip. But it's been a long trip, and we're glad to be home.

I said when I left this spot last week that the trip was designed to show our own great Nation's adaptation to a changing world. And in that way it has been a great success, I think, for the United States.

In Venezuela we strengthened our good relationship which has existed for a long time with that country. And we worked with Venezuela to develop a more cooperative approach for the future between the industrialized, developed nations like our own and the poor nations of the world.

In Brazil, one of our close allies over the years, we reestablished the understanding of the long-term, common interests and friendship between our people. And we stressed, perhaps in different ways, our mutual concern about nuclear nonproliferation and human rights.

In Nigeria, a great, new, emerging leader and the most populous nation in Africa, we brought our relationship to the best point ever and showed our essential agreement about the troubled spots in Africa.

And in Liberia, the oldest democracy in Africa and an ancient ally of ours, we reaffirmed a very special friendship for a nation that was founded in the name of freedom, as was our own country.

This trip and the one I made 3 months ago demonstrate our Nation's preparation for dealing with the world of the future. The countries that I have visited in Africa and Asia, in Latin America, in the Middle East will be more and more important to us with every passing year. We must be sure that we understand their interests and that they understand ours.

After seeing these nations firsthand, it's impossible to doubt that they can be very important to us and that our fate and the fate of the people in those countries are closely related and that the best way to guarantee our own well-being in a world of peace and prosperity, respect for individual human rights, is to cooperate in the well-being of these friends and neighbors of ours throughout the Earth. Every step we take toward more constructive engagement around the world is an investment in our own future.

And, most of all, I was proud as an American at the warmth of our reception. I think the day of the so-called ugly American is over. I never saw, among the hundreds of thousands of people who welcomed us, a single gesture or sign or poster or indication of anything except friendship. This is quite different from what it has been in the past. The friendly crowds that greeted us everywhere showed an affection for the United States, based not so much on our country's power or even our accomplishments but on what we stand for in the world.

At every stop in this journey I said to the people there that I was coming to greet a great nation, which was true. But nothing makes me prouder than the truly great Nation it is my privilege to represent.

Thank you very much. It's good to be home.

NOTE: The exchange began at 9:40 p.m. on the South Lawn of the White House.

National Advisory Committee for Women

Executive Order 12050. April 4, 1978

ESTABLISHING A NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR WOMEN

By virtue of my authority as President of the United States of America, and in order to promote equality for women in the cultural, social, economic and political life of this Nation, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. Establishment of a National Advisory Committee for Women. There is established a National Advisory Committee for Women (hereafter the Committee).

SEC. 2. Membership. The President shall appoint not more than thirty individuals to serve on the Committee and shall designate one member to chair the Committee.

SEC. 3. Responsibilities of the Committee. (a) The Committee shall advise the President on a regular basis of initiatives needed to promote full equality for American women.

(b) The Committee shall assist in reviewing the applicability of such initiatives, including recommendations of the 1977 National Women's Conference, to particular programs and policies.

(c) The Committee shall promote the national observance of the United Nations Decade for Women, Equality, Development and Peace (1975-1985).

(d) The Committee shall gather and disseminate information relating to its responsibilities.

(e) The Committee shall consult regularly with the Interdepartmental Task Force established in Section 6.

SEC. 4. Committee Procedures. (a) The Committee may establish, within the limits of available funds, such working groups as may be necessary to fulfill its tasks. The membership of such groups may include persons not members of the Committee.

(b) The Committee shall establish such procedural regulations as are necessary to carry out its responsibilities.

(c) The Committee shall conclude its work by March 1, 1980, and shall make a final report to the President.

SEC. 5. Assistance and Cooperation. The Committee may request any agency of the Executive Branch of the government to furnish it with such information, advice, funds and services as may be useful for the fulfillment of the Committee's functions under this Order. Such agencies are authorized, to the extent permitted by law, to honor the Committee's requests.

SEC. 6. *Interdepartmental Task Force. The head of each agency within the Executive Branch shall designate persons responsible for reviewing the applicability of initiatives designed to promote full equality for American women, including recommendations of the 1977 National Women's Conference, to the agency's programs and policies. Persons so designated shall constitute the Interdepartmental Task Force, which shall consult regularly with the Committee. The President shall designate a person to chair the Task Force.

SEC. 7. *Federal Advisory Committee Act Functions. Notwithstanding the provisions of any other Executive Order, the functions of the President under the Federal Advisory Committee Act (5 U.S.C. App. I) which are applicable to the Committee, except that of reporting annually to the Congress, shall be performed by the Secretary of Labor in accordance with guidelines and procedures established by the Administrator of General Services.

SEC. 8. *Revocations. Executive Order No. 11126, as amended, and Executive Order No. 11832, as amended, are revoked.

International Joint Commission— United States and Canada

Nomination of Robert J. Sugarman To Be a U.S. Commissioner. April 4, 1978

The President announced today that he will nominate Robert J. Sugarman, of Philadelphia, to be a Commissioner on the part of the United States on the International Joint Commission—United States and Canada. He would replace Henry P. Smith III, who has resigned.

Sugarman was born May 29, 1938, in Meriden, Conn. He received an A.B. degree from Brown University in 1960. In 1961 he attended Stanford University, and in 1964 he received an LL.B. degree from Harvard Law School.

He served as law clerk to Honorable Abraham L. Freedman, U.S. Court of Appeals, from 1965 to 1966. From 1966 to the present, he has been a partner in the law firm of Dechert Price and Rhoads, in Philadelphia.

From 1970 to 1972, Sugarman was a lecturer on environmental law at the Free Law School of Philadelphia, and from 1975 to 1976, he was legal consultant to the National Water Quality Commission.

He has been a member of the board of directors and executive committee of the Public Law Center of Philadelphia since 1975, and since 1976 he has been a member of the board of directors of Community Legal Services, Inc. He is a member of the executive committee of the Philadelphia Council for Community Advancement and of the Transportation Action Group.

Fair Housing Month, 1978

Message of the President. April 4, 1978

Discrimination in housing is forbidden by Title VIII of the 1968 Civil Rights Act, the National Fair Housing Law. Freedom in the choice of housing is a promise deeply rooted in American history and tradition.

Yet, today, ten years after passage of the National Fair Housing Law, many Americans still experience discrimination when they attempt to purchase or rent or finance a home or apartment for themselves or their family. Some of us—whether through fear or prejudice or superstition or through plain selfishness—still attempt to limit the freedoms of other Americans.

Unless we can overcome these limitations, we will be unable to meet the challenges we face as a people. The denial of equal housing opportunity is a serious impediment to the cooperative, harmonious sense of community and brotherhood we need to meet our problems head on.

As we commemorate this tenth anniversary of the passage of the National Fair Housing Law, I call upon those in Federal, State and local government—and all who are directly involved in the housing industry and real estate profession—to intensify those efforts that promote fair housing. I hope this step will be followed by like-minded actions on the part of all Americans. The freedoms that we believe in, enjoy and benefit from cannot be secure unless they are shared by all Americans. As long as equal opportunity is denied to one person, the promise of equality for all will be unfulfilled.

During this April commemoration of Fair Housing Month, let us not just celebrate the passage of a benchmark law, but let us determine to put fully into practice the principles for which it stands. Let us make ourselves aware of the ways in which this law applies to us and to our communities. And let us earnestly examine both personal and professional attitudes that might be a barrier to equal opportunity for others. Nothing could be more important to the future of our society.

Alloy Tool Steel Imports

MODIFICATION OF TEMPORARY QUANTITATIVE LIMITATIONS ON THE IMPORTATION INTO THE UNITED STATES OF CERTAIN ARTICLES OF ALLOY TOOL STEEL

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

1. Proclamation No. 4445, of June 11, 1976, as modified by Proclamation No. 4477 of November 16, 1976, and Proclamation No. 4509 of June 15, 1977, imposed quantitative restrictions on the importation of certain articles of specialty steels. Section 203(h)(4) of the Trade Act of 1974 (the Trade Act) (19 U.S.C. 2253(h)(4)) permits the President to reduce or terminate any such relief if, after taking into account advice received from the United States International Trade Commission (USITC) and after seeking advice from the Secretaries of Commerce and Labor, the President determines that the reduction or termination is in the national interest.

2. I have sought and received advice from the USITC and from the Secretaries of Commerce and Labor concerning the effects of reducing or terminating import relief provided by Proclamation No. 4445, as modified by Proclamation No. 4477 and Proclamation No. 4509, on steel provided for in item 923.26 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (TSUS). I have determined, after considering that advice, that the exclusion of certain steels provided for in item 923.26 of the TSUS, known as chipper knife steel and band saw steel, from such quantitative restrictions is in the national interest.

3. Accordingly, the purpose of this proclamation is to terminate in part Proclamation No. 4445 of June 11, 1976, as modified by Proclamation No. 4477 of November 16, 1976, and Proclamation No. 4509 of June 15, 1977, so as to exclude so-called chipper knife steel and band saw steel provided for in item 923.26, TSUS, from the present quantitative restrictions for the remainder of the restraint period which began on June 14, 1977 and the entire restraint period beginning on June 14, 1978, and to make an appropriate reduction in the quota quantities for item 923.26, TSUS, applicable to the European Economic Community and Sweden for the restraint period beginning June 14, 1978 to reflect the exclusion of so-called chipper knife steel and band saw steel. The authority for this action is set forth in section 203 (h) (4) (19 U.S.C. 2253(h)(4)), and section 125(b) (19 U.S.C. 2134(b)) of the Trade Act.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, acting under the authority vested in me by the Constitution and the statutes of the United States, including sections 125 and 203 of the Trade Act (19 U.S.C. 2135 and 2253, respectively), do proclaim that—

A. Subpart A, part 2, of the Appendix to the TSUS (19 U.S.C. 1202) is modified as follows:

(1) by modifying headnote 2(a) (iii) to read as follows:

“(iii) The term ‘alloy tool steel’ in item 923.26 refers to alloy steel which contains the following combinations of elements in the quantity, by weight, respectively indicated:

not less than 1.0% carbon and over 11.0% chromium; or not less than 0.3% carbon and 1.25% to 11.0% inclusive chromium; or not less than 0.85% carbon and 1% to 1.8% inclusive manganese; or

0.9% to 1.2% inclusive chromium and 0.9% to 1.4% inclusive molybdenum; or not less than 0.5% carbon and not less than 3.5% molybdenum; or not less than 0.5% carbon and not less than 5.5% tungsten;

but does not include the three following types of alloy tool steel which contain, in addition to iron, each of the specified elements by weight in the amounts indicated:

(1) carbon: not less than 0.95 nor more than 1.13 percent; manganese: not less than 0.22 nor more than 0.48 percent; sulfur: none, or not more than 0.03 percent; phosphorus: none, or not more than 0.03 percent; silicon: not less than 0.18 nor more than 0.37 percent; chromium: not less than 1.25 nor more than 1.65 percent; nickel: none, or not more than 0.28 percent; copper: none, or not more than 0.38 percent; molybdenum: none, or not more than 0.09 percent; or

(2) carbon: not less than 0.48 nor more than 0.55 percent; manganese: not less than 0.20 nor more than 0.50 percent; silicon: not less than 0.75 nor more than 1.05 percent; chromium: not less than 7.25 nor more than 8.75 percent; molybdenum: not less than 1.25 nor more than 1.75 percent; tungsten: none, or not more than 1.75 percent; vanadium: not less than 0.20 nor more than 0.55 percent; or

(2) by inserting “3,167” and “8,295” in lieu of the existing quota quantities applicable to the European Economic Community and Sweden, respectively, in the quota quantity column headed June 14, 1978, for item 923.26.

B. The modifications of subpart A of part 2 of the Appendix to the TSUS, made by this proclamation, shall be effective as to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption on and after the second day following the date of publication of this proclamation in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this fifth day of April, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

Joint Chiefs of Staff

Nomination of Gen. David C. Jones To Be Chairman, Gen. Lew Allen, Jr., To Be Chief of Staff of the Air Force, and Adm. Thomas B. Hayward To Be Chief of Naval Operations. April 5, 1978

The President today announced the nomination of Gen. David C. Jones, U.S. Air Force, as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. General Jones would succeed Gen. George S. Brown, U.S. Air Force, whose second term in that office ends June 30, 1978. The Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff serves at the pleasure of the President for a term of 2 years, and may be reappointed. He is the Nation's highest ranking military officer.

General Jones, since 1974, has been Chief of Staff of the United States Air Force and a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The President also announced two other nominations to the Joint Chiefs of Staff. To succeed General Jones as Chief of Staff of the United States Air Force, he nominated Gen. Lew Allen, Jr., U.S. Air Force. General Allen is currently serving as Vice Chief of Staff of the Air Force.

To be Chief of Naval Operations, the President nominated Adm. Thomas B. Hayward, U.S. Navy. Admiral Hayward at the present time is Commander in Chief, U.S. Pacific Fleet. Admiral Hayward will succeed Adm. James L. Holloway III.

The Chief of Staff of the Air Force and the Chief of Naval Operations each serve at the pleasure of the President for a term of 4 years.

Jones was born in Aberdeen, S. Dak., on July 9, 1921. He attended the University of North Dakota and Minot State College until the outbreak of World War II. He entered the Army Air Corps, beginning aviation cadet training in April 1942 and receiving his commission in February 1943.

Jones' assignments have included operational and command positions in bomber, tanker, training, and tactical fighter units, as well as service in staff positions in the Strategic Air Command and Headquarters U.S. Air Force. He was assigned to a bombardment squadron during the Korean War and accumulated more than 300 hours on missions over North Korea. In 1969 he served in Vietnam as Deputy Commander for Operations and then as Vice Commander of the 7th Air Force. He has also served as inspector, operator, planner, and Commander in Chief of United States Air Forces in Europe (USAFE). Concurrent with duty as Commander in Chief, USAFE, Jones was Commander of the 4th Allied Tactical Air Force. Since 1974 he has been Chief of Staff of the United States Air Force.

Allen was born September 30, 1925, in Miami, Fla. He graduated from the U.S. Military Academy, West Point, in 1946, with a B.S. degree and commission as a second lieutenant. He was assigned to Strategic Air Command from 1946 to 1950, and then received an M.S. (1952) and Ph. D. (1954) from the University of Illinois in physics.

From 1954 to 1957, he was assigned to Los Alamos Scientific Laboratory, where he served as a physicist. From 1957 to 1961, he was science advisor to the Physics Division of the Air Force Weapons Laboratory, and from 1961 to 1965, he served in the Space Technology Office of the Director of Defense Research and Engineering. From 1965 to 1973, he was assigned to the Office of the Secretary of the Air Force, serving at the Directorate of Special Projects in Los Angeles and at the Pentagon. In 1973 he became Director, National Security Agency/Chief, Central Security Service at Fort Meade, Md. In August 1977 he became Commander of the Air Force Systems Command at Andrews Air Force Base. Since earlier this year he has been Vice Chief of Staff of the Air Force.

Hayward was born May 3, 1924, in Glendale, Calif. He entered the U.S. Naval Academy in 1943 and graduated in 1947 as an ensign. He has served as a pilot and as commanding officer of a fighter squadron. He has also served as Commanding Officer of the U.S.S. Grafias and the U.S.S. American. From 1970 to 1971, he was Commander of the Hawaiian Sea Frontier and Commandant of the 14th Naval District. From 1971 to 1973, he was Director of the Office of Program Appraisal in the Office of the Secretary of the Navy and from 1973 to 1975, he was Director of Navy Program Planning in the Office of the Chief of Naval Operations. From 1975 to 1976, he was Commander of the Seventh Fleet. Since 1976 he has been Commander in Chief of the U.S. Pacific Fleet.

First of all, let me say that I feel like I'm among friends and among partners. I've had this feeling ever since I have been involved in politics. And I had it strengthened in 1975, when I was with you in San Diego at your convention. A lot of you were there. It was when I was lonely and searching for friends. And I reached out my hand and you took it, and you helped me in Florida and all the succeeding primaries. I won't forget Texas.

You helped me during the general election, and I particularly thank you, since I have been President and living in this house, that you've helped me even more as the leader of our country.

On behalf of myself and Rosalynn, our entire family, I want you to know that you're welcome, you're part of our family, and you belong here as much as we do. Thank you for coming this afternoon.

We also share something else. You were born in October; so was I. You were born 40 years ago. Well—[laughter]—well, we're not exactly the same on everything. But I know that this last year, because you are a part of our Nation which is enlightened and progressive and concerned about the essence of our country, you represent democratic principles in all their finest aspects. You are respected and trusted throughout the country in your own local communities as an organization, on Capitol Hill, and throughout places where decisions are made.

This is a great tribute to you. Last year, when I came into office in January, we had almost a 9 percent, over 8 percent unemployment rate. We had a 9, 10 percent inflation rate. With your help and with the help of the fine Democratic Congress on the Hill, we were able to put into law some very effective programs that were able to cut down unemployment much more than we had anticipated. We created a net of 4.1 million new jobs in the United States. It was a great achievement. You helped me with it. And I would not have been able to get this bill through the Congress, the Congress would not have been able to pass it, without your help.

You also were effective in giving me the right to reorganize the structure of Government. And we are trying to do that now on a 3-year program that will be effective in helping all of you:

We were able to create a new Energy Department, to introduce energy legislation. You've worked hard at the progress we've made. We've got three out of our five major bills. We're on the verge of getting our fourth one. Following that will be the last one. This will do a great deal to strengthen our country's economy, to hold down the inflation rate, to restrict our unwarranted imports of oil, and although it doesn't affect your jobs directly, it affects you as American citizens and as human beings. And your constructive help has been a crucial element in the progress we've made already.

You've helped me with international affairs, in learning how we could reach out our hands to new friends around the world, to countries who in the past we had ignored and who will comprise in the coming years an extremely influential element in international matters that will affect the lives and the well-being of every single American. And your vision in stretching beyond this country even has been a very beneficial element of my administration.

You've helped me to get through the Senate the first of the two Panama Canal treaties. I need your help on the next one. I believe you and I together can prevail.

Now I particularly need your help to get other major legislative proposals through. One of the most important is labor law reform. We need it, we're going to get it. The House passed this legislation with your help, with over a hundred-vote margin. It's not going to be easy in the Senate, we're going to have to work together, but I believe that together we can prevail again.

We also need to put into effect the tax reform package that we put forward to the Congress. We need a $16½ billion tax reduction for the American citizens. You can certainly use it. All your neighbors can use it, and that's part of the package. We need to inspire business to expand to make available additional jobs. I personally have never seen why some of the privileges in the tax laws ought not to be eliminated. I see no reason for a telephone operator or a supervisor or a person who works with their hands to pay for a three-martini lunch for some bigshot business executive, $50 a day—[ap- plause]. This has been part of our tax law too long, and I see no reason either for the tax privileges that have in the past encouraged American businesses to transfer American jobs overseas when we still need the jobs here in our own country. So I need your help with that.

The other thing I would like to mention specifically, and there are a lot of things that I could mention, is we're going to have to do something about inflation. We've had superb good fortune and great progress in cutting down on the unemployment rate. We're going to make some more progress this year.

We've already reached the point at the second month in this year that we had set as a goal for ourselves at the end of 1978. But the inflation rate is creeping up. And unless we all stand firm, cut out waste, have a sound economy, stabilize the dollar, have the energy package passed, cut out unnecessary spending, and hold down the budget deficit, we're going to all be robbed of the improvements we've made with your help this last year.

I would like to say one more thing to you. I've given you a lot of credit, which you deserve, but I think a major part of the credit that the Communication Workers of America has earned is because of the superb leadership of Glenn Watts.

As I said before, you are a progressive union, and he's a progressive leader. You are an enlightened union, and he's an enlightened leader. You are a union that's unselfish, that tries to get benefits for people in our country who are not members of your own organization, and that's the kind of man he is. You are an effective group, and he's an effective leader. You are American citizens who represent the finest aspect of what our country has been, is, and can be to an even greater degree in the future, and he accurately represents that in his own leadership role. He's a kind man, a gentleman, an effective man, and a tough negotiator, as you know, and a good, competent friend to have.

It's with a great deal of honor that I stand here on this small podium with one of my best personal friends who had confidence in me very early, who sets high demands on my own performance of duty as President, who's never satisfied with mediocrity or halfway reaching of very high goals. I look on him as a counselor, as a constructive critic, as someone who supports me when I'm right, and is not afraid to criticize me when I'm wrong. And he is valuable to you; he's valuable to me; he's valuable to our country. So, together you represent the kind of friends and partners I need, I like, and I appreciate from the bottom of my heart.

NOTE: The President spoke at 4:30 p.m. in the East Room at the White House.

Appalachian Regional Commission

Nomination of William E. Albers To Be Alternate Federal Cochairman. April 5, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate William E. Albers, of Washington, D.C., to be Alternate Federal Cochairman of the Appalachian Regional Commission. He would replace George Siebels, resigned.

Albers was born August 3, 1943. He received a B.S. from Southeast Missouri State University in 1967. From 1967 to 1969, he was a systems analyst for the Defense Nuclear Support Agency of the Defense Department, and from 1969 to 1971, he was a senior staff member, performing management consulting activities for Brandon Applied Systems, Inc.

From 1971 to 1972, and again in 1974 and 1975, he served as Management Programs Officer for the U.S. Bureau of Prisons. In 1972 and 1973, he was a self-employed consultant, providing management and organizational consulting services. In 1973 and 1974, he worked for the Justice Department's Office of Criminal Justice, working on development of a long-range planning capability for the Department.

In 1976 Albers was a national fundraising director for the Carter campaign and then worked for the Transition Talent Inventory Program. In 1977 he was a consultant to the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration. From September 1977 to March 1978, he was a consultant to ACTION, working on a new program for the Agency in the area of criminal justice. He is currently a consultant to the Appalachian Regional Commission.

Interview With the President

Remarks in an Interview for "Black Perspective on the News." April 5, 1978

REGINALD BRYANT. Mr. President, I would like to thank you for joining us on Black Perspective. I would like to introduce to you the gentlemen who will be joining me in asking the questions.

First, from Philadelphia, the associate editor and the columnist for the Philadelphia Evening Sunday Bulletin, Mr. Claude Lewis. And a gentleman who was indeed with us the last time we spoke, from the Chicago Tribune, their columnist, Mr. Vernon Jarrett.

I should like to say, too, that we are a living example of perhaps a campaign promise that you were able to keep. Since the last time we spoke, the proposition was that if you became President, you would make an attempt to be with us. Here you are, and here we are.

PRESIDENT'S TRIP TO AFRICA

I should like to start the questioning, Mr. President, by asking you with regard to the African, South American tour that you just took, what impact you really think that your visit will have had. There has been some speculation that one of the reasons, for example, for going to Nigeria was because of the importance they represent with regard to oil imports in this country and with regard to the relationships of African problems of human rights and our own. What sense do you have of that?

THE PRESIDENT. Let me say, first of all, that I'm glad to be on the program again. This is my third opportunity to appear on the Black Perspective and News. I understand I'm the first President who's been interviewed by a black panel. And I think it's very appropriate that, in a rapidly changing world, with an increasing interest on the part of our own country in the predominantly black nations of Africa, that this be possible, in addition to the domestic considerations that also make it a very important opportunity for me.

I went to Nigeria not because of the oil situation at all. I think you know that Nigeria is by far the largest nation in Africa in population, with between 85 and 100 million people. Also, it's an increasing important nation as far as its influence on political affairs, economic affairs in the western coast, and in fact throughout Africa.

Two or three years ago we had practically no relationship with the black African nations, in fact had a very unfavorable relationship with Nigeria. I think that when Secretary Kissinger, under the previous administration, wanted to visit Nigeria, they refused to let him come into the country for a visit.

The reception this time was superb. There was a genuine demonstration of friendship, welcome, a sense of partnership between Nigeria and the United States, a recognition that our country now is not only deeply involved in the African Continent in a beneficial way but that we have espoused policies that found approval in Nigeria and among the front-line presidents, and that our approach to the possible resolution of the differences in Zimbabwe and Namibia are quite acceptable to those who live in the southern part of Africa who happen to be black.

So, I think the economics, politics of my visit were beneficial to our country.

As I pointed out during the visit, by the end of this century, 80 percent of all the people who live on Earth will live in Latin America, Africa, and Asia. That's less than 20 years. And we want to be sure that our friendships are solid, that the policies that I put forward representing the American people are good ones, that they are based on close consultation and advice from the African people, and that we espouse policies that accurately reflect the principles on which our Nation was founded.

I think this includes, obviously, peace in Africa. It involves genuine friendship and an equality of treatment, not as a dominant nation looking down on other countries—we need their help as much as they need ours—a hope that human rights in all its aspects, not only freedom from government domination and participation in government on their part but also an alleviation of hunger and an absence of education and job opportunities—food, clothing, health care might be alleviated. All these are good things.

NATIONAL URBAN POLICY

MR. BRYANT. Mr. President, we're going to come back to human rights too, but let Mr. Lewis—

MR. LEWIS. I wanted to bring you a little closer to home. Every President in our history, I think, has suggested programs that should work to save the cities in this country—Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon, Ford.

THE PRESIDENT. I know.

MR. LEWIS. You are proposing $8.3 billion for the cities. Why do you think your programs will work, and how are you going to get over the idea to the black community that you're really sincere? I think there's a lot of suspicion on the part of black people throughout this country about Presidential politics.

THE PRESIDENT. I can't say that we have a magic answer to the problems of urban America or poor America or black American citizens. I think there have been two or three differences. One is that this whole program was developed in close harmony with strong constituency groups, black leaders, mayors of the major cities—Maynard Jackson, Dick Hatcher, Ken Gibson, mayors like Coleman Young.

Also we've worked very closely with the mayor of Los Angeles, who just happened to be black; but also the white ones, as well. So, it's a program that is built up from the bottom, not just handed down from Washington, based on practical experience.

Secondly, it's a program that brought together all the departments of Government for the first time. We not only put forward some ideas on the increased spending, better programs, and so forth, but we reassessed and changed to some degree 150 different Federal programs that have been, in the past, designed to help the cities, but haven't been effective as they ought to have been.

We have built on direct programs that would help people in the cities who are poor. We have cut down the unemployment rate, as you know, about 1½ or almost 2 percent this past year. But we've also tried to triple purchasing from minority-owned businesses.

We've put into the laws that were passed last year—the Congress did—a mandatory requirement that 10 percent of the contracts be allotted to minority-owned businesses. We've exceeded those goals.

We've tried to increase, and have succeeded again, in increasing the deposit of Federal funds in black-owned banks up to more than $100 million now. And we've exceeded our goal again.

We plan on setting up an urban bank which would give loans in special areas. We've advocated to the Congress under this program that tax incentives for employing difficult people to hire be rewarded and also prescribe investment credits on taxation for people who invest in the rundown urban centers.

So, I think the cohesion of the whole program, the fact that it was built from the ground up, that it modifies existing programs, it puts a lot of money in, and is targeted, are all new factors.

MR. LEWIS. Is there a mechanism to see that all these things are carried out? Many Presidents have made proposals, but they never reached the people that they were designed to help. Now that's the problem, and therein lies the suspicion, I think.

THE PRESIDENT. I know. Well, this program was put together not only with the mayors and Governors and the private sector leaders but with every Cabinet member who works with me. I was personally involved and approved every single program myself. And within the White House, Jack Watson, who coordinates among the Cabinet members on an everyday basis—and his responsibility is to work directly with the mayors and Governors of the Nation—will help to provide a White House influence now and in the future.

I've also called on the leading officials, both in the private and public sectors at all levels of government, to participate consistently and continuously in assessing how well the programs are administered.

So, I think these built-in factors in the program will help to ensure that if a program doesn't work, we'll know it doesn't and why; if a program does work, it's a kind of opportunity for improvement or enlargement that we can have in the future.

SUPPORT FROM BLACK AMERICANS

MR. JARRETT. Mr. President, may we address ourselves to the political arena for a moment? I was at the Urban League convention, when your friend Vernon Jordan attacked your administration, and I was also at the Congressional Black Caucus annual weekend, when you were also under sharp criticism. And I noticed that after each one of those attacks on you, you did come before black audiences, and some people said you scored a success. I want to ask you this: To just hazard a guess, do you believe that you have lost much of the black support, that 94 percent of the black voter turnout that won you the election? Do you think you've lost any of that yourself, despite what the leaders may say?

THE PRESIDENT. I might say that the leaders to whom you referred, I think at this point, are very supportive of me and my administration, what it has done, and the programs we've put forward.

I look upon the Urban League, the NAACP, the black mayors and other public officials, the Congressional Black Caucus, as forums from which their leadership can and should criticize my administration and other leaders in our country when we don't deal adequately with the needs of black and other minority people in this country. I don't find any fault with that. I think they have a responsibility and a duty to point out deficiencies in my programs. And I'd listen very carefully.

There's never a public statement made by any one of those leaders that I described, and others, that doesn't get instant attention in the White House.

MR. JARRETT. Many have spoken about disappointments, the fact that maybe in 13 States the black vote did make the difference. Do you feel that if an election were held today, that you could still capture that 94 percent of the black vote?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, let me say two things: First, I don't take anything for granted, and I wouldn't take the black vote for granted. That would be the worst mistake I could make. Secondly, I've done my best to earn the continuing support of black people, and I don't think that in the examination of what we have done we are subject to legitimate criticism. We're trying to do even better. So my answer to you would be yes, but I don't take it for granted.

MR. BRYANT. Mr. President, it would seem that there may be an easy test for the extent to which black support still accrues to you, because there are a number of congressional races that will be coming up, and certainly the South and the blacks therein will have some role in the election or the failure to be elected on a number of people.

It has been suggested that—and even in the context of my colleague's question—that while there may be money going into programs, there is not the recognition of the very disparate relationship that black people have to the economy.

For example, it's been said by some that inflation is the major problem in the country. And I would suggest here, without too much fear of being corrected, that black people don't think that; that it's unemployment and that it's the ability to be a part of the economic system, that there is, if you will, an economic apartheid; that, coupled with some loss of favor, some disillusionment among black people may possibly be evidenced. Are you taking a look at these congressional races, and do you think that is a barometer of where you stand, perhaps, with black America?

THE PRESIDENT. I think to a substantial degree the outcome of the congressional elections this year will be a measure of my administration's approval among the voters, yes.

We've made good progress in unemployment. We've more than reached our goal in 1977 for reducing unemployment, even though nobody thought we would. And even in 1978 in the first couple of months the unemployment rate has continued to go down. It's just a little above 6 percent now.

MR. BRYANT. Excuse me. That is with regard to nonblack unemployment, which was higher to begin with. So a reduction of 1 percent is—puts it at 11.

THE PRESIDENT. I understand that. The unemployment rate among blacks has also dropped about 1½ percent, but it started out so high that it hadn't felt as good a percentage benefit as the whites.

I might say this: Our public service job program, which has been increased 150 percent, is heavily oriented to the more disadvantaged person. And in our CETA programs now we're getting much more toward the employment of minority citizens, who were ignored in the past.

Also, I think it's obvious that when you reduce the unemployment rate overall in the country, then the special government programs that are designed to help the private sector can be focused more and more specifically on those who are the first to be fired and the last to be hired in the private sector, which is quite often the minority citizens.

So, I think although we have made some progress so far, we have still got a long way to go. And with the lower unemployment rate now, we can focus our attention much more on the black citizens, particularly young black citizens who are heavily affected adversely.

MR. BRYANT. Does your administration acknowledge an unfavorable distribution of the wealth in this country?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I do.

VIEWS ON THE PRESIDENCY

MR. LEWIS. Mr. President, even if all of your judgments have been right up to now, how can a President be effective when he lives around and among so much alienation, such as the blacks, the farmers, the Jews, the intellectuals, labor? I mean, all of these groups seem to be unhappy with President Carter's policies. How can you be effective if you lose this kind of broad-based support?

THE PRESIDENT. I think this has probably been the case with all previous Presidents. At least in my lifetime it has. I just finished reading a new biography of President Truman, you know, written by Robert Donovan. And compared to Truman's problems, my administration has been a gravy train so far. [Laughter] He really had tough problems and severe criticisms. His popularity dropped down to less than 23 percent.

Well, you know, I think any President is a focal point for criticism, and legitimately so. I'm the leader of the Nation. I don't try to put the responsibilities off on someone else.

I think another thing that cuts both ways is that when I came into office, a lot was expected of me. You know, had Nixon or Ford done as much as we have done already, it would have been a tremendous beneficial and appreciative reaction to it. But since people expected so much from a new Democratic President after 8 years, that when we have done good things, legitimately, people expect even more. And I think that this is part of being President. I don't deplore it.

I don't want to rest on my laurels. I don't want to spend my time the next 3 years of my administration bragging about what we have done. I want to spend the next 3 years saying, "How can we do better?" and listen very carefully to somebody that criticizes me and say, "Are they right? Is this program working or not?" I think that's a better attitude to have. I don't feel badly about that.

REVERSE DISCRIMINATION

MR. LEWIS. I think there's a growing feeling among certain segments of whites across this country that blacks are getting too much. I wonder, do you feel that there's discrimination against white people and how——

THE PRESIDENT. No, I do not. I think the position that we took in the Bakke case, I think the position that we've taken in orienting Federal procurement programs, contracts for public works, public service job programs, the reorganization that's coming forward in the equal employment opportunity area in Government, is going to be of great benefit to blacks and other minority groups in the future. And I don't think that we've done too much at all.

When you look at the statistics, although we have made progress, as I pointed out before, we still have a very embarrassing disparity in income, job opportunities, unemployment rates, focused with its adverse effects among the minority citizens.

MR. LEWIS. Mr. President, just a followup: Mayor Rizzo of Philadelphia has threatened to launch a white effort, an ethnic effort, bringing white people together because black people are getting too much. What do you think the effect of that is going to be on America?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't think there will be any effect on America.

MR. LEWIS. You don't think that will——

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't think so. Most Americans, particularly myself as a southerner, can still see the very difficult circumstances under which minority families live on the average—there are obvious exceptions both ways—because of past legal discrimination, plus the illegal discrimination that still exists in some areas. That's why, under civil service reform, under equal employment opportunity program reform, we're trying to root out those last vestiges of discrimination in government and set a pattern for the private sector.

This morning I had a meeting with a man who will head up the National Alliance of Businesses to provide jobs for particularly disadvantaged people in the private sector, completely removed from government, in addition to what we are doing in government.

I think we have a long way to go to repair the damage that has been done in the past by discrimination.

HUMPHREY-HAWKINS BILL

MR. JARRETT. Mr. President, there's not a single black leader in this country, however low on the totempole that he or she may be, who does not show a profound concern about the Humphrey-Hawkins bill.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

MR. JARRETT. We know that you had some reservations about it even when you were campaigning for the Presidency. Are you at this moment willing to call together the leaders of the Democratic Party to launch a massive assault on unemployment through Humphrey-Hawkins? Or is this something that you've had to just almost back into through the different amendments that have come up? Is there going to be a real serious campaign from your office to get that bill passed?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. We're completely committed to Humphrey-Hawkins. And I think, as you know, that was a proposal that had been in the Congress for years. It had been sitting around having a great difficulty getting out of committee, getting on the floor for a vote, because of the absence of support in the past from the White House.

When I got in office, it had support from the White House. We worked with Senator Humphrey before his death, with Gus Hawkins in the House, my own domestic staff did. And we put together a proposal that we can support enthusiastically, which we are supporting enthusiastically, which the Democratic leadership in the House has supported enthusiastically, which can pass the Congress and which can be implemented. And I think we've removed all those aggravations that were brought about by delay and are moving expeditiously.

My prediction is the Humphrey-Hawkins bill will pass this year.

ADMINISTRATION PROGRAMS

MR. BRYANT. Mr. President, it seems that some of the things that have been mentioned so far that have led to some dissatisfaction or at least disappointment with the administration thus far, to which you have responded that, of course, it's difficult. And even though you've made some strides comparably to the Republican administration, it doesn't seem like much. Is there anything that you're prepared to do that would dramatically—I hesitate to use the word “drastically,” but dramatically—show where your commitment and interests are?

We are 10 years away from the Kerner Commission report, which indicated we had an America that was divided, black and white, separate and unequal. And now we literally have a third member of that group, that is, the underclass, the permanently disadvantaged, irrevocably lost in poverty and economic strife.

Is there something that your administration can do that would perhaps even entail some political risk on your part, but that would dramatically show where Jimmy Carter and the Democratic administration is with regard to black people in America?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I would really rather be measured by the actual achievements of my administration and not just on public relations stunts that might be dramatic, but not bring in any real dividends.

MR. BRYANT. I'm not suggesting a public relations stunt as much as something substantive and real that would get to the people at the bottom of this broad-based pyramid that we live in, that—

THE PRESIDENT. But when you start examining the results of our programs—better health care for young people under our CHAPS program; better housing under the newly revived Housing and Urban Development Department—Pat Harris is the head of it—a drop in the unemployment rate among minority groups, which I think is going to be accelerated in the future in a very beneficial way; Federal Government deposits in black banks, contracts to black businesses, purchases from black suppliers; these kinds of things, plus the opening up of new job opportunities with the equal employment, civil service reforms—I would rather be measured on what we actually do as proven than to try some bold initiative that might just be a public relations stunt and not result in tangible benefits for black citizens.

And that's what I'm willing to be measured on. I think that in this fall election, many of the Members of Congress will have their performance assessed by black voters. I hope they will say, "What did you do that helped my people?" And I think that's the best measuring stick for it.

MR. BRYANT. The sense of my question comes out of the polarization declaration that the mayor of Philadelphia made, which indeed will appeal to some people, and there will be dramatic things happening in terms of the relationships possibly getting worse. That's the sense of why I asked the question.

THE PRESIDENT. I understand. I think there's one other point that ought to be emphasized that we've mentioned in the first few minutes of the program, and that is what has been America's change in attitude toward black Africa. I don't think anybody can deny that there's a tremendous new interest among all American citizens, black and white, in the peaceful and prosperous life that can exist in the southern part of Africa, with an end to apartheid, the end to discrimination, majority rule in those black nations, a good friendship, a sense of equality between white leaders, like myself, and the black leaders, like those who live in Africa.

I think this is a new thrust that's not just initiated by me as a lonely public official, but which mirrors accurately what the American people have long wanted to do. I think that in itself is a very dramatic indication of our new interest in fairness and equality, not just in our own country but around the world.

U.S. FOREIGN RELATIONS

MR. JARRETT. There's also a fear that this new interest on the part of the United States, with or without you being in the Presidency, could have a negative effect too, in that the United States has a tradition of supporting the more conservative, in some instances outright reactionary regimes, as long as they were pro-United States, even though they were anti their own people.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

MR. JARRETT. Is the United States now going to judiciously make some decisions and not necessarily go out supporting some dictator who happens to love us and proclaim his anticommunism out loud, and then we will rally to him?

THE PRESIDENT. I really feel that this question has already been answered to a substantial degree by our new relationship, say, with Jamaica, our new relationship with Nigeria, our new relationship with the people who struggle for majority rights in Namibia, in South Africa, in Zimbabwe, by the new friendship that I have with people like Nyerere and like Obasanjo. These kinds of benefits have been coming to our country already in the short period of time of 15 months. And I think that the answer is, as I said before, this is not something that I do in isolation, but I think I accurately represent the new interests of the Congress and the people of the United States in dealing with the developing nations of the world on a fair basis.

MR. JARRETT. It doesn't bother you too much that Nyerere is a Socialist, for an example?

THE PRESIDENT. No, it doesn't bother me. I think he's a nationalist. I think he's looking for what is best for his people in Tanzania. I think he's a very strong, dynamic leader on a worldwide basis, and he's a very valuable friend of ours.

HUMAN RIGHTS

MR. LEWIS. Many people feel that the President of the United States is more concerned about human rights outside of the United States and not enough concerned about human rights at home. What is your reaction to that?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't think that's an accurate assessment. I think that our whole international emphasis on human rights would be undercut and fruitless if we didn't set an example in our country of being very insistent that human rights be protected here. And also, it's important for us to acknowledge that we still have a long way to go in giving our people genuine human rights, not just political rights but also the right to, as I said earlier, to an education, to health care, to good housing, good clothing, good place to live.

So, I think that we've got to set an example in our country. Otherwise the other nations just won't pay any attention to us.

MR. JARRETT. Have you considered making a statement in support, for an example, of the Wilmington 10, even though that's a State judicial matter?

THE PRESIDENT. The only thing that I have been willing to do is to let our Attorney General investigate the circumstances under which the trial was held.

As you know, the Wilmington 10 are now going into the Federal Courts to make an appeal. And I think it would not be appropriate for me to make a preliminary judgment from the executive branch of Government as to what the Federal judiciary ought to do. Justice, yes; interference in the specifics of the case, no.

MR. BRYANT. Gentlemen, I'm afraid that we're out of time. You've been President for a year and 4 months, and we've had 27 minutes to discuss that, which is clearly impossible. I hope that we'll perhaps have an opportunity to do this again at some reasonable time.

THE PRESIDENT. I hope so. You had some very tough and very good questions. I think we exposed a lot of the interests that I have in the report on my administration and in a very brief period of time, thanks to you.

MR. BRYANT. Thank you, Mr. President.

NOTE: The interview began at 2 p.m. in the Map Room at the White House. It was taped for later broadcast on the Public Broadcasting Service. Mr. Bryant is producer of "Black Perspective on the News."

The transcript of the interview was released on April 6.

White House Conference on Small Business

*Letter to Senator Gaylord Nelson of Wisconsin Concerning the Conference.
April 5, 1978*

To Senator Gaylord Nelson:

I have carefully reviewed your October 1976 memorandum recommending a White House Conference on Small Business, as well as the additional memorandum of last autumn. This material and our recent discussion have satisfied me that such a conference would be very constructive for the nation's 14 million small and independent businesses. Therefore, I intend to call a White House Conference on Small Business, as suggested by Senate Resolution 105 which you authored.

I believe such a conference can help us identify the many special problems facing small business and design an agenda that addresses them in a constructive way. As you know, the 14 million small businesses represent a much larger part of our economy than is commonly recognized. They account for over 50% of all private employment, 43% of the gross national product and over half of all inventions.

You have been a leader in devising ways to help this important sector of our economy grow and prosper. Administrator Vernon Weaver of the Small Business Administration will be working closely with you in preparation for the White House Conference.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

NOTE: The text of the letter was released on April 6.

On the same day, Small Business Administrator A. Vernon Weaver, Jr., and Senator Nelson, chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Small Business, held a news conference in the Briefing Room at the White House on the week-long Conference, which will be held in the fall of 1979.

Commission on Presidential Scholars

LESTER C. THUROW, 39, of Lincoln, Mass., professor of economics and management at Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

United States Marine Corps

Nomination of Colonel Margaret A. Brewer for the Rank of Brigadier General. April 6, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Col. Margaret A. Brewer, U.S. Marine Corps, for appointment to the grade of brigadier general. If confirmed by the Senate, she will be the first woman general in the history of the Marine Corps and will hold the rank while serving as Director of the Division of Information, Headquarters Marine Corps.

Brewer was born November 19, 1930, in Durand, Mich. She received a B.A. in geography from the University of Michigan in 1952. She accepted appointment as a second lieutenant in the Marine Corps Reserve in 1952 and an appointment in the regular Marine Corps in 1956.

From 1956 to 1958, then-Captain Brewer served as commanding officer of the woman Marine companies at Norfolk, Va., then Camp Lejeune, N.C. In 1958 and 1959, she was a platoon commander for woman officer candidates at Quantico, Va., during summer training sessions, and for the balance of the time, a woman officer selection officer with headquarters in Lexington, Ky.

From 1959 to 1963, she was at Camp Pendleton, Calif., with the Commissioned Officers Mess (Open). In 1963 she returned to Quantico to serve as Executive Officer and later as Commanding Officer of the Woman Officer School. From 1966 to 1968, she was public affairs officer for the 6th Marine Corps District in Atlanta.

Brewer served as Deputy Director of Women Marines at Headquarters Marine Corps from 1968 to 1971. She was promoted to colonel in 1970. From 1971 to 1973, she was at Quantico, serving as special assistant to the Director, then Chief of the Support Department, for the Marine Corps Education Center.

In 1973 Brewer became the seventh Director of Women Marines. Since 1977 she has been Deputy Director of Information at Marine Corps Headquarters.

Age Discrimination in Employment Act Amendments of 1978

*Remarks on Signing H.R. 5383 Into Law.
April 6, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. This is a cool spring morning with a lot of smiles on faces in the Rose Garden, and I think it's a time for smiles and for congratulations to many of you who are assembled around me for this historic occasion.

In December of 1967, Lyndon Johnson, who was then President, signed the age discrimination in employment legislation. It's been the basis for decision in our country for the last 10 years.

When I campaigned around our Nation for President, it was obvious to me that many things needed to be done to give senior citizens an equal opportunity in life and to correct some of the remaining defects in the Federal law and administration that worked against the best interests of these valuable assets to our national scene.

The Congress has courageously, at some political cost, acted to ensure the basic integrity of the social security system, which a few months ago was in serious doubt, with bankruptcy facing two of the reserve funds on which retired people must depend.

We've moved to increase greatly, with congressional support, money for the Meals on Wheels program, which is very good. In the legislation that was passed concerning social security, a permission was granted to retired people to earn more money and still draw their social security payments, legislation that I think was long overdue.

We've also proposed to the Congress legislation to control the unwarranted and very rapid increase in hospital costs, with the hospital cost containment bill. Many of the beneficial interest groups are helping with that legislation. It's difficult politically, but I think it's a necessary precursor to the passage of comprehensive national health insurance in the future.

I think all of you know that when we take any action here in Washington, senior citizens are quite often acutely affected. We are trying to hold down the inflation rate, which is a particular burden upon those who are retired, with a fixed income, quite often measured in so many dollars per year. And they're slowly robbed as the inflation rate goes up.

Energy legislation has been designed specifically to protect interests of senior citizens and those who live in the homes with a fixed income.

Today, thanks to the excellent work of men and women in the Congress—long before I became President, by the way—we are here to sign into law a new, important revision of the age discrimination in employment legislation.

Senator Pete Williams, Congressman Carl Perkins, Gus Hawkins, Paul Findley, Congressman Claude Pepper, and others who are assembled here around me have done notable work. This has not been easy legislation to pass. It was quite controversial. And I believe that the Congress, although the vote was overwhelming in the end, dealt very responsibly with this complicated subject.

I know during the campaign Senator Frank Church was one who repeatedly brought up the subject of the needs of senior citizens.

This legislation will remove any age limit on employment in the Federal Government. And we hope this will be a good example for the rest of the Nation to emulate. And it also extends the age of protection against discrimination from 65 up to 70 in the public sector, in the private sector. We are encouraging State and local governments to follow the lead of the Federal Government.

And we also have initiated two major studies to assess the impact of this legislation, perhaps leading to further revisions in the future.

Special needs have been accommodated, and I want to congratulate all those who are assembled behind me for their good work.

There's one person here who is not yet a Member of Congress, who might very well be in the future, who gave some sterling testimony in urging the passage of this legislation, and that's Kathryn Morse. She was Amy's age—10 years old—when she gave her testimony, which was very effective, all the Members of the Congress tell me. And she's now 11 years old, rapidly approaching the time of retirement—[laughter]—as am I and all of you.

I think her testimony vividly demonstrates that this legislation is not just beneficial to those who've already retired or who are already 65 years old, but it's beneficial to people my age and even to people who are the age of Kathryn and Amy.

It's a good step in the right direction, and I'm very proud now to sign into law House bill 5383, which provides fairness and equity in protecting our older citizens from discrimination in employment.

I know that everybody would like to make a statement today, but I would like to call upon the man who arranged for me to meet with a special committee on this legislation and who's been in the forefront in his public activities and who will soon reach the age where this legislation applies to, although he's immune in the Congress, and now in the Federal Government, and that's Senator Claude Pepper.

REPRESENTATIVE PEPPER. Thank you very much, Mr. President. This is a happy day for all of us, and we're sure it is for you because of your long commitment to the cause of the elderly.

We want to thank you and Mrs. Carter for all that you've done to bring about this happy event that we are celebrating here today. It's a day of elation for many millions of our fellow citizens, because when this bill becomes effective, they know that when Providence blesses them with their 65th birthday, it shall not be a death day for the end of their working life; they can continue to work and contribute to their country.

From the dedication that you have and so long cherished, and that of the Congress, as evidenced by its action in this matter, we know that the elderly of this country can look forward to more occasions when you and the Congress will recognize the needs of the elderly of this country and provide even more perfectly for their health and happiness, for their contributing to the growth and greatness of our country.

So, it's a happy day for the elderly. We thank you very much, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Claude Pepper, like my mother, is much younger than I am and seems to grow younger every day. [Laughter]

Senator Pete Williams, would you say a word?

SENATOR WILLIAMS. Thank you, Mr. President. It's another happy occasion here. We are making progress. Our Committee of Human Resources in the Senate,

Education and Labor in the House, we seem to be here at this desk and watching you sign so many measures into law that expand opportunities for a full life for people, protections where they need it. I want to thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much.

There's one other person on whom I want to call to make a statement, who has been a key factor in the successful passage of this legislation, that's Carl Perkins.

REPRESENTATIVE PERKINS. First, Mr. President, let me thank you for the active support that you have given to this legislation ever since you came to the White House. But for the support, the active support, of the President due to the Presidency and Senator Claude Pepper, I don't think we would have been here today.

This is a happy day for the elderly people in this country. We're all happy about the passage of this legislation, and I certainly want to thank you, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much. Paul?

REPRESENTATIVE FINDLEY. Mr. President, Paul Findley of Illinois. In 1974 I introduced the first bill to outlaw mandatory retirement. There were then just three cosponsors. It's become a very popular idea, I'm glad to say.

I consider your signature on this legislation to be the most notable act to advance social justice in at least 10 years.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much.

Well, I want to thank all of you for coming. I know that we had to restrain the participants this morning because of the capacity of the Rose Garden. But this is the kind of legislation that will have a direct impact on literally millions of Americans. And although it was a tough battle and a long battle to get it passed, the people around me deserve a great deal of interest. And on behalf of the American people who are not here, I want to thank all of you.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:17 a.m. at the ceremony in the Rose Garden at the White House.

As enacted, H.R. 5383 is Public Law 95-256, approved April 6.

Farm Legislation

Letter to Congressional Leaders Concerning the Administration's Position on H.R. 6782. April 6, 1978

Sixteen months ago, I asked Bob Bergland to join with the Congress to help restore a sense of direction and purpose to the farm and food policies of this nation. The extreme volatility of farm and food prices of recent years has not been in the best interest of either our Nation's farmers or consumers.

When we took office, farm income was in sharp decline. We undertook to reverse this trend and return stability to the nation's farm economy. Working with you and other members of the Congress, we developed the most sweeping farm legislation of the past 40 years. Using the authorities of that law, we have moved to improve the incomes of America's farmers.

This policy is working. Our agricultural economy has improved markedly in recent months. To further strengthen this recovery, we announced last week:

- an expansion and liberalization of the farmer-held grain reserve.
- paid diversion of 7 to 9 million acres of excess cropland.

- and other steps which, in combination with the reserve and the acreage diversion, will add up to $4 billion to crop producer income.

These are carefully considered measures. They will provide decent farm incomes, protect consumers from precipitous price rises, enhance our reliability as a major agricultural exporter, and allow us to meet our humanitarian food aid commitments.

Yesterday a conference committee of the Congress reported H.R. 6782, legislation that was hastily drafted in an atmosphere of emotion and confusion. Should that legislation reach my desk, it will be vetoed.

No one who understands our farm economy should be deceived about the impacts of this measure.

- It would increase food price inflation to double digit levels.
- It would add as much as $6 billion to the Federal budget.
- By sharply reducing production and increasing prices, this bill could seriously undermine our competitive position in world markets.
- The higher feed prices that result would adversely affect our own livestock industry.
- It would require vast new layers of bureaucracy to administer the complicated and confusing schedule of eligibility requirements and payments.
- And, this bill would direct the vast majority of its benefits to a small number of the very largest of our farmers, rather than those in greatest need of help.

This Administration is committed to a strong and prosperous farm economy and one that is able to compete successfully in international markets. We now have a policy to accomplish this objective. I call upon you and other members of Congress to join with me in supporting this policy and in defeating this conference committee bill.

NOTE: This is the text of identical letters addressed to Robert C. Byrd, Senate majority leader, Herman E. Talmadge, chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry, Edmund S. Muskie, chairman of the Senate Budget Committee, Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., Speaker of the House of Representatives, and Thomas S. Foley, chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture.

Council on Wage and Price Stability

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. April 7, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with Section 5 of the Council on Wage and Price Stability Act, as amended, I hereby transmit to the Congress the thirteenth quarterly report of the Council on Wage and Price Stability. This report contains a description of the Council's activities during the fourth quarter of 1977 in monitoring both prices and wages in the private sector and various Federal government activities that may lead to higher costs and prices without creating commensurate benefits. It discusses Council reports, analyses, and filings before Federal regulatory agencies.

In August 1977 I asked the Council to undertake an in-depth study of the Nation's steel industry. The study was released in October and served as an important information base in the Administration's development of its reference price system for imports of foreign steel.

During the fourth quarter, the Council also issued, among other things, reports on interest rates and inflation, the lumber industry, 1978 model year auto prices, and a detailed analysis of the communications workers' settlement.

The Council on Wage and Price Stability will continue to play an important role in supplementing fiscal and monetary policies by calling public attention to wage and price developments or actions by the government that could be of concern to American consumers.

JIMMY CARTER

The White House,
April 7, 1978.

NOTE: The report is entitled "A Quarterly Report of the Council on Wage and Price Stability, With a Special Report on Inflation—April 1978, Executive Office of the President, Washington, D.C., No. 13" (Government Printing Office, 121 pages plus appendices).

Enhanced Radiation Weapons

Statement by the President. April 7, 1978

I have decided to defer production of weapons with enhanced radiation effects. The ultimate decision regarding the incorporation of enhanced radiation features into our modernized battlefield weapons will be made later, and will be influenced by the degree to which the Soviet Union shows restraint in its conventional and nuclear arms programs and force deployments affecting the security of the United States and Western Europe.

Accordingly, I have ordered the Defense Department to proceed with the modernization of the Lance missile nuclear warhead and the 8-inch weapon system, leaving open the option of installing the enhanced radiation elements.

The United States is consulting with its partners in the North Atlantic Alliance on this decision and will continue to discuss with them appropriate arms control measures to be pursued with the Soviet Union.

We will continue to move ahead with our allies to modernize and strengthen our military capabilities, both conventional and nuclear. We are determined to do whatever is necessary to assure our collective security and the forward defense of Europe.

Federal Council on the Aging

Nomination of Nine Members. April 7, 1978

The President today announced the nomination of nine persons to be members of the Federal Council on the Aging. They are:

NELSON H. CRUIKSHANK, of Washington, D.C., currently Chairman of the Council, for reappointment;

FANNIE B. DORSEY, chairperson of the State Institute of Aging in Frankfort, Ky.;

HOBART C. JACKSON, Sr., founder and first chairman of the National Caucus on the Black Aged and executive vice president and director of the Stephen Smith Geriatric Center in Philadelphia (reappointment);

MARY A. MARSHALL, a member of the Virginia House of Delegates and chairman of the Legislative Study Commission on the Needs of Elderly Virginians;

WALTER L. MOFFETT, of Kamiah, Idaho, a Presbyterian minister and director of the Nez Perce Tribe Housing Authority;

BERNICE L. NEUGARTEN, a professor in the department of behavioral sciences and school of social service administration at the University of Chicago, past president of the Gerontological Society, and member of the governing board of the International Association of Gerontology;

JAMES T. SYKES, chairman of the Wisconsin Board on Aging;

FERNANDO M. TORRES-GIL, a lecturer at the Andrus Gerontology Center and department of sociology at the University of Southern California;

WESLEY C. UHLMAN, a Seattle attorney and former mayor of Seattle.

Federal Home Loan Bank Board

Nomination of Anita Miller To Be a Member. April 7, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Anita Miller, of Ridgewood, N.J., to be a member of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board for a term expiring June 30, 1982.

Miller was born April 20, 1931, in New York. She attended the University of Michigan.

From 1959 to 1964, Miller was founder and first chairman of the Rhode Island Conference on Intergroup Relations and founder of the Women's Intergroup Committee. From 1964 to 1972, she was a staff consultant on social action and interreligious affairs for the Union of American Hebrew Congregations.

Since 1972 Miller has been senior program officer in the division of national affairs of the Ford Foundation. She is responsible for approximately 20 Foundation-sponsored programs in the field of housing, urban development, and neighborhood conservation.

Agency for International Development

Nomination of David Bronheim To Be an Assistant Administrator. April 7, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate David Bronheim, of Washington, D.C., to be an Assistant Administrator of the Agency for International Development (AID). He would replace Frederick Van Dyk, resigned, and his area of responsibility would be intragovernmental and international affairs.

Bronheim was born April 28, 1932. He received an A.B. from the University of Michigan in 1953 and an LL.B. from Harvard Law School in 1956.

From 1958 to 1960, Bronheim did legal work for the World Bank in Washington. From 1960 to 1967, he was with AID, doing legal work and then serving as Deputy Coordinator for Latin America.

From 1968 to 1970, he was executive director of the Center for Inter-American Relations. From 1970 to 1976, he was vice president of the Dreyfus Corp., where he worked in the financial field with the Europeans and the Japanese. Since 1976 he has been with The Futures Group, a subsidiary of the Dreyfus Corp., as vice president and director, until January of this year, and currently as a consultant.

Federal Election Commission

Nomination of John W. McGarry and Samuel D. Zagoria To Be Members. April 7, 1978

The President today announced that he will renominate John W. McGarry and Samuel D. Zagoria to be members of the Federal Election Commission for terms expiring April 30, 1983. McGarry and Zagoria were nominated during the last session of the Senate but were not confirmed before adjournment.

McGarry was born June 11, 1922, in Boston, Mass. He served in the U.S. Navy during World War II, and after the war graduated from Holy Cross College and earned a law degree at Georgetown Law Center.

From 1959 to 1963, McGarry served as assistant attorney general of Massachusetts. He then combined private law practice with service as chief counsel for the Special Committee to Investigate Campaign Expenditures, which was created as a temporary unit every 2 years until 1972 to oversee House elections.

Since 1973 McGarry has been special counsel on elections to the Committee on House Administration of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Zagoria was born April 9, 1919, in Somerville, N.J. He was a reporter and an editor for the Washington Post for 10 years and was a 1954 Nieman Fellow at Harvard University. He served for 10 years as administrative assistant to Senator Clifford Case of New Jersey.

Zagoria is a former member of the National Labor Relations Board. He is now director of the Labor-Management Relations Service, which is sponsored by the U.S. Conference of Mayors to provide leaders of local government with information and education on municipal labor-management relations.

Energy Conservation Programs

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. April 7, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I am hereby transmitting the first annual report required to be submitted to the Congress by Section 381(c) of the Energy Policy and Conservation Act, Public Law 94-163, and required to be prepared by the Federal Energy Administration, now the Department of Energy, with the assistance of appropriate agencies under Executive Order 11912 of April 13, 1976.

This report covers the implementing activities and actions undertaken during 1976 by Federal Agencies in establishing mandatory Federal Procurement policies and standards with respect to energy conservation and efficiency, developing a 10-year plan for energy conservation in federally-owned or leased buildings, carrying out a responsible public education program to encourage energy conservation, vanpooling and carpooling arrangements, and acquiring fuel-efficient passenger automobiles for the Federal fleet.

JIMMY CARTER

United States-Hungary Trade Relations

Letter to the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate. April 7, 1978

Dear Mr. Speaker: (Dear Mr. President:)

In accordance with Section 407 of the Trade Act of 1974, I am transmitting a copy of a proclamation extending non-discriminatory treatment to the products of the Hungarian People's Republic. I also enclose the text of the Agreement on Trade Relations between the United States of America and the Hungarian People's Republic, which was signed on March 17, 1978, and which is included as an annex to the proclamation.

I am also enclosing a copy of my report to the Congress pursuant to Section 402 (c) (2) of the Trade Act of 1974. I shall issue today an Executive Order waiving the application of subsections (a) and (b) of Section 402.

The Agreement on Trade Relations should continue the development of our economic relations with Hungary, to our actual benefit, by placing our trade on a nondiscriminatory basis. It marks another significant step in the improvement of U.S.-Hungarian relations. During this decade, we have concluded important agreements in the consular, financial, cultural, and scientific fields and have begun a constructive dialogue in many areas, including humanitarian matters.

I am also enclosing, for the information of the Congress, a recent exchange of letters between the Hungarian Foreign Minister and the American Ambassador to Hungary. This exchange reviews the progress we have made to date and makes clear each nation's desire to further cooperate wherever possible.

This exchange also highlights Hungary's generally positive policy on emigration. For well over a year, United States officials have had regular conversations with Hungarian officials about Hungarian emigration law, policy and practice, and about the resolution of individual cases. The Hungarian Government has stressed that it intends to continue dealing with emigration matters in a responsive and humanitarian way. Hungary's actions have been consistent with this policy; we have encountered few problems in resolving specific cases.

I have reviewed the circumstances of Hungarian emigration in light of all these considerations, and have determined that a waiver of the application of subsections (a) and (b) of Section 402 of the Trade Act of 1974 will substantially promote the objectives of that Section.

I believe that the Agreement is consistent with both the letter and the spirit of the Trade Act of 1974. It provides for mutual extension of most-favored-nation tariff treatment, while seeking to ensure overall reciprocity of economic benefits. Its special safeguard arrangements provide strong assurances that our trade with Hungary will grow without injury to domestic firms or loss of jobs for American workers.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

United States-Hungary Trade Relations

Proclamation 4560. April 7, 1978

AGREEMENT ON TRADE RELATIONS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE HUNGARIAN PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

As President of the United States of America, acting through my representatives, I entered into the negotiation of an agreement on trade relations between the United States of America and the Hungarian People's Republic with representatives of the Hungarian People's Republic;

The negotiations were conducted in accordance with the requirements of the Trade Act of 1974 (P.L. 93-618, January 3, 1975; 88 Stat. 1978) ("the Act");

An "Agreement on Trade Relations between the United States of America and the Hungarian People's Republic," in English and Hungarian, was signed on March 17, 1978, by representatives of the two Governments, and is annexed to this Proclamation;

The Agreement conforms to the requirements relating to bilateral commercial agreements specified in Section 405 (b) of the Act;

Article XI of the Agreement provides that it shall enter into force on the date of exchange of written notices of acceptance by the Governments of the United States of America and the Hungarian People's Republic; and

Section 405(c) of the Act provides that a bilateral commercial agreement and a proclamation implementing such agreement shall take effect only if approved by the Congress;

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, proclaim as follows:

(1) This Proclamation shall become effective, said Agreement shall enter into force according to its terms, and nondiscriminatory treatment shall be extended to the products of the Hungarian People's Republic in accordance with the terms of the said Agreement, on the date of exchange of written notices of acceptance in accordance with Article XI of the said Agreement; and

(2) General Headnote 3(e) of the Tariff Schedules of the United States is amended by deleting therefrom "Hungary" as of the effective date of this proclamation and a notice thereof shall be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER promptly thereafter.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have signed this Proclamation this seventh day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred second.

JIMMY CARTER

[Filed with the Office of the Federal Register, 3:21 p.m., April 7, 1978]

NOTE: The agreement on U.S.-Hungarian trade relations was filed with the Office of the Federal Register as part of the original document.

United States-Hungary Trade Relations

Message to the Congress. April 7, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to Section 402(c)(2) of the Trade Act of 1974, (hereinafter, "the Act") I shall issue today an Executive Order waiving the application of Subsections (a) and (b) of Section 402 of the Act with respect to the Hungarian People's Republic.

I wish to report to the Congress that I have determined that this waiver will substantially promote the objectives of Section 402 of the Act; and that I have received assurances that the emigration practices of the Hungarian People's Republic will henceforth lead substantially to the achievement of those objectives.

JIMMY CARTER

The White House,
April 7, 1978.

United States-Hungary Trade Relations

Executive Order 12051. April 7, 1978

WAIVER UNDER THE TRADE ACT OF 1974 WITH RESPECT TO THE HUNGARIAN PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC

By virtue of the authority vested in me as President of the United States of America by Section 402(c)(2) of the Trade Act of 1974 (88 Stat. 2057, 19 U.S.C. 2432(c)(2)), which continues to apply to the Hungarian People's Republic pursuant to Section 402(d), and having made the report to the Congress required by Section 402(c)(2), I waive the application of subsections (a) and

(b) of Section 402 of said Act with respect to the Hungarian People's Republic.

National Commission for the Review of Antitrust Laws and Procedures

Executive Order 12052. April 7, 1978

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and statutes of the United States of America, and as President of the United States of America, in order to provide for increased participation on the National Commission for the Review of Antitrust Laws and Procedures, Section 1(b) of Executive Order No. 12022 of December 1, 1977, is hereby amended to read as follows:

“The Commission shall consist of twenty-two members to be appointed by the President and shall include:

(1) The Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice.

(2) The Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission.

(3) The Chairman of one other appropriate independent regulatory agency.

(4) Five members of the Senate recommended by the President of the Senate.

(5) Five members of the House of Representatives recommended by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

(6) One judge of a United States District Court.

Citizens Band Radio Transceivers

Proclamation 4561. April 7, 1978

TEMPORARY DUTY INCREASE ON THE IMPORTATION INTO THE UNITED STATES OF CERTAIN CITIZENS BAND (CB) RADIO TRANSCEIVERS

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

1. Pursuant to section 201(d)(1) of the Trade Act of 1974 (the Trade Act) (19 U.S.C. 2251(d)(1)), the United States International Trade Commission (USITC) on February 2, 1978, reported to the President (USITC Report 201-29) the results of its investigation under section 201(b) of the Trade Act (19 U.S.C. 2251(b)). The USITC determined that Citizens Band (CB) radio transceivers, provided for in item 685.25 (which was changed to item 685.28 by Executive Order 12032, and which is now being changed to item 685.27 by the Annex to this proclamation) of the Tariff Schedules of the United States (TSUS) (19 U.S.C. 1202) are being imported into the United States in such increased quantities as to be a substantial cause of serious injury, or the threat thereof, to the domestic industry producing articles like or directly competitive with the imported articles. The USITC was divided on its remedy recommendations to the President.

2. On March 27, 1978, pursuant to section 202(b)(1) of the Trade Act (19 U.S.C. 2252(b)(1)), and after taking into account the considerations specified in section 202(c) of the Trade Act (19 U.S.C. 2252(c)), I determined to remedy or prevent the injury or threat thereof found to exist by the USITC through the proclamation of a temporary duty increase. On March 27, 1978, in accordance with section 203(b)(1) of the Trade Act (19 U.S.C. 2253(b)(1)), I transmitted a report to the Congress setting forth my determination and intention to proclaim a temporary duty increase and stating the reasons why my decision differed from the actions recommended by the USITC.

3. Section 503(c)(2) of the Trade Act (19 U.S.C. 2463(c)(2)) provides that no article shall be eligible for purposes of the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP) for any period during which such article is the subject of any action proclaimed pursuant to section 203 of the Trade Act (19 U.S.C. 2253).

4. Section 203(e)(1) of the Trade Act (19 U.S.C. 2253(e)(1)) requires that import relief be proclaimed and take effect within 15 days after the import relief determination date.

5. Pursuant to sections 203(a)(1), 203(e)(1), and 503(c)(2) of the Trade Act (19 U.S.C. 2253(a)(1), 2253(e)(1), and 2463(c)(2)), I am providing import relief through the temporary increase of import duty on, and the removal from eligibility for duty free entry under the GSP of, certain Citizens Band (CB) radio transceivers, including those capable of receiving signals on bands other than the Citizens Band, as hereinafter proclaimed.

Now, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, acting under the authority vested in me by the Constitution and the statutes of the United States, including title V, section 604 and section 203 of the Trade Act (19 U.S.C. 2461 et seq.; 19 U.S.C. 2483; and 19 U.S.C. 2253), and in accordance with Article XIX of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) (61 Stat. (pt. 5) A58; 8 UST (pt. 2) 1786), do proclaim that—

(1) Part I of Schedule XX to the GATT is modified to conform to the actions taken in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Annex to this proclamation.

(2) General Headnote 3(c)(iii), part 5 of schedule 6, and subpart A, part 2 of the Appendix to the TSUS are modified as set forth in the Annex to this proclamation.

(3) Annex II of Executive Order No. 11888 of November 24, 1975, as amended, listing articles that are eligible for benefits of the GSP when imported from any designated beneficiary developing country, is further amended by adding item 685.29 (as added by the Annex to this proclamation), in numerical sequence.

(4) Annex III of Executive Order No. 11888, as amended, listing articles that are eligible for benefits of the GSP when imported from all designated beneficiary countries except those specified in General Headnote 3(c)(iii) of the TSUS, is amended by deleting item 685.28 therefrom.

(5) This proclamation shall be effective as to those articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption on or after April 11, 1978. The increased rates of duty provided for in the Annex to this proclamation shall apply only with respect to articles entered, or withdrawn from warehouse, for consumption before the close of April 10, 1981, unless the period of their effectiveness is earlier expressly modified or terminated.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this seventh day of April in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred second.

Interview With the President

Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session With a Group of Editors and News Directors. April 7, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Let me say first of all it's a great pleasure to have you here in the White House. We've been conducting these meetings every 2 weeks since I've been in office, and with the arrival today of Alaska and Hawaii editors, we've had more than 500 top news executives and all 50 States.

What I ordinarily do, and what I will do today, is to spend 3 or 4 minutes just giving you an outline of some of the things that I've been working on the last couple of days or few hours and then spend the rest of the time responding to your questions.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES

On the domestic scene, the most important single issue for us is in the Senate with the Panama Canal Treaty deliberations, which are approaching now the final stages. We think we will have a vote a little after the middle of this month. It's still a difficult issue to deal with politically, one that is taking up almost full time in the Senate.

The Senate and House are working together for the final stages, I hope, of negotiation on energy legislation. Their two conferee groups are now dealing with natural gas prices and deregulation rates, and then will turn to the crude oil equalization tax question. The other three major items out of five have already been resolved.

I will be meeting this afternoon with a Member of the Senate to discuss the social security question. The Congress took, I think, bold and proper action last year. My own preference as President is that we should not reopen that question on social security this year.

We are pushing hard for our tax reform package, tax reduction which amounts to about $25 million [billion]. We are trying to hold down excessive budget demands that would come from additional farm legislation. The Congress has acted responsibly, I think, last year on this as well.

On the foreign scene, this morning I issued a statement on enhanced radiation weapons after close consultation not only with my own administration officials but also our key allied leaders overseas. I discussed this with General Haig by secure telephone, and this morning in Europe the NATO conference met, and I gave the heads of state, earlier, in the NATO conference, the statement that I would make today.

It was carefully drafted, and that's my only statement on that subject, because they are predicating their responses on that specific statement. So, I don't care for a day or two to elaborate it; I think it would be a violation of what I told them I would say if I went into that any more deeply.

I was talking to President Giscard this morning on the phone. He's coming over to make a speech to the United Nations in May, and he will probably come by to see me if we can work out details. We will be having the NATO conference here at the end of May. We are making plans for that already. It will be a 2-day, full session; the first day devoted to political matters between me and the heads of state, pretty well exclusively—maybe foreign ministers sitting in on some of the sessions—the second day on military matters with the heads of state again participating.

This is a first in having the heads of state so deeply involved in NATO details, both politics and military matters, and it shows the renewed importance of NATO in our minds.

We have been working, as you know, on the Mideast question ever since I've been in office. And we've become much more deeply involved in the affairs in Africa than ever before in our Nation's history. We've got a great threat there to peace that could involve the whole world if it should break down.

The Horn of Africa, the Eritrean question is going to arise soon in a much more highly publicized way. We hope that this can be resolved peacefully and that we will not have another war in Ethiopia brought about by the Eritrean question, certainly not involving foreign troops.

In Zimbabwe, we initiated this past week, along with the British, a meeting with the Salisbury leaders for internal settlement, also with the frontline presidents who surround Rhodesia and, hopefully, with the so-called Patriotic Front leaders. Later, at least one of them, Mugabe, said he would participate in these discussions.

In Namibia, we are acting along with three or four other of the Western leaders in the Security Council as agents of the United Nations, trying to bring an orderly withdrawal of the South Africans from that country, as has already been agreed to within the United Nations.

Another obvious, continuing effort is to bring about a peaceful and a satisfactory SALT agreement with the Soviet Union. We've made good and steady progress. I think they've negotiated in good faith; so have we. I can't predict that we will reach an ultimate agreement, because there are still several crucial items that we have not yet resolved.

Secretary Vance will be going to Moscow soon to pursue these remaining items. And we hope to resolve some of them and bring us closer to a resolution of them.

We are making good progress on the comprehensive test ban. For the first time, we're attempting to ban the testing of all nuclear devices, both peaceful and weapons. And the British, the Soviets, and we have made good progress on that in the last 6 months.

This morning, as a routine matter, I received five Ambassadors who presented their credentials to me. I spent 5, 10 minutes with each one of them talking about special problems with their own countries—countries like New Zealand and Italy, Ghana. This was a very routine thing for me to do. But before I meet with those Ambassadors, I have to learn a little about their country, review their latest problems and achievements so that I can send a message to their heads of state.

This is a ceremony that has both substance and just ceremonial benefits. Those are some of the outlines of things that I've been working on, at least today. And I would be glad to have questions from you on these things.

QUESTIONS

PRESIDENT'S RELATIONSHIP WITH WESTERN STATES

Q. Mr. President, I'm from Colorado, and there is a lot of talk down in Colorado and other parts of the West, particularly the Rockies and so forth, about the alienation between the President and the West. How do you react to that in your hitlist and so forth and the water policy?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, there have been similar articles about the alienation between me and minority groups, between me and the farmers, between me and the cities, between me and the Congress, between me and the Soviets, between me and the West Germans, and so forth. You know, there's always that inclination. I think we've got a good relationship in the West.

My hope is before too long to visit Colorado in person and to meet with those who are particularly interested in our water policy and also to meet with some of the farmers in perhaps the western part of your State. We're trying to prepare a trip for me, maybe sometime next month. We haven't settled on a date yet. But I would like to do this. I think that our water policy will be acceptable to the people of Colorado.

It's not yet reached my desk. But all of the agencies in the Federal Government who are involved in this, both those who build dams—Interior and the Corps of Engineers—those who have agriculture policy that relates to irrigation—the Energy Department, EPA—have participated in this water policy evolution.

I think that it's entirely inevitable that all elements of it will not be attractive for any person. Some of the decisions I make will be very difficult and close decisions. But we've never in the past had a comprehensive water policy. And I think in the future it will be an excellent guide to local and State people who will retain full control that they presently have over their water allocations.

It will also be an excellent guide for me and future Presidents and for the Congress. So, for the first time, we can work in harmony with some predictability about what we do see as major needs in the development of our water resources in this country. Also, I think it would tend to prevent future confrontations when inadequate or improper priorities are established for the expenditure of Federal and other funds.

So, my belief is that the furor that's been created by an addressing of this question will soon abate, and the ultimate outcome will be a great alleviation of tensions, misappropriations, and divisiveness between the Federal Government and other elements in and of our society.

ALASKA

Q. While we are in the West, could I take you further north, Mr. President, to Alaska?

THE PRESIDENT. Fine.

Q. You have not visited Alaska since your early campaign or since you became President. And I wondered if since we are really a developing nation up north—[laughter]—whether you had any plans to visit Alaska; secondly, if you plan to throw your weight behind any effort with Congress to alleviate the oil glut caused by the Alaska pipeline on the west coast, by working out a tradeoff of oil with Japan; and thirdly, if you would just speak a moment about your feeling about the balance between the necessity to develop Alaska as the energy storehouse for the country and a storehouse of national interest lands?

I'm sure you are aware of the debate going on about that now.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, you had several questions that would take a long time and would really tax my ability also. [Laughter]

I did go to Alaska during my campaign. It was when nobody knew who I was and not much attention was paid to my visit. [Laughter] I was there in June of 1975—

Q. I know you were.

THE PRESIDENT.—and went to a reception on my behalf. I made a speech and attended a major Democratic meeting. I think it was on Senator Gravel's birthday when I was there. So, I've visited there. But I would like to come back.

I think the temporary, excessive supplies of oil about which you are concerned is a worldwide phenomenon. I just came back from Venezuela and Nigeria. They are both concerned about the fact that their present oil sales are much less than they were a year ago because of decreased demand.

One of the reasons for that is that there have been new sources of oil coming into the world market—Alaska is obviously a notable example—increasingly from Mexico, the North Sea supplies. That's a transient development, as you know.

And very quickly in our country, if present trends continue, particularly enhanced by the fact that we want to reduce imports from other nations, I think the Alaskan oil supplies will be absorbed eagerly by the rest of this continent.

We have proposed to the Congress now, as you know, after months, years of very careful deliberations, since and before I became President, the allocation of lands in Alaska in accordance with a congressional mandate. I believe that Cecil Andrus has done a very fine job. The committees have now considered part of those things, have made a few changes in them. But we are trying to be fair about the setting aside of more than adequate opportunities for economic investment and development of Alaska and, at the same time, preserve the precious portions of Alaska, hopefully in perpetuity. There are some other regions in between that will be preserved for a limited period of time, to be released for future development in years to come by the Congress and my successors in office.

I think that Alaska is obviously, you know, cherished by the rest of the country. I think everybody is proud of the frontier spirit that has exemplified Alaska's rapid development. I think all of us who are familiar with the political needs have seen the shock that's come to Alaska—maybe an over-anticipation of oil revenues and now a dampened world market that causes some concern; increased transportation cost of your oil has to be absorbed by you; the fires that have occurred and the other damage to the pipeline cause a temporary aberration.

On the west coast in particular, we do have a problem. There is a question, as you know, that has not yet been addressed about the transfer of any oil from the west coast to other markets. I'm reluctant to inject this into the present congressional deliberations. I think that initiative really should come from the Congress. We believe that the passing of the energy legislation will help to provide Alaska with a much more predictable future, both in natural gas and in oil.

And we're trying, in the congressional deliberations on natural gas pricing, the incremental pricing in particular, not to create any problem that would preclude an orderly and rapid construction of the natural gas pipeline.

It's such a complicated subject, I just hit a few high points. I hope you will forgive my not being more thorough.

CAMPAIGN PLANS

Q. Mr. President, do you plan to campaign in Massachusetts for the Democrat who will run against Brooke?

THE PRESIDENT. I haven't decided yet. I'll be going out probably on four or five trips this year to campaign. But I don't have any plans at this time to go to Massachusetts. I'm not campaigning against anybody in any case. Ed Brooke is a fine Senator. I don't know who his opponent would be. I just really haven't decided that at all.

ISRAEL'S DEFENSE CAPABILITY

Q. Mr. President, I wondered if it is your impression that Israel has nuclear weapons, and if so, how does this affect your judgment of the capacity of Israel to defend itself in a difficult time?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, our policy is to accept the statement of the Israelis concerning their nuclear weapon capability. I don't have any independent information beyond that.

My own belief is that Israel is completely capable of defending themselves with conventional weapons alone, against any foreseeable attack now or in the years to come. We have participated with the Israelis in developing their defense capability. They are a proud and deeply committed nation. They have been willing, even eager, to sacrifice when necessary to guarantee their own security, not only economically but with the lives of their own people.

And because of that spirit that Israel has and a long-time commitment to putting security as a top priority of their nation, even when they didn't have adequate support from the rest of the world, my belief is that now and in the foreseeable future they will be strong enough to defend themselves.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

Q. Mr. President, General Torrijos has filed a letter in the United Nations expressing his concerns about the DeConcini reservation to the Panama Canal treaties. I'm wondering, first, if you are fearful that these objections could jeopardize ratification of the second treaty; and secondly, whether, when you acquiesced in the DeConcini reservation, you perceived it as a source of continuing trouble in American-Panamanian relations.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think any sort of change or unpredictable development could endanger the passage of the second Panama treaty in the Senate, because it hangs by a thread. The support that we have is very tenuous in some instances. And I think the answer to your first question is yes.

Any statement, even if it's well based, by the Panamanians that would cause consternation or doubt in the minds of U.S. Senators could very well endanger the passage of the second treaty.

The DeConcini amendment is not what I would have preferred, but I think it's accurate to point out that the text of the treaties specifically says, in language that General Torrijos and I personally wrote down, that we do not have any intention nor right to interfere in the internal affairs of Panama.

That language remained intact. There was no successful attempt made—I don't even know if there was an attempt made—to change that language. So, that stands as a prevailing factor. The reservation cannot contravene the text of the treaty itself. There was no substantial effort made to amend it.

We obviously are a member of the United Nations. We're a member of the Organization of American States. Their charters, to which we adhere without equivocation, specifically state that there would be no intervention in the internal affairs of other nations in this hemisphere or, in the case of the United Nations, in the entire world. So, I don't see how the DeConcini amendment, because of a couple of words that might be interpreted two or three ways, could be considered as an intent of this Nation to intervene in the internal affairs of Panama, contrary to the three specific binding elements of the international charters that we will have upon us: the U.N. Charter, the OAS charter, and the text of the treaty itself.

And I think that after the Senate gets through with the treaties, a statement that I've just made to you should be adequate to alleviate any problem. And obviously, I've just made to you should be adequate DeConcini and to the other Members of the Senate.

We're not trying in the Panama Canal treaties to throw out the basic charter of the international organizations in which we participate.

Q. Could I follow that for a moment, please?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. Do you plan to do the same kind of lobbying effort you did for the neutrality treaty as for this one?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. We consider the ratification of the Panama Canal treaties to be crucial to us, to our Nation's welfare, benefit, future; our relationships diplomatically, economically, militarily in this hemisphere; and to prove that we believe what we preach in the area of human rights, treating other nations as equals. I think our own security interests are adequately protected in the Panama Canal treaties. So, they are that important to us. And I would do anything that's proper, within the limit of my power, to secure ratification of both treaties.

FARM LEGISLATION

Q. Mr. President, in view of the plight of the American farmer, do you feel that maybe the American farmer is expecting or asking for too much too fast?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as you know, I'm not only concerned about the plight—my background has been as a farmer; every one of my ancestors for more than almost 300 years in this country has been farmers—I've worked on this problem as much as I have any other single issue that faces the Congress. I think that the legislation passed last year by the Congress, signed by me, is adequate. It's already brought about a substantial improvement in the well-being of farm families in this country since it went into effect the first day of October. Farm prices had reached a bottom in September. And I think since then there's been good progress.

We do have market problems. You know, we could raise our prices, at the expense of other taxpayers, to the farmers and create a very healthy economic situation—no matter what the weather was, no matter how much the production was. But we would cut off the opportunity for export of our agricultural products, because they would be noncompetitive and we could break the budget. So, I think that the action that has already been taken in the '77 act, plus the administrative decisions that were announced by the Vice President while I was away on my trip, worked out with the Secretary of Agriculture, are adequate. I don't think they are excessive, but I think they are adequate. And I think that the present trend of increased economic well-being of farmers is almost inevitably going to continue.

Q. Can I follow up on that, Mr. President?

THE PRESIDENT. Please.

Q. You are quoted as having said on Wednesday that the farm bill would be not only inflationary but would be bad for the farmers. Now, in what respect would it be bad for the farmers?

THE PRESIDENT. You're talking about the Dole bill?

Q. About the farm bill.

THE PRESIDENT. Well if the Dole bill comes to my desk, I wouldn't hesitate 5 minutes to veto it.

You have to remember that one of the major elements of a stable income for farmers is exports. About 1 out of every 3 acres in the United States of our agricultural land is devoted to producing crops for export. That's one thing. Excessive prices would be a damper on how much product we could export.

Another thing is that the Dole bill, which was not adequately considered and, I think, was primarily motivated by politics, completely bypasses the administrative procedures that were continued and enhanced by the 1977 act. It's designed only for 1 year. So, you would throw all of the administrative mechanism, which is very complicated already, out the door, implement just for a few months the so-called Dole bill provisions, and then you would come back with the basic agricultural act after the end of 1 year.

Also, this flexible parity that's been introduced by the Dole amendment is one that's never been assessed economically. It's never been proven. Nobody has ever tried to administer it. What it means is that if a farmer dropped his acreage planted by a third, he would have a commensurate increase in the price supports for his particular farm products. And to keep track of every individual bushel of wheat and how much it would bring in the marketplace, depending upon how much that particular farmer took out of production, would be an administrative nightmare.

I think it would create so much confusion in the farm economy that it would be detrimental, not only to the farmers but to the consumers.

I haven't mentioned the consumers. I think you probably noticed that it would probably increase food prices alone more than 5 percent.

MR. WURFEL. Thank you, sir.

THE PRESIDENT. I'm sorry I don't have more time for questions. I know you will be meeting with a lot of other people in the White House. I particularly wanted, if you have no objections to your coming by and let us get a photograph with each one of you together. [Laughter] If there are any of you who don't want to get a photograph with me, I won't be embarrassed. [Laughter] Or if you get one, you can hide it when you get it back home.

I wish I had time to talk to you, but since we are pressed for time and they are a large group, let's just shake hands.

I particularly want to see Reg Murphy and my old friends from Georgia. He was the editor of our major newspaper in our State before he went to San Francisco. Reg, glad to see you here. Thank you very much.

Bonn Economic Summit Conference

Joint Statement by Heads of State and Government. April 10, 1978

The Heads of State and Government of Canada, France, Germany, Italy,

Japan, the United Kingdom, and the United States of America have agreed to hold the next Summit meeting in Bonn at the invitation of Chancellor Schmidt on July 16 and 17. The European Community will be represented by the President of the Council and the President of the Commission in sessions dealing with matters within the Community's competence. The meeting will provide an occasion for the participants to review the world economic situation and to give impetus to national and international approaches that can contribute to a healthier world economy.

The world faces serious and interrelated economic problems. Their resolution requires approaches in various areas that, taken together, will reinforce each other in improving the economic situation. The interrelated issues to be addressed include the achievement of more rapid global growth with further progress in reducing inflation, energy, trade, international monetary matters, and the cooperation between industrial and developing countries. These issues must be tackled by individual countries in a mutually supportive manner. The Summit participants will work to this end in developing their policies and in preparing for the July meeting.

Social Security Financing Legislation

April 10, 1978

I will be releasing a statement today reiterating this Administration's position that the 1977 social security financing legislation should not be changed this year. The tax increases in that legislation have saved the system from bankruptcy, protected our older citizens, and insured current workers of a sound retirement system when they retire. The magnitude of the tax increase has been exaggerated in the press and the significant increases do not occur for several years.

In my view, it would be better to act on reform of social security in a more deliberate fashion next year than to risk ill-considered legislation through hasty action this year. Congress recognized the need for careful study by creating several study groups as part of the 1977 Act.

A short-term payroll tax cut is not a substitute for the comprehensive tax reform and reduction proposals I have presented to the Congress. Those proposals will offset the higher payroll taxes for the majority of individuals, improve the fairness of our tax system, and sustain economic growth. I urge you to oppose any plan which would reduce payroll taxes at the expense of income tax reductions.

Enactment of our tax reform and reduction proposals would be a more prudent and responsible step than stop-gap action on payroll taxes. We stand ready to work with the Congress on reform in social security next year.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

NOTE: This is the text of identical letters addressed to Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., Speaker of the House of Representatives, Robert C. Byrd, majority leader of the Senate, Senator Russell B. Long, and Representative Al Ullman.

Social Security Financing Legislation

White House Statement. April 10, 1978

We are very concerned about current efforts to amend the recently passed social security financing legislation. Upon signing the bill, the President praised the Congress for its political courage in voting for the taxes necessary to restore the financial integrity of the social security system. He did so, even though the bill adopted a financing plan different and more expensive than we had proposed.

It would be a mistake for the Congress to retreat from the 1977 legislation so soon after its passage. Hasty action now could result in ill-considered legislation which might again place the trust funds in jeopardy.

It is often forgotten that those taxes pay for important benefits for our people. Our first priority must be the protection of the social security system and the restoration of confidence of those who support it and those who benefit.

Much of the concern about the 1977 legislation appears to be the result of misinformation. News articles have asserted that the law would triple the payroll tax burden on workers and employers. That is simply not so. The correct measure of burden is the percentage of earnings which is devoted to the social security tax. By that measure, the payroll tax burden on the average worker, and the worker earning the maximum covered wage, will increase from 6.05 percent in 1978 to 7.15 percent in 1987. The high-income worker earning $30,000 today will experience a more substantial percentage increase from 3.5 percent in 1978 to 5.9 percent in 1987, because the payroll tax has become more progressive. These increases in tax burden are far smaller than those so often mentioned. We believe that most Americans would agree that this is a reasonable price to pay to ensure that the social security system is once again made sound.

Moreover, the President's proposals to reduce income taxes will more than compensate most workers for the increases in payroll taxes. The reform of the income tax is part of a carefully coordinated economic program, which will improve the equity of the Federal tax system and sustain economic growth. We urge the Congress to focus its attention on those fundamental proposals, rather than a short-term reduction in the payroll tax.

Anti-Inflation Policy

Remarks to Members of the American Society of Newspaper Editors Announcing the Administration's Policy. April 11, 1978

President Patterson, future President Hughes, distinguished editors from around the Nation, ladies and gentlemen:

I realize that this is one of the most important and prestigious conventions held in our entire country. This has been impressed upon me by several of the editorials I've read from around the Nation's newspapers. [Laughter] However, in the local morning paper, the story was on page D-13, next to the used automobile ads, a place that I thought was reserved for corrections and apologies. [Laughter]

We had a difficult time deciding what I should discuss with you this afternoon. One of our staff members finally suggested that we choose a major problem which we have not yet solved. [Laughter] This took 2 or 3 days. And we finally decided on one of the least difficult ones—inflation, energy, and the value of the dollar.

I am delighted to be with you to discuss this important subject.

During the last 15 months, we in the United States have made good progress in sustaining growth and in creating jobs. Four-and-a-half million more people are at work today than 15 months ago, an unprecedented increase in job availability. The unemployment rate has dropped from about 8 percent to just a little more than 6 percent. Average household income after adjustment for both taxes and inflation is 5 percent higher now than it was a year ago. Business profits in the second half of 1977, compared to the year before that, are 15 percent higher. And during this time in 1977, the inflation rate was held to a reasonable and a predictable level.

But too many Americans—particularly young people and members of minority groups—are still without jobs. I'm determined to sustain our economy's progress toward high employment and rising real income with both existing programs and with new, very carefully targeted incentives to encourage private business to hire the hardcore unemployed.

We have other economic problems which cause us continuing deep concern. Our Nation's economic health can be protected only if we can cope with the two developments that now threaten it most seriously—the high level of oil imports, and the increasing rate of inflation. These two problems both imperil our economic recovery and threaten the strength of the dollar. Both must be controlled.

The steps that we will take are part of a wider international effort by the major industrial nations to promote world recovery in 1978. In this effort, each country has a certain role to play, with the United States maintaining its growth while attacking inflation and limiting oil imports, other countries achieving their growth targets, which we have done, and all countries avoiding protectionism and providing greater aid for developing nations.

In the hope that this concerted effort will make a large contribution to world recovery, I joined the leaders of six other nations yesterday in announcing that we will meet on July 16 and 17 in Bonn, Germany, to press ahead with our common efforts. But the first requirement is effective action within each nation.

The primary reason for our problems with the balance of trade and the decreas-ing value of the dollar is no mystery. Ten years ago we were paying roughly $2 billion a year for imported oil. This year, oil imports will cost us more than $45 billion.

Our energy problems are no longer theoretical or potential. They are an active threat to the economic well-being of our people.

Of all the major countries in the world, the United States is the only one without a national energy policy, and because the Congress has not acted, other nations have begun to doubt our will. Holders of dollars throughout the world have interpreted our failure to act as a sign of economic weakness, and these views have been directly translated into a decreasing value for our currency.

The falling dollar in international monetary markets makes inflation worse here at home. It raises the price of goods that we import, and this makes it easier for domestic producers to raise their own prices as well, because the competition is not still there.

That's why we simply must have meaningful energy legislation without further delay. Our security depends on it, and our economy demands it. If Congress does not act, then oil imports will have to be limited by administrative action under present law, and this is certainly not the most desirable solution. But one way or the other, oil imports must be reduced.

Recently, our healthy and sustained economic growth has exceeded that of most other nations who are our major trading partners. So, we've been better able to buy their goods than they have to buy our own.

Our standard of living and our ability to grow depend upon the raw materials and the goods that we import from other countries. Therefore, to prevent further serious trade imbalances, we need to export more agricultural products and other goods and services to pay for our purchases abroad.

A Cabinet-level task force, headed by the Secretary of Commerce, will develop these additional measures for me to promote exports and report back within 60 days.

Now I will discuss the steps that we must take to protect our national economic growth and the jobs and the prosperity of our people from the most serious threat of growing inflation.

Conserving energy, increasing efficiency and productivity, eliminating waste, reducing oil imports, expanding our exports will help to fight inflation. But making the fight a success will require firm government policies and full private cooperation.

The inflation that we are suffering today began many years ago and was aggravated in 1973 and 1974 by a quadrupling of OPEC oil prices, widespread crop shortages, excessive Soviet grain purchases, substantial devaluation of the dollar, and a worldwide industrial boom that led to double-digit inflation both here in the United States and around the world. Inflation has now become embedded in the very tissue of our economy. It has resisted the most severe recession in a generation. It persists because all of us—business, labor, farmers, consumers—are caught on a treadmill which none can stop alone. Each group tries to raise its income to keep up with present and anticipated rising costs, and eventually we all lose the inflationary battle together.

There are no easy answers. We will not solve inflation by increasing unemployment. We will not impose wage and price controls. We will work with measures that avoid both these extremes.

Our first and most direct efforts are within government itself. Where government contributes to inflation, that contribution must be lessened; where government expenditures are too high, that spending must be reduced; where government imposes an inflationary burden on business, labor, and the consumers, those burdens must be lightened; wherever government can set an example of restraint and efficiency, it must do so.

The budget that I've proposed for the next fiscal year is both tight and capable of meeting the Nation's most pressing needs. The prospective deficit in the budget is as large as we can afford without compromising our hopes for a balanced economic growth and a declining inflation rate. But, as always, pressures are developing on all sides to increase spending and to enlarge the deficit.

Potential outlay increases in the 1979 budget which are now being considered seriously by congressional committees would add between $9 billion and $13 billion to spending levels next year. The price of some of these politically attractive programs would escalate rapidly in future years. I'm especially concerned about tuition tax credits, highway and urban transit programs, postal service financing, farm legislation, and defense spending. By every means at my disposal, I will resist these pressures and protect the integrity of the budget.

Indeed, as opportunities arise, we must work to reduce the budget deficit and to ensure that beyond 1979 the deficit declines steadily and moves us toward a balanced budget. I will work closely with the Congress, and if necessary, I will exercise my veto authority to keep the 1979 budget deficit at or below the limits that I've proposed.

The Federal Government must also act directly to moderate inflation. Two months ago I proposed that in each industry and each sector of our economy that wage and price increases this year be voluntarily held substantially below the average wage increases for the last 2 years. I'm determined to take the lead in breaking the wage and price spiral by holding Federal pay increases down.

Last year Federal white-collar salaries rose by more than 7 percent. I intend to propose a limit of about 5½ percent this year, thereby setting the example for labor and industry to moderate price and wage increases.

This year I will also freeze the pay of all executive appointees in the Federal Government and members of my own senior staff. I believe that those who are most privileged in our Nation—including other executives in government and also in the private sector—should set a similar example of restraint.

State and local governments employ every seventh worker in our Nation, and I've sent letters this week to every Governor and to the mayors of our major cities, asking that they follow the Federal example and hold down their pay increases.

I've also asked that if those governments plan to reduce taxes that they first consider lowering sales taxes, which add directly to the consumer's burden.

The Federal Government will take several other steps to reduce inflation.

All executive branch agencies will avoid or reduce the purchase of goods or services whose prices are rapidly rising, unless by so doing we would seriously jeopardize our national security or create serious unemployment. I'm also asking that all new or renegotiated Federal contracts which contain price escalation clauses should reflect the principle of deceleration.

We must cut the inflationary costs which private industry bears as a result of government regulations.

Last month I directed executive regulatory agencies under my control to minimize the adverse economic consequences of their own actions. I'm determined to eliminate unnecessary regulations and to ensure that future regulations do not impose unnecessary costs to the American economy. Our efforts to reorganize the Federal bureaucracy and to streamline the civil service, vitally important, will help us put the Government's house in order.

I support "sunset" legislation to ensure that we review these regulatory measures and programs every few years and eliminate or change those that have become outdated.

I also urge congressional budget committees to report regularly to the Congress on the inflationary effect of pending legislation, much as the Council of Economic Advisers and the Council on Wage and Price Stability do to me now.

The combined actions of my administration and the Civil Aeronautics Board have already led to substantial cuts in some airline passenger fees. Despite the opposition of private interests, the airline regulatory reform legislation must be enacted this year. We are also reexamining excessive Federal regulation of the trucking industry, an effort which may result in increased efficiency while reducing freight transportation costs and retail prices.

In addition, I'm asking the independent regulatory agencies to try to reduce inflation when they review rate changes and to explore regulatory changes that can make the regulated industries more efficient.

Last fall, major new legislation was passed which will improve economic conditions for farm families, and we've announced additional administrative action to raise farm income this year.

Unfortunately, the Senate has just passed a bill that would raise food prices by 3 percent and the overall cost of living by four-tenths of 1 percent, would shatter confidence in the crucial export markets for America's farm products, create havoc with the administrative machinery of the Department of Agriculture, and cripple American farm families through increased costs. It's bad for farmers, it's bad for the consumers, it's bad for our Nation.

I will veto any farm legislation, beyond what I have already recommended, that would lead to higher food costs or budget expenditures.

Housing construction rates have been running about 2 million a year, and this has caused costs to go up rapidly, partly because of sharp increases in the prices of raw material, such as lumber. Since lumber accounts for about one-fourth of the cost of a new house, we can obtain some relief by increasing production and using our existing lumber output more efficiently. Therefore, I've instructed the Departments of Agriculture and Interior, the Council on Environmental Quality, and also my economic advisers, to report to me within 30 days on the best ways to sustain expanded timber harvests from Federal, State, and private lands, and other means of increasing lumber yields in ways that would be environmentally acceptable, economically efficient, and consistent with sound budget policy.

Daily hospital costs have jumped from $15 in 1950 to over $200 today. And physicians' fees have gone up 75 percent faster than other consumer prices.

It's very important that Congress act now on the proposed hospital cost containment bill as the most effective means that we can take toward reasonable hospital prices. Failure of Congress to act on the hospital cost containment legislation will cost the taxpayers of our country more than $18 billion in needless Government spending over the next 5 years.

Together with the airline deregulation bill, this is one of the two most important measures the Congress can pass to prevent inflation.

These measures so far have been delayed by the opposition of powerful lobbying groups. I will continue to give this legislation my full support, and I call on the leaders of Congress to do the same.

Such Government actions as I've discussed briefly can be important steps toward controlling inflation. But it is a myth that the Government itself can stop inflation. Success or failure in this overall effort will be largely determined by the actions of the private sector of our economy.

I expect industry and labor to keep price, wage and salary increases significantly below the average rate for the last 2 years. Those who set medical fees, legal and other professional fees, college tuition rates, insurance premiums, and other service charges must also join in. This will not be easy. But the example of Federal action must be matched. Inflation cannot be solved by placing the burden of fighting it only on a few.

The Council on Wage and Price Stability recently began a series of meetings with representatives of business and of labor in major industries such as steel, automobiles, aluminum, paper, railroads, food processing, communications, lumber, and the Postal Service. In consultation with these private parties and others, the Council will identify the rate at which prices, wages, and other costs have been rising in recent years, the outlook for the year ahead, and the steps that can be taken to reduce inflation.

Let me be blunt about this point: I am asking American workers to follow the example of Federal workers and accept a lower rate of wage increase. In return, they have a right to expect a comparable restraint in price increases for the goods and services they buy.

Our national interest simply can't withstand unreasonable increases in wages and prices. It's my responsibility to speak out firmly and clearly when the welfare of our people is at stake.

Members of my administration have already discussed this deceleration program with a number of leaders of labor, business, and industry. Many have already promised their cooperation.

Later, I expect to meet with business and labor leaders to discuss contributions that they can make to help slow the rate of inflation. One of the most important contributions that they can make is to show that restraint applies to everyone—not just the men and women in the assembly line but also the managers in the executive suites. Just as I will freeze the pay of the top executives in the Federal Government, the American people will expect similar restraint from the leaders of American business and labor.

I'm determined to devote the power of my office toward the objective of reduced inflation. Our approach must be flexible enough to account for the variations in our complex economy, but it must be comprehensive enough to cover most of the activities of our economy.

In the long run, we should develop special programs to deal with individual sectors of the economy where government actions have the greatest potential for reducing inflation. These include housing, medical care, food, transportation, energy, and the primary metals industry.

The members of my Cabinet will work individually and also with the Council on Wage and Price Stability to develop and to announce early action to reduce inflation within their own areas of responsibility.

To accomplish our deceleration goals in the private sector, I'm asking my Special Trade Representative, Robert Strauss, to take on additional duties as a special counselor on inflation. He will work directly with me, with Treasury Secretary Blumenthal, my chief financial spokesman, with Charlie Schultze, the Chairman of the Council on Wage and Price Stability, and its Executive Director, Barry Bosworth. He will have specific authority to speak for me in the public interest and will be a member of the Steering Committee of the Economic Policy Group under the chairmanship of Secretary Blumenthal.

Reducing the inflation rate will not be easy, and it will not come overnight. We must admit to ourselves that we will never cope successfully with this challenge until we face some unpleasant facts about ourselves, about the solutions, and about our problems.

The problems of this generation are, in a way, more difficult than those of a generation before. We face no sharply focused crisis or threat which might make us forget our differences and rally to the defense of the common good.

We all want something to be done about our problems, except when the solutions affect us. We want to conserve energy, but not to change our wasteful habits. We favor sacrifice, so long as someone else goes first. We want to abolish tax loopholes, unless it's our loophole. We denounce special interests, except for our own.

No act of Congress, no program of our Government, no order of mine as President can bring out the quality that we need: to change from the preoccupation with self that can cripple our national will, to a willingness to acknowledge and to sacrifice for the common good.

As the Nation prepared for the challenge of war nearly 40 years ago, Walter Lippmann addressed these words to the American people, and I quote from him: "You took the good things for granted," he said. "Now you must earn them again. It is written: For every right that you cherish, you have a duty which you must fulfill. For every hope that you entertain, you have a task that you must perform. For every good that you wish could happen . . . you will have to sacrifice your comfort and ease. There is nothing for nothing any longer."

These words of admonition certainly apply to us now.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 1:31 p.m. in the International Ballroom West at the Washington Hilton Hotel. His remarks were broadcast live on radio and television.

In his opening remarks, the President referred to Eugene C. Patterson, outgoing president of the society, and John Hughes, who is replacing Mr. Patterson.

THE PRESIDENT'S NEWS CONFERENCE OF APRIL 11, 1978

EUGENE C. PATTERSON. Mr. President, we would like to request that you respond to questions of the members of ASNE, and I will recognize John Hughes of the Christian Science Monitor to ask the first question.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES

MR. HUGHES. Mr. President, whatever the reaction to your economic speech here today, it seems clear that this administration faces a continuing image problem. You, sir, came into office with an image of freshness, with promises of efficiency and reform, and above all, with promises to run an open administration, close to the public. But after 15 months, the polls seem to indicate declining public hope in your administration.

Some of our newspapers criticize you for being indecisive and above all had said that the Presidency, far from being open, is increasingly dependent on a small group of intimate advisers.

Whether these charges are fair or unfair, sir, are you concerned by this dramatic shift in image, and if so, how do you hope to redress the situation?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I don't agree that there is a dramatic shift in image. I think the poll results have been fairly stable for the last 4 or 5 months. And as has been the case with previous Presidents, after the flush of victory is over and the very difficult responsibilities descend on the shoulders of a President, the high expectations of the people that the problems would be resolved overnight tend to cause a deterioration in public expectancy and sometimes a feeling of discouragement.

We have deliberately addressed some of the more difficult and intransigent, even historic, problems of our country. And we are having, I think, good progress in resolving most of these problems.

In domestic affairs, we've begun to reorganize the Government. Every proposal that I put to the Congress so far has been accepted. We formed a new Department of Energy. The Congress has now been working for 12 months on a comprehensive energy policy.

These are the same matters that were addressed when Harry Truman was President back in 1948—deregulation of natural gas, dealing with excessive energy consumption. They are extremely controversial, very difficult.

We've put forward our proposals on economic stimulus. And I believe that last year we achieved a remarkable degree of success in meeting the goals that we had set for our administration, with unemployment dropping drastically, as I've already pointed out, inflation holding steady, good economic growth.

We've, I think, helped to revitalize the interest not only of our own country but our European allies in the strength of NATO, a recommitment to a long-range military program that will recommit that Alliance.

We are dealing with a very difficult Middle East problem. And I think if anyone would take an inventory of what did occur a year ago, what circumstance did prevail, the progress that has been made—although success is still doubtful—is notable.

We are making good, steady progress on the SALT negotiations, a subject that has been a matter of public international debate for decades. I think that we have a good prospect this year of having a success in that respect. For the first time, we are addressing actual reducing the number of atomic weapons held by ourselves and the Soviet Union.

We are making good progress along with the British and the Soviets with a comprehensive test ban, for the first time prohibiting, if we are successful, the testing of any atomic explosions, either military weapons or peaceful devices, an unprecedented attempt at a very difficult subject.

I think it's accurate to say that a year or so ago, almost everyone felt that the nuclear genie was out of the bottle, that many of the nations that don't have atomic explosive capability were on the verge of achieving it through the free sale of reprocessing plants around the world. I think that's now been stopped.

I think our effort to put forward an image of our country that would give us a source of pride in human rights has had a profound impact around the world. I don't think there's a single leader of a nation anywhere that's not now constantly aware of the question of "how my country, how my actions are measuring up against international standards in preserving basic human rights."

So, we've got a lot of things that we haven't yet solved. We are trying to deal with them—energy, inflation, continued government efficiency, welfare reform, tax reform. But I think the Congress has had a notable achievement.

I feel at ease with the job, I've enjoyed it. I roll easily with the punches of criticism, whether I think it's deserved or not deserved. Our poll status is holding steady at this point. And I think with a few successes, which I do predict, maybe the polls would even go up a little.

So, I think in general, I could characterize our administration as dealing with some of the most difficult questions that face our Nation without restraint and without attention being given to the political consequences of possible failure, and I believe that the successes in the future will prove that we were right. I'll keep the other answers briefer.

MR. HUGHES. I think my colleague from Boston, Mr. Winship, might like to take that a little further.

THE PRESIDENT. Tom, good to see you.

VIEWS ON THE PRESIDENCY

MR. WINSHIP. I can't resist saying how satisfying it is to all of us to finally see you live, if it were, at an ASNE convention. As you remember, I think we had a couple of encounters, rather shaky telephonic communications, once from the opposite sides of a picket line in Washington and once from Honolulu. And it's nice to see you here.

My question: You've been in office 15 months, roughly. How comfortable do you feel in the job, what is your biggest surprise that you've encountered in this job, and do you definitely plan to run for reelection?

THE PRESIDENT. The answer to your last question is no, I don't definitely plan to run for reelection. I've not addressed that question at all.

Secondly, my biggest surprise—I guess you mean in the nature of a disappointment—I think I have found that it's much easier for me in my own administration to evolve a very complex proposal for resolving a difficult issue than it is for Congress to pass legislation and to make that same decision.

The energy legislation is one example. I never dreamed a year ago in April when I proposed this matter to the Congress that a year later it still would not be resolved. I think I've got a growing understanding of the Congress, its limitations and its capabilities, and also its leadership, which was a new experience for me altogether, never having lived nor served in the Federal Government in Washington.

As far as my attitude toward the job is concerned, I like it. I've got a good staff. We have now evolved, I think, a good means by which we address major issues and let everyone's views be known. We sometimes have, contrary to what Mr. Hughes said, too open an examination of our debate process and decisionmaking process, where the news media quite often takes a preliminary proposal by a Secretary or a matter that we are considering as a final judgment, and I only make one judgment, which is then released to the press. That's been a problem for us. I think I've got an outstanding Cabinet. After this first 15 months, there is none on the Cabinet that I would have preferred to have changed. I'm very satisfied with them. I hope they're also satisfied.

So, I like the job. I feel at ease with it. I'm doing the best I can with difficult problems. All Presidents have shared them. And I think, compared to my predecessors, we've done okay.

WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS

Q. Mr. President, I'm Abe Rosenthal, the New York Times. In your speech you've taken a position against imposed wage and price controls.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. And yet in your speech, you yourself impose wage controls on the Federal part of the work force. That's not very voluntary. And you also talk about a Federal pricing policy. Do you have any mental tripwire at which point you will say that this country must have an imposed wage and price control policy, that the inflation has gone too high and that voluntarism simply has not worked?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I do not. I think even if inflation should continue to escalate and reach a very high level, that wage and price controls, mandatory wage and price controls, would be ill-advised and also counterproductive. I don't think they would work. The only instance in which I can think wage and price controls might be applied would be a case of national emergency, like an all-out war, some tragedy of that kind, where normal economic processes would not be at work.

I don't think that my dealing with the wages of people that I appoint or whose executive management is my responsibility is under the category of wage and price controls. I think that the normal processes of wages will be observed, and I hope that the Federal Government can break the deadlock that now exists between the private and public sector by setting an example.

I think that what I have proposed in the top executives in my own staff members having no increases this year, and a 5½-percent increase for the white-collar workers of the Federal Government, is reasonable. But I can't imagine any circumstance under which I would favor mandatory wage and price controls.

WAGE AND PRICE GUIDELINES

Q. Mr. President, Dick Harwood with the Washington Post. To further clarify your remarks on this question of wage and price restraint, are you proposing that the 5½ percent should be a standard for private wage settlements this year? And are you proposing any numerical ceiling or guideline on price increases?

THE PRESIDENT. No, the level that I have set as a target for the private sector—and it's a voluntary compliance provision—is to take the increases for the last 2 years and have the 1978 increases be less than that 2-year average. And that would apply to both prices and wages. Once we turn the corner on inflation and start with a slight downward trend instead of a continued upward trend, I think we'd have a very healthy result throughout the country without anyone suffering.

As I pointed out, all of us anticipate continued inflation. We make our plans accordingly and therefore perpetuate the inflation rate. There's an underlying inflation rate that has existed in our country now for a number of years of 6 to 6½ percent. I certainly don't want to see that underlying inflation rate increase. I would like to bring it downward, and we've set that as a goal for ourselves.

Last year we met this goal, both in inflation and also in the unemployment rate, and also in national growth rate. But I think that if everyone would voluntarily comply with the standard that I've described to you, it would be an extremely beneficial thing to our country, and no one would suffer in the process.

TUITION TAX CREDITS

Q. Mr. President, Christy Bulkeley, Danville, Illinois, Commercial News. You expressed concern about the tuition tax credits that are in Congress.

THE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Q. Do you intend to veto the bill if it reaches you as proposed, or do you see an acceptable level of tuition tax credits?

THE PRESIDENT. My present intention would be to veto any bill that was costly and which was unconstitutional. All of the proposals that I have seen in the Congress so far are both costly and unconstitutional, particularly as they apply to elementary and secondary schools. But until I see legislation actually on my desk, I couldn't give you a firm commitment that I would veto it. But unless those two provisions are corrected, that I've just described as potential defects, then I would veto it.

Q. The second question I asked was, do you see a possible compromise on a level that you would consider acceptable?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't favor tuition tax credits under any circumstance, even if it was at a very slight level, because this would inevitably rapidly grow with each succeeding budget; and the first thing that you know, tuition tax credits would be the major Federal expenditure for all education in the United States. And so, I think that tuition tax credits itself, as a subject, is very detrimental to the future of education in our country.

It gives the credits to those who need them least, and it makes the average parent who is a working class person, particularly who has his children in public schools, pay for high tax benefits for families in a higher tax group who have their children in private schools. So, I think the whole concept is fallacious, and I don't like it.

SOCIAL SECURITY FINANCING

Q. Mr. President, Jim Squires with the Orlando Sentinel Star. You did not mention a possible veto of the rollback in Congress of social security taxes. And there is a report that you might accept that rollback if it were tied to a proposal that would levy a crude oil tax and devote the revenue to financing the social security project.

Could you tell me if that report is true and if you would veto the bill if it passes in its present form?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I've made it clear to the congressional leadership in the House and the Senate that I do not favor any modification in the social security laws or financing structure this year.

The Congress, I think last year, very courageously passed social security legislation that would bring order out of chaos and put the social security reserve funds back on a sound basis for 25 or 30 years in the future. They were on the verge of bankruptcy. Also, those who are particularly affected with higher social security payments, beginning next year—not this year, by the way—are those in a higher income group who will have their retirement benefits increased.

The tax reform proposals and the tax reduction proposals submitted to Congress this year will in almost every instance more than compensate for any increase in social security payments.

So, for all those reasons, I do not favor any social security legislation this year. I can't say unequivocally that I would veto any such measure that came to my desk. My guess is that the furor that was originally raised about social security benefits, after more careful examination by the American people and the news media, has now ceased to be a burning issue. And my prediction is that the Congress will not send to me any legislation on social security.

Q. Do you see any possibility of compromise with the energy bill, of a tie between those two?

THE PRESIDENT. Not at this moment, I don't.

MINORITY GROUP OPPORTUNITIES

Q. Mr. President, I'm Bob Haiman from the St. Petersburg Times, St. Petersburg, Florida. Mr. President, this is the tenth anniversary of the report of the Kerner Commission on race problems in America. And those who look at that report and its allegations and what's happened since '68 are inclined to believe that there's been some progress for black Americans, but not much. The Carnegie Corporation, in trying to account for why we still seem to be moving toward two separate and unequal societies in this country, last night issued a report which said—very briefly, one sentence—and I quote, "It's because there seems to be no leader who is capable of evoking the nation's latent sense of conscience and mobilizing it to action."

My question, sir, is, could you be that leader, should you be that leader, are you that leader, and if you are, then how do you plan to lead?

THE PRESIDENT. I think it's incumbent on a President to speak for the Nation and particularly to speak for those citizens of our Nation who are deprived, who are needy, who are poor, who are non-influential, who are inarticulate, and who suffer because of the past discriminations that have fallen upon black people and other minority groups, and who still have their own families devastated by poverty and unemployment out of all proportion to their percentage of the national population.

We have increased greatly the economic benefits, at least the job opportunities of minority groups since I've been in office, not only in the appointments that I've made to major leaders for positions of executive authority but in other ways.

For instance, we set as a goal for the first year of our administration to have more than $100 million in Federal deposits in black-owned banks, minority-owned banks. We've reached that goal. The Congress passed legislation requiring that in the public works program, a $4 billion program, that 10 percent of this money be spent with businesses owned by minority stockholders as a dominant stockholding group. That goal has been exceeded.

We have now proposed to the Congress—and I predict immediate passage, no delay—a complete reorganization of the equal employment opportunity functions within the Federal Government. We are struggling to bring up the unemployment [employment] rate among minority citizens. And I think that in the housing area, in our urban policy program that we just put forward, all these things have been done.

So, to measure my own effectiveness as a leader in this respect is something that I am not able to do. I don't think we've achieved notable success as yet. But I think I, combining my voice with congressional leaders, those in private business, the minority organization leaders who are very evocative and very effective, the sum total of that, plus, obviously, editorial support from all of you, can make a difference.

My own belief is that minority groups have prospered in this country the last 10 years, compared to their previous circumstances. But they have a long way to go, and I feel responsible to make sure that they go that long way toward equality of opportunity in our country.

U.S.-CHINESE RELATIONS

Q. Mr. President, Bud Smyser from the Honolulu Star-Bulletin. I would like to ask about your China policy and about Taiwan in particular.

The present Peking Government says that it will not use force in the near term to settle the Taiwan question, but it will not rule out the use of force for the indefinite future. Does this reservation by Peking pose an insurmountable obstacle to our full diplomatic recognition of Peking?

THE PRESIDENT. I would not acknowledge any insurmountable obstacle in reaching the goals expressed in the Shanghai Communique, which is binding on us—and which I fully support—and binding on the People's Republic of China leaders. We recognize the concept that is shared in Taiwan and on the Mainland that there's only one China. We recognize that it's for the best interests of our own Nation to have full diplomatic relationships with China. And my hope is that over a period of months—we are not in any big hurry; neither are the People's Republic of China leaders—that we will completely realize the hopes expressed in the Shanghai Communique.

ENERGY CONSERVATION

Q. Mr. President, Al Fitzpatrick from the Beacon Journal in Akron, Ohio. You mentioned in your speech that conserving energy and that we all ought to conserve energy. I think many people have done just that. But how does one justify saving energy when those monthly utility bills continue to rise?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think the rising monthly utility bills is an additional incentive to save energy, and not a contrary factor. Obviously, when we consume more energy than we produce in our country, it means that there's a pressure on limited supplies and competition for those available supplies, and the prices go up. As the price of coal and oil go up to the consuming homeowner, they also go up to the utility companies that produce electric power.

Many utility companies around this Nation have an automatic escalator clause where, without any approval by the regulatory agency in a State, they can pass on those increased fuel costs to the consumer. Obviously, the more we can hold down our consumption of energy, the more we can save on our monthly fuel bills and the more we can hold down the increase in oil, natural gas, and coal prices.

One of the additional problems with the lack of conservation is that we've now increased our oil exports [imports] to $45 billion a year, and they comprise about 50 percent of all the oil we use. If we should have—and heaven knows, I hope we never have—another oil embargo where those supply interruptions would afflict our Nation, it would be a much more serious problem to our national security, to our own economic prosperity, and, even, national existence than it was back in 1973, when that temporary interruption took place.

So, we've got to do at least two major things, among others: Each one of us conserve the energy that we consume by every possible means; and second, to increase the production of available supplies in our country of energy—coal, which can last several hundred years, and particularly those replenishable supplies derived from wood, from solar sources, from geothermal supplies, and so forth.

SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE BERGLAND

Q. Jean Alice Small, the Daily Journal, Kankakee, Illinois, Mr. President. Recently it was reported that the Secretary of Agriculture Bergland is considering resignation from his Cabinet post because of your position on agriculture and the farm bill. May I ask if this is true? And in reference to your Cabinet, do you plan to make any Cabinet changes in the near future or after the election?

THE PRESIDENT. That report was absolutely erroneous. There was no basis for it at all. There has not been any difference of opinion between myself and Bob Bergland about agricultural policy. At the Cabinet meeting Monday morning, Bob Bergland said that, as was the case when Mark Twain said the report of his own death had been exaggerated, that he had never contemplated resigning from the Cabinet. And as a matter of fact, if Bob Bergland and I have ever disagreed on a basic agricultural policy, I'm not aware of it.

I contemplate no changes in my Cabinet. Nothing would please me better than to finish 4 years with the same Cabinet I presently have.

Q. Thank you for straightening it out.

FBI INDICTMENTS

Q. Mr. President, Bailey of the Minneapolis Tribune. Sir, the Attorney General said yesterday that 68 FBI agents will be disciplined but not prosecuted in connection with the burglary indictments, conspiracy indictments that were handed down yesterday.

Two questions related to that: Will the names of those 68 agents and the discipline applied be a matter of public record; and second, the decision not to prosecute them apparently was based on the theory that they were following orders.

I wondered whether you regard that as an appropriate reason for deciding not to prosecute a law enforcement officer who violates the law?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know whether or not they will be, whether their names will be made public. I'll have to ask the Attorney General about this. I don't know the legalities of it. I think that Griffin Bell made the right decision. He made it on his own—without consultation with me, by the way—to prosecute the ones who issued the orders.

Obviously there are some instances in the military and otherwise when a heinous crime, when committed by someone under orders, should be punished. But I think in this case the Attorney General made the right decision.

MR. PATTERSON. Thank you, Mr. President.

ELAINE BAXTER, a law student and civic activist from Iowa City, Iowa;
DEVERNE LEE CALLOWAY, a Missouri State legislator and chair of the Missouri House Education Committee;
A. ARTHUR DAVIS, an attorney in Des Moines, Iowa;
SANDY HALE, Minneapolis civic leader;
BETTY JEANNE HOLCOMB, a Lincoln, Nebr., attorney and editor for a television station there;
ERNEST HUBBELL, a Kansas City, Mo., attorney;
FRANK E. JESTRAB, an attorney in Williston, N. Dak.;
STANLEY SIEGEL, an Aberdeen, S. Dak., attorney;
ANN CARTER STITH, of St. Louis, Mo., a member of numerous commissions, boards, and committees, dealing with criminal justice and corrections.

Visit of President Nicolae Ceausescu of Romania

April 12, 1978*

PRESIDENT CARTER. This morning the people of the United States are honored by having as our guest a great leader of a great country. President Ceausescu comes here from Romania with his wife, Elena, and it is a great personal pleasure for me on behalf of our country to welcome them.

This is the fourth visit by President Ceausescu to the United States, and my predecessors have honored themselves by visiting the nation of Romania.

It's accurate to say that in the last 10 years or more, the friendly relationships between the United States and Romania have increased and improved rapidly to the satisfaction and to the benefit of our people.

Trade between our two countries in the last 10 years has been multiplied 10 times over. And because of the rapidly improving relations that still exist, we expect the volume of trade to more than double in the next 3 years.

It's also of great benefit to me as President to have a chance to consult with a national and an international leader like our guest today. Their influence as Romanian leaders throughout the international world is exceptional. Because of the strong commitments of the President and the independence of the people, Romania has been able to serve as a bridge among nations with highly divergent views and interests and among leaders who would find it difficult under some circumstances to negotiate directly with each other.

One recent notable achievement of President Ceausescu was to be instrumental in arranging the historic visit of President Sadat of Egypt to the capital of Israel in Jerusalem. Both of those countries have found in Romania an avenue of communication and understanding that's been very valuable to them, to the Middle East, and to world peace.

There are differences, obviously, between the United States and Romania, in our political system and also in our military alliances. But the factors which bind us together are much more profound and of much greater benefit to our countries. We share common beliefs. We believe in strong national sovereignty. We believe in preserving the independence of our nations and also of our people. We believe in the importance of honoring territorial integrity throughout the world. We believe in equality among nations in bilateral dealings, one with another, and also in international councils. We believe in the right of every country to be free from interference in its own internal affairs by another country. And we believe that world peace can come—which we both devoutly hope to see—through mutual respect, even among those who have some differences between us.

Our goals are also the same, to have a just system of economics and politics, to let the people of the world share in growth, in peace, in personal freedom, and in the benefits to be derived from the proper utilization of natural resources.

We believe in enhancing human rights. We believe that we should enhance, as independent nations, the freedom of our own people. And Romania has been instrumental in pursuing the goals of the Helsinki conference, in particular, building the mutual confidence factors that can let the nations of Eastern Europe and the nations of Western Europe understand one another better and build up legitimate trust through that understanding.

We also believe in a common goal—which President Ceausescu has endorsed forcefully and publicly—in the principle of world disarmament, based on mutually beneficial agreements and based on an enhanced prospect for peace.

Mr. President, Mrs. Ceausescu, on behalf of the American people, I want to extend my expression of honor that you are here and the warmest welcome to the United States.

Thank you very much.

PRESIDENT CEAUSESCU. Mr. President, esteemed Mrs. Carter:

It is with particular pleasure that myself, my wife, and the associates accompanying me are visiting again the United States at the kind invitation extended by you, Mr. President, and by Mrs. Carter.

I should like to begin by addressing to you and to the people of America the warmest greetings of the people of Romania, who are most desirous to entertain and develop friendly relations and cooperation with the great people of the United States.

Our visit here takes place at a time when the relations between Romania and the United States have seen continuous progress. Indeed, in the last 10 years, there was a significant growth in our economic exchanges, which have increased almost 10 times over, as well as in our cooperation in the field of science, culture, and in the exchange of citizens between our two countries.

I do hope that in the course of our talks these days we shall be able to identify new opportunities, so that in the forthcoming years we shall make even more significant progress in our relationship, in full accord with the basic interests of our two nations and with the interests of cooperation and peace throughout the world.

It is true, as you mentioned, sir, that our two countries have different social systems. But I believe that in the world of today this should not be an obstacle in the way of more active cooperation in all fields, based on mutual respect of each country's independence and sovereignty, renunciation of the use or threat of force, and mutually advantageous cooperation.

I would like to mention with satisfaction, as well, that it is precisely on that basis that the relations between Romania and the United States have been established and are now developing.

So, Mr. President, I think we can be satisfied with the present level of the relations between our two countries. As for the state of international affairs, unfortunately we are still facing events which are both complex and complicated.

The world is now confronted with severe economic problems. In many areas of the world there are still conflicts, and threatening clouds are menacing the peace of the world with very severe consequences.

In the face of this situation, it is now necessary for all countries, irrespective of their size, of their military might, of their social system, to take action and to uphold the principles of peaceful coexistence in order to build a kind of cooperation based on equal rights and mutual respect, and to ensure to each nation the right to develop in freedom without any outside interference.

As participants and signatories of the Helsinki documents on European security, both Romania and the United States are working for the implementation of those documents, which we both see as one whole in the economic, cultural, scientific, humanitarian fields, as well as in the field of military disengagement.

Unfortunately, at Belgrade, no significant progress was made. That is why we believe it necessary now that before our next meeting in Madrid, new efforts should be made in order to meet the peoples' aspiration for peace and cooperation.

It is also true that no effort should be spared in order to bring peace to the Middle East, leading to the withdrawal of Israel from the territories occupied as a result of 1967 war, the settlement of the Palestinian question, including the establishment of an independent Palestinian state, and by guaranteeing the independence, sovereignty, and integrity of all the states in the area, which should establish their relations on the principles of good neighborly relations and cooperation.

We would like to work together closely on such matters as disarmament. We are hopeful that at the forthcoming Special Session of the United Nations General Assembly, practical results will be worked out, leading to actual disarmament and, in particular, nuclear disarmament, enabling us thus to build a world of cooperation and peace for all.

Although the United States is a developed country—I would say a highly developed country—and Romania is still a developing one, such problems as the elimination of underdevelopment and the establishment of a new international economic order are matters of equal concern for both our countries, because without ensuring new relations, new democratic relations based on equal rights and mutual advantage, we shall not be able to eliminate underdevelopment and to ensure economic stability and progress to the world.

It is also true that there are many problems on which our two countries can well work together, and with good results, too. And I hope that our talks will further strengthen the basis for our mutual cooperation, aimed at meeting their common interests of our two nations and also meeting the aim of a better world, a world with more justice, in which each and every people should be able to dedicate their efforts to their happiness, to their well-being, to their freedom.

It is my conviction that all this will come true. And once again, I should like to express my wish to see good cooperation develop between our two nations and our wish to the friendly people of America every success and peace.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:45 a.m. on the South Lawn of the White House. President Ceausescu spoke in Romanian, and his remarks were translated by an interpreter.

River Basin Commissions

Message to the Congress Transmitting Six Reports. April 12, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I am happy to transmit the annual reports of the six river basin commissions, as required under Section 204(2) of the Water Resources Planning Act of 1965.

The Act states that commissions may be established, comprised of state and federal members, at the request of the governors of the states within the proposed commission area. Each commission is responsible for planning the best use of water and related land resources in its area and for recommending priorities for implementation of such planning. The commissions, through efforts to increase public participation in the decision process, can and do provide a forum for all people within the commission area to voice their ideas, concerns and suggestions.

The commissions submitting reports are New England, Great Lakes, Pacific Northwest, Ohio, Missouri and Upper Mississippi. The territory these six cover include parts or all of 32 states.

The enclosed annual reports indicate the activities and accomplishments of the commissions during Fiscal Year 1976. A brief description of current and potential problems, studies and approaches to solutions are included in the reports.

JIMMY CARTER

The White House,

April 12, 1978.

NOTE: The reports are entitled "New England River Basins Commission, 1976 Annual Report," "Great Lakes Basin Commission 1976 Annual Report," "Pacific Northwest River Basins Commission Annual Report, Fiscal Year 1976," "Ohio River Basin Commission 1976 Annual Report, Including Transition Period," "Missouri River Basin Commission Annual Report, Fiscal 1976 and Transitional Quarter," and "Upper Mississippi River Basin Commission."

President's Commission on White House Fellowships

Appointment of Ann S. Ramsay as a Member. April 12, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of Ann S. Ramsay as a member of the President's Commission on White House Fellowships. She replaces Julia V. Taft, who has resigned.

Ramsay, 35, is deputy secretary of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and chairman of the White House Fellows Association. She was a White House Fellow in 1972-73.

THE PRESIDENT. We're making some progress, I think.

NOTE: The President spoke at 6:50 p.m. to reporters assembled in the Briefing Room at the White House.

Earlier in the day, the House of Representatives had failed to approve the conference report on H.R. 6782 by a vote of 268 to 150.

Emergency Agricultural Legislation

Remarks on House of Representatives Action on H.R. 6782. April 12, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. As President, I'm very happy to hear that the House of Representatives has defeated by a strong majority the agriculture bill conference report. This is good for the farmers of the United States and also very good for the consumers.

This bill would have damaged very severely our Nation's export markets. It would have been a heavy blow against the livestock producers of this country. It would have been almost impossible to administer and would have added $6 billion to the Federal budget and would have put us in the double-digit inflation category in food prices.

So, the courageous action that the House has taken this afternoon is an encouraging sign that the Congress has joined in with me and will cooperate in holding down the inflation that has been of such great concern to all of us.

This is good for our farm policy. It's good in holding down inflation. It's a very encouraging sign of cooperation between the Congress and the White House in dealing with the Nation's very important problems.

Thank you very much.

REPORTER. Anything on energy?

Visit of President Ceausescu of Romania

Toasts at the State Dinner. April 12, 1978

PRESIDENT CARTER. I think it's the guests that we have, but I believe the Strolling Strings sounded better tonight than any time I've ever heard them, and I want to thank you for bringing out the best in them. I thought it was just very wonderful.

How many of you here either came from a foreign country to our Nation or had your parents or grandparents come from a foreign country? Raise your hand, if you would.

Mr. President, you can see more than half. It's obviously more than half of the people here who have come to the United States from a foreign country, most of you from Europe. And I think this in itself demonstrates vividly to our distinguished guest how close the ties are between our Nation and his and those nations that are neighbors of his.

We are indeed honored to have all of you here tonight, and particularly honored to have President Ceausescu and his wife, Elena, and the distinguished ministers of his government come to visit the White House, the First Family of our country, and the people of the United States. Mr. President, you are welcome to our country.

We paid him a special honor today, perhaps unprecedented in the history of our Nation. We played two different national anthems to Romania—[laughter]—the incorrect one this morning and the correct one tonight. And I think this gives us an excellent opportunity to judge the tremendous progress that has been made in Romania—[laughter]—because I like the one tonight much better, Mr. President.

It's always an exciting thing for us to have distinguished leaders from other nations come to visit us, and we always like to put our best foot forward and not only entertain our guests but to let them know what a great country we have.

I was particularly eager to impress the President's wife tonight, because she, on her own, is a distinguished scientist, a chemist, has done great research work. And I was very careful to place on her left someone who could speak her language about science and about whom I could brag as a distinguished American to show how superior our country was. As a matter of fact, Dr. Palade<sup>1</sup> is a Nobel laureate, and I wanted to let Mrs. Ceausescu know how advanced we were in training Americans to win the foremost prize in all the world. So, I was explaining it to her very carefully, and in the middle of my very proud dissertation, he pointed out to me he was born, raised, and trained in Romania. [Laughter] So we learned a lot about each other.

I've had a delightful day with the President of this great country. I think it's accurate to point out that as the leader of his great nation, he's not only brought tremendous progress to Romania but also has taken on a role of leadership in the entire international community that's notable.

He's been dedicated to the proposition that a nation was sovereign, that its territorial integrity should be honored, that its people should be independent, and that in spite of this complete commitment to the pride of one's own nation, that there should be bridges built, not only to other countries from your own but between other countries that have difficulty in communicating because of different political and economic organizations within their own countries.

He was one of the first leaders, I think, who saw the benefits, economically, politically, militarily, in détente, and he's been a foremost proponent in trying to bridge the gap between the Warsaw Pact nations and the NATO countries. He has a unique ability to relate easily to leaders of nations, regardless of their political commitment or orientation or background or history or conviction about the present or future status of their countries.

He's been very helpful to me and my predecessors in the White House in trying to bring messages directly from leaders with whom we don't communicate because of an absence of diplomatic interrelationships, and has provided a bridge for the easing of tensions and the better understanding on a worldwide basis.

As a member of the developing nations of the world, he's been able to be an evocative and a very effective spokesman in acquainting the industrial nations of the world about how we could interrelate more easily and more effectively with a group of countries who quite often are not well organized or not willing to sit down and calmly negotiate the way to alleviate the wide disparity in economic benefits.

He's the leader of one of the few Eastern European nations who is a member of the

Group of 77, now comprising about 95 countries. And I think this shows the breadth of his vision and the commitment that he has to bridge those gaps that I've just described.

We've got an excellent relationship with Romania. I think it's been growing steadily and on a very sound basis for the last 10 years or more.

This is the President's fourth trip to our country, and after he leaves Washington shortly, he'll be going to other places in the United States. He'll be going to Chattanooga, to Dallas, to Houston, to Orlando. He'll also be visiting New York. Unfortunately, he won't get to Georgia—[laughter]—on this trip. He's going to save that for dessert when he comes back on his next trip.

But he knows our country. He's studied it with a great deal of interest, and he's been one of the people who have made notable progress among other countries that are in the most intense disputes at this point.

I would say more than any other leader, certainly including myself, he was responsible for the historic visit of President Sadat of Egypt to Jerusalem and Israel.

By the way, the capital of Israel is Tel Aviv and not Jerusalem.<sup>2</sup>

And we have seen that this ability of his has paid rich dividends to us. Romania was one of those countries instrumental in evolving the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, that we refer to in our country most often as the Helsinki agreement. And at Belgrade, which he described this morning as a disappointment, he was very eager to try to move forward to a much more substantive accomplishment that might be realized at the next meeting, scheduled to be in Madrid.

We are very proud that the Helsinki conference agreement includes the Third Basket, which covers more deeply than ever before the question that is of profound importance to our country, that is, basic human rights. And we have an ability, President Ceausescu and myself, his ministers and mine, to discuss ways by which we might move, perhaps in different means and at different rates of advance, to bring about those basic human rights that our people so urgently need—the reunification of families and the basic freedoms that are important to us.

I've enjoyed being with him. He's a very good adviser. He's a man who in the past has suffered greatly, imprisoned, tortured, but because of his courage and because of his belief in the future of his own country, notable achievements have been brought to the people who have confidence in him.

It's a great pleasure for me again to express my welcome to him to our country, and I would like to propose a toast to a great leader, President Ceausescu, and to the brave and friendly people of Romania. Mr. President, to you and your people.

PRESIDENT CEAEUSECU. Mr. President, Mrs. Carter, ladies and gentlemen:

It is for myself, for my wife, and for the members of my party a reason of special pleasure to be your guests here tonight, to be again here in the United States, to meet again many citizens of your lovely country.

Today we had the first round of talks on a rather large sphere of problems, and we have also reached a number of common conclusions.

The first regards the need to establish broader cooperation between our two countries and to take more sustained efforts towards peace, towards more democratic international relations, and towards ensuring to each and every nation the right to live in freedom and to develop according to their own aspirations.

You said, Mr. President, that many people here in the United States have come from Europe or other parts of the world. I cannot boast that many Romanians have come from other parts of the world, because for almost 2,050 years—because in 1980 we are going to celebrate the 2,050th anniversary of the first centralized nation state in Romania—Romanians have been there, and they are going to stay there. They fought to be free, and they want to be always free.

In many ways the history of our two respective countries are different, and the present is also different from a number of viewpoints. The United States is a developed country and a big country. Romania is a smaller country and a still developing country. But it is our wish, by relying on the labors and efforts of our own people, to develop on broader lines, to gain access to modern science, to civilization, and to live a life of dignity, freedom, and independence.

I think that despite all differences, including differences in social systems, there are many things that can be common to our two countries and to our two peoples, and mainly our common wish for progress, our wish to see that the accomplishments of human genius are put in the service of happiness of all peoples. No doubt, also, we have a common determination to do everything we can in order to see to it that the wonderful achievements of science should not serve destruction and war, but the progress, well-being, and happiness of each people and of all peoples.

I think that that is precisely the supreme rationale of human existence, and that is also the fundamental problem, the core of human rights—the right to be free, the right and the duty to respect the freedom of others, and the duty to work in such a way in order to enjoy himself or herself and let others enjoy the benefits of civilization.

Maybe on certain aspects of human rights we might have different philosophical concepts, and there is nothing wrong in that. But we in Romania set out from the premise that everything we do should serve the well-being of the people, should help all people live life with more dignity and more freedom. And we have a saying in Romania that the little we have, we should distribute fairly for all to enjoy.

You told me tonight, Mr. President, about your Presidential campaign in the early stages and how you really got elected President. It's wonderful that you could win over all obstacles, and now to have a farmer at the head of the United States, and also a farmer's son, and that I used to work in the fields, I used to work in factories, and we have there in Romania a farmer's son who has worked all his life with his hands, and he's now a President, too.

Maybe that helps our people also understand that whatever we do is for the people to benefit and for them to live life with more dignity.

As a matter of fact, if I remember right, either the first or the second President of the United States used to be a worker, and the founding father of scientific socialism, Marx, used to say and to quote that as an example of how a working man can rise to the highest dignity of office.

Now when we talk about human rights, it is good to remember all these things, because the rights of all human beings begin with the right to work, with the right to learn, with the right to have access to culture, with the right to live in freedom, and also with the right to participate in the management of all national affairs without discrimination. And this also includes the right to have any creed, either religious or philosophical.

We endeavor to respect such rights fully, and we regard them as sacred. We think that everything should be done and no effort should be spared in order to have those rights asserted in all countries, so that they become a basis for equal cooperation among all nations.

That is why we take a stand against all wars and for disarmament, first of all for nuclear disarmament. That is why we believe that the world should cease to be divided into opposing military blocs and new relations should be built in a world without military blocs.

That is why we stand for a political solution in the Middle East. That is why we welcomed President Sadat's initiative, and now we are hopeful that his efforts will and the others will lead to a just and lasting peace in the area.

That is also the reason why we wish to see new relations established in Europe and the documents signed in Helsinki implemented in full.

As there are more baskets than one, we would wish that all should be implemented, and more progress should be made in particular on the military side of it, considering that in Europe, where many Americans of today have come from, we have to deal with the highest concentration of forces and modern armaments.

You know Europe. You know Europe is not such a big place, and little place is now left for anything but arms. So, we shall have to remove them to make place for people. That is why, while giving attention to the Third Basket, we should also give more attention to military disengagement and disarmament.

These are the same reasons why we support the liberation movements in Rhodesia and Namibia and the majority in South Africa, their right to be free, to decide their own future, and to participate in the management of their own affairs.

Finally, I shouldn't fail to mention the fact that two-thirds of mankind are poor, and one-third is relatively rich, because not all are rich in that one-third. That makes it necessary, in our view, to join the efforts with these people, with the developing nations, in order to secure their more rapid economic and social progress. Without this we can hardly say that all nations can enjoy the fruits of modern civilization.

We would certainly welcome with great satisfaction more active support from the United States to the solution of these worldwide problems, if more is done for this two-thirds of mankind that live in poverty. Of course, I have in mind not only the United States but all developed countries, all those who are able to take action in order to bring new solutions to the vital problems of mankind.

We know well that just a few countries, even if they are as big as the United States, cannot solve all these problems. What is needed is for all peoples, all nations to join their efforts in order to bring about solutions that would be up to the expectations and aspirations of all people. I am convinced that despite the difficulties, that all the nations of the world will be able to bring about new solutions to the problems we are facing and to build together a better world, a world with more justice.

We wish that our visit here and our talks together should help us identify new fields for cooperation between Romania and the United States, but at the same time should provide new opportunities for cooperation with a view to solving the problems that confront humanity today.

I should like to propose this toast for better cooperation between Romania and the United States, for a more democratic international policy. I wish the people of America prosperity and peace for all. To your health, President Carter, to the health of Mrs. Carter. We are looking forward to seeing you in Romania. To your health, everybody.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:45 p.m. in the State Dining Room at the White House. President Ceausescu spoke in Romanian, and his remarks were translated by an interpreter.

Visit of President Ceausescu of Romania

Joint Declaration. April 13, 1978

The President of the United States of America, Jimmy Carter, and the President of the Socialist Republic of Romania, Nicolae Ceausescu,

Having noted with satisfaction that the political, economic, scientific, cultural and other relations between the two countries have developed significantly in recent years,

Having determined to take further steps to expand bilateral relations and cooperation, to build security and develop cooperation in Europe, to strengthen international peace and security, and to seek solutions for the manifold issues confronting the world,

Agreed on the following Declaration:

I. They reaffirmed the commitment to continue the development and expansion of relations between the two countries on the basis of the Joint Statement signed in Washington on December 5, 1973 and of the Joint Statement on Economic, Industrial and Technical Cooperation between the United States of America and the Socialist Republic of Romania of the same date. These relations are based on the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and of the Declaration on Principles Guiding Relations Between Participating States of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, and consistent with these, particularly on the following interrelated principles:

The right of each state to existence, freedom, independence and national sovereignty;

The equal rights of all states, irrespective of their size, level of development, and political, economic and social systems;

The right of each state freely to choose and develop its political, social, economic and cultural system;

The right of each people to decide its own destiny;

Refraining from the threat or use of force inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations;

Respect for territorial integrity and inviolability of frontiers;

Non-intervention, direct or indirect, for any reason whatever, in the internal affairs of any other state;

Peaceful settlement of international disputes;

Observance of and promotion of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, including all the conditions required for a free, dignified and prosperous life;

Cooperation among states in order to promote world peace and security and economic and social progress.

II. They stated their joint determination:

1. To continue meetings at the highest level and consultations at other levels, and to encourage interchanges between members of legislatures and representatives of local administration.

2. To promote and facilitate the expansion of trade and economic cooperation between the two countries, taking into account Romania's present status as a developing country;

3. To promote the reduction of tariffs and non-tariff barriers to trade in conformity with the Agreement on Trade Relations between the two countries, and to seek to increase the volume and diversify the structure of bilateral trade.

4. To seek ways to put existing non-discriminatory trade relations on a more stable and long-term basis, in particular through the renewal of the Agreement on Trade Relations.

5. To encourage the development of cooperation activities, including joint ventures and cooperation in third markets, contacts and interchanges between American firms and Romanian economic organizations, participation in specialized exhibitions in both countries, increased exchange of economic information and data, and other measures for the implementation of the Long-Term Agreement on Economic, Industrial and Technical Cooperation, signed in 1976; and to support in this respect the activities of the Joint American-Romanian Economic Commission and of the United States-Romanian Economic Council.

6. To cooperate in the settlement of humanitarian issues, including family reunification, in the spirit of mutual understanding and good will.

7. To promote cultural and scientific exchanges under the terms of the Agreement on Cooperation and Exchanges in the Cultural, Educational, Scientific and Technological Fields of 1974, as well as relations and contacts between institutions, organizations and citizens of the two countries, and to encourage tourism, in order to increase mutual understanding and friendship between the two peoples.

III. They also expressed their joint determination:

1. To strengthen and make irreversible the process of détente in Europe and throughout the world.

2. To work for ensuring opportunities for all countries, big or small, to contribute to the settlement of complex world issues on the basis of equality.

3. To promote the settlement of all disputes among states by peaceful means and the elimination of the threat or use of force.

4. To contribute actively to the full implementation of all the provisions of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe and to promote the multilateral process initiated by the Conference. They agreed that the Belgrade Meeting provided a firm basis for continuation of this process; at the same time, they expressed disappointment that it had not been possible to reach agreement on the numerous useful proposals which had been put forward. They agreed to cooperate closely so that the 1980 Madrid Meeting should take effective steps toward strengthening security and developing cooperation in Europe in the fields of economic cooperation, of cultural exchanges and humanitarian problems, and of military disengagement and disarmament. They also agreed that the development of friendly and neighborly relations among Balkan countries will be a positive contribution to re-enforcing security and expanding cooperation in Europe.

5. To act resolutely for the adoption of a wide range of disarmament measures, including nuclear disarmament, such as halting the build-up of armaments and reducing military budgets, armed forces and armaments, leading ultimately to general and complete disarmament under effective international control. They endorsed a more effective role for the United Nations in dealing with international disarmament issued and underlined their active support for the Special Session on Disarmament of the United Nations General Assembly.

6. To work toward a more just and equitable international economic order, which should promote the accelerated economic development of developing countries; and to intensify dialogue and cooperation among all countries, directed toward solving major economic problems, on the basis of the principles of equality, equity and mutual benefit.

7. To encourage efforts aimed at a just, comprehensive and lasting peaceful settlement in the Middle East, based on Israel's withdrawal from territories occupied as a result of the 1967 war, respect for legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, and insurance of the independence, territorial integrity and security of all states in the region. To this end, they expressed themselves in favor of negotiations among all the interested parties for solving the Middle East situation, with appropriate representation of the Palestinian people.

8. To support the legitimate aspirations of the African peoples for peace, freedom and independence. They reaffirmed the inalienable right of the peoples of Zimbabwe and Namibia to sovereignty and independent development, and the necessity of ensuring, as soon as possible, the transfer of power to the African majority, in the spirit of pertinent United Nations resolutions. They also expressed deep concern about the South African policy of apartheid and racial discrimination and stood for the abolition of these practices.

9. To strengthen the role of the United Nations in the maintenance and consolidation of world peace, in the development of cooperation among all nations, and in furtherance of the principles of international law in the relations among states, through reforming and restructuring the UN system in order to make it stronger and more effective; and to strengthen cooperation between their two countries within the United Nations and other international organizations and conferences.

IV. The two Presidents expressed their conviction that friendly relations between the United States of America and the Socialist Republic of Romania, based on equality, mutual respect and due consideration for their respective interests, serve the cause of world peace, security and cooperation. They reaffirmed their commitment to expand and deepen, both through diplomatic channels and meetings at all levels, the consultations, contacts and exchanges that have become an important and lasting element of their cooperation.

United States Ambassador to South Africa

April 13, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate William B. Edmondson, of Peru, Nebr., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Republic of South Africa. He would replace William G. Bowdler, who will return to Washington to serve as Director of the Bureau of Intelligence and Research at the State Department.

Edmondson was born February 6, 1927, in St. Joseph, Mo. He received an A.B. from the University of Nebraska in 1950 and an M.A. from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1951. He served in the U.S. Army from 1944 to 1948.

Edmondson joined the State Department as an intern in 1951. From 1952 to 1955, he was Consul and deputy principal officer in Dar es Salaam. From 1955 to 1957, he was economic officer in Bern. In 1957–58, he took African area studies at Northwestern University.

From 1958 to 1960, Edmondson was an intelligence research specialist at the State Department. In 1960 and 1961, he was acting chief of the West Africa Division of the Bureau of Intelligence and Research. He was political officer in Accra from 1961 to 1964, and officer in charge of Ghana affairs at the State Department from 1964 to 1965.

Edmondson was deputy chief of mission in Lusaka from 1965 to 1969. He attended the National War College in 1969–70 and served as educational and cultural affairs officer at the State Department in 1970 and 1971. From 1971 to 1974, he was Director of the Office of African Programs in the Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs.

From 1974 to 1976, Edmondson was Deputy Chief of Mission in Pretoria. Since 1976 he has been Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs.

National Commission on the International Year of the Child, 1979

Executive Order 12053. April 14, 1978

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution of the United States of America, in accordance with the Federal Advisory Committee Act (5 U.S.C. App. I) and the United Nations General Assembly resolution of December 21, 1976 which designated the year 1979 as the International Year of the Child, and as President of the United States of America, in order to provide for the observance of the International Year of the Child within the United States, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. Establishment of Commission. (a) There is hereby established the National Commission on the International Year of the Child, 1979, hereinafter referred to as the Commission.

(b) The Commission shall be composed of not more than 25 persons appointed by the President from among citizens in private life. The President shall designate the Chairman and two Vice Chairmen.

(c) The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives are invited to designate two Members of each House to serve on the Commission.

SEC. 2. Functions of the Commission. (a) The Commission shall plan for and promote the national observance in the United States of the year 1979 as the International Year of the Child. The Commission shall coordinate its efforts with local, State, national, and international organizations, including the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF).

(b) In promoting this observance, the Commission shall foster within the United States a better understanding of the special needs of children. In particular, the Commission shall give special attention to the health, education, social environment, physical and emotional development, and legal rights and needs of children that are unique to them as children.

(c) The Commission shall keep informed of activities by organizations and groups in the United States and abroad in observance of the Year. The Commission shall consult with, and stimulate activities and programs through, community, civic, State, regional, national Federal and international organizations.

(d) The Commission may conduct studies, inquiries, hearings and meetings as it deems necessary. It may assemble and disseminate information, issue reports and other publications. It may also coordinate, sponsor, or oversee projects, studies, events and other activities that it deems necessary or desirable for the observance of 1979 as the International Year of the Child.

(e) The Commission shall make recommendations to the President on national policies for improving the well-being of children; shall issue periodic reports on discrete areas of the rights and needs of children; and shall submit, no later than November 30, 1978, an interim report to the President on its work and tentative recommendations.

SEC. 3. Resources, Assistance, and Cooperation. (a) The Commission may establish subcommittees. Private citizens who are not members of the Commission may be included as members of subcommittees.

(b) The Commission may request any Executive agency to furnish such information, advice, services, and funds as may be useful for the fulfillment of the Commission's functions under this order. Each such agency is authorized, to the extent permitted by law and within the limits of available funds, to furnish such information, advice, services, and funds to the Commission upon request of the Chairman of the Commission.

(c) The Commission is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of a staff and such other persons as may be necessary to enable it to carry out its functions. The Commission may obtain services in accordance with the provisions of Section 3109 of Title 5 of the United States Code, to the extent funds are available therefore.

(d) Each member of the Commission and its subcommittees may receive, to the extent permitted by law, compensation for each day he or she is engaged officially in meetings of the Commission or its subcommittees at a rate not to exceed the daily rate now or hereafter prescribed by law for GS-15 of the General Schedule; and, may also receive travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by law (5 U.S.C. 5702 and 5703) for persons in the government service employed intermittently.

SEC. 4. Coordination. (a) The heads of Executive agencies shall designate an agency representative for purposes of coordinating agency support for the national observance of the International Year of the Child, 1979. The Co-Chairmen, designated by the Secretaries of State and Health, Education, and Welfare, of the Interagency Committee for the International Year of the Child should act as advisers to, and coordinate activities with, the Chairman of the Commission.

(b) The General Services Administration shall provide administrators services, facilities, and support to the Commission on a reimbursable basis.

(c) The functions of the President under the Federal Advisory Committee Act (5 U.S.C. App. I), except that of reporting annually to the Congress, which are applicable to the Commission, shall be performed by the Administrator of General Services as provided by Executive Order No. 12024 of December 1, 1977.

SEC. 5. Final Report and Termination. The Commission shall conclude its work and submit a final report to the President, including its recommendations for improving the well-being of children, at least

Administration of Jimmy Carter, 1978

30 days prior to its termination. The Commission shall terminate on April 1, 1979.

Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations

Appointment of Vice Chairperson and Six Members. April 14, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of Lynn Cutler, county commissioner of Black Hawk County, Iowa, as Vice Chairperson of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations. She was appointed to the Commission by President Carter in August 1977.

The President also announced the appointment of six persons for 2-year terms as members of the Commission. They are:

FRED E. ANDERSON, of Loveland, Colo., a Colorado State senator;

WILLIAM O. BEACH, of Clarksville, Tenn., county judge of Montgomery County, Tenn.;

TOM BRADLEY, mayor of Los Angeles, Calif.;

RICHARD E. CARVER, mayor of Peoria, Ill.;

JAMES T. MCINTYRE, JR., Director of the Office of Management and Budget;

JOHN P. ROUSAKIS, mayor of Savannah, Ga.

The Commission was created in 1959 to maintain a continuing review of the operation of the Federal system and to make recommendations for improvements. It consists of 26 members: 3 officers of the executive branch, 3 private citizens, 3 U.S. Senators, 3 Members of the House of Representatives, 4 Governors, 3 State legislators, 4 mayors, and 3 county officials.

United States-Bolivia Treaty on Penal Sentences

Message to the Senate Transmitting the Treaty. April 14, 1978

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith the Treaty between the United States of America and Bolivia on the Execution of Penal Sentences which was signed at La Paz on February 10, 1978.

I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Department of State with respect to the Treaty.

The Treaty would permit citizens of either nation who had been convicted in the courts of the other country to serve their sentences in their home country; in each case the consent of the offender as well as the approval of the authorities of the two Governments would be required.

This Treaty is significant because it represents an attempt to resolve a situation which has inflicted substantial hardships on a number of citizens of each country and has caused concern to both Governments. The Treaty is similar to those with Mexico and Canada, to which the Senate gave advice and consent last year. I recommend that the Senate give favorable consideration to this Treaty at an early date.

White House Conference on Families

Appointment of Wilbur J. Cohen as Chairman. April 14, 1978

The President today announced that HEW Secretary Joseph Califano has appointed Wilbur J. Cohen as Chairman of the White House Conference on Families. Cohen is dean of the School of Education at the University of Michigan and a former Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare.

Cohen, 64, of Ann Arbor, Mich., was with the Social Security Administration from 1935 to 1956, serving as Director of the Division of Research and Statistics from 1953 to 1956. From 1956 to 1969, he was a professor of public welfare administration at the University of Michigan.

Cohen served as Assistant Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare from 1961 to 1965, as Under Secretary from 1965 to 1968, and as Secretary from 1968 to 1969. Since 1969 he has been dean of the School of Education at Michigan. He is resigning as dean effective June 30 of this year, but will remain with the university as a professor of education and public welfare administration.

Cohen is the author of several books and numerous articles on social security. He is considered one of the pioneering leaders in the development of social security in the United States, and was also an early advocate of the Medicare program.

The White House Conference on Families, scheduled for December 9–13, 1979, will explore all facets of family life in America. President Carter has termed the family “both the foundation of American society and its most important institution.”

In announcing the Conference, the President said last January 30:

“The main purpose of this White House Conference will be to examine the strengths of American families, the difficulties they face, and the ways in which family life is affected by public policies. The Conference will examine the important effects that the world of work, the mass media, the court system, private institutions, and other major facets of our society have on American families.”

*Memorandum for the Heads of Executive

Shortly after I took office, I asked each of you to institute zero-base budgeting in your agency. I commend your efforts to accomplish this within the short time that was available.

I want you to know that the zero-base budgeting process helped me and other reviewers in the difficult task of allocating limited resources among competing and worthy programs. And now, after a year's experience, I expect the process to aid even more during the 1980 budget cycle.

The Office of Management and Budget has reported to me the results of this year's zero-base budgeting efforts. As was expected, some agencies did better than others. Most agencies need to focus more attention on objectives and on ways to accomplish those objectives more efficiently. In addition, I think more emphasis should be placed on the examination of minimum levels, so I ask that you make additional efforts to do this.

I have asked the Office of Management and Budget to issue revised guidelines. These guidelines will include many of your staff's suggestions on ways to improve the process for the 1980 Budget.

In addition to the changes needed under these revised guidelines, I ask that you use zero-base budgeting as the sole basis for the preparation of your 1980 budget request. This should relieve the added work that was caused last year by the preparation, in some instances, of both ZBB and traditional budget justifications. I also ask you to involve managers at all levels within your agency. This will help to identify ways to bring about our common goal of increased effectiveness in Government operations.

By continuing to work together to improve our zero-base budgeting processes, we can make the Federal budget more responsive to the needs of the people.

JIMMY CARTER

Visit of President Nicolae Ceausescu of Romania

Joint Communiqué Issued at the Conclusion of the Romanian President's Visit to the United States. April 17, 1978

At the invitation of President Jimmy Carter and Mrs. Carter, the President of the Socialist Republic of Romania, Nico-lae Ceausescu, accompanied by Mrs. Elena Ceausescu, paid a state visit to the United States of America between April 12-17, 1978.

President Carter and President Ceausescu conducted official talks on the current state of relations between the United States and Romania as well as on the possibilities for their further development. They also had a broad exchange of views on a series of major world problems of common concern. The talks were held in a cordial atmosphere of openness, esteem, and mutual respect which reflects the positive evolution in United States-Romanian relations.

President Ceausescu met with members of the House of Representatives and the Senate. The talks showed that both sides desire to contribute to the deepening of understanding and to the growth of contacts between the American and Romanian peoples.

President Ceausescu also met with leading personalities in the business, financial, scientific, engineering and cultural life of the United States.

The two Presidents noted with satisfaction that the relations between the two countries have further developed and broadened in the spirit of the principles embodied in the Joint Declaration signed in Washington, D.C., on December 5, 1973. They expressed their common determination and interest to encourage and promote the continuing expansion of ties of cooperation and friendship between the two countries and peoples.

In order to further develop and diversify the relations between the two countries as well as to contribute to the strengthening of international peace and security, President Carter and President Ceausescu signed a Joint Declaration.

The two Presidents expressed their satisfaction at the results of their talks and agreed to continue the bilateral dialogue at the highest level as well as at other levels and through diplomatic channels.

President Ceausescu and Mrs. Elena Ceausescu also visited, in addition to Washington, D.C., Chattanooga, Dallas, Houston, New Orleans and New York.

President Ceausescu and Mrs. Elena Ceausescu expressed their cordial thanks to President and Mrs. Carter for the friendly and hospitable reception extended to them during their visit which is a natural expression of the traditional friendship and mutual respect between the American and Romanian peoples.

President Nicolae Ceausescu and Mrs. Elena Ceausescu invited President Jimmy Carter and Mrs. Rosalynn Carter to pay an official visit to the Socialist Republic of Romania. The invitation was accepted with pleasure.

Tax Reduction and Reform

Remarks Concerning Proposals Submitted to the Congress. April 17, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Good afternoon, everybody.

Today the congressional committee began to mark up the tax reform proposals that we submitted to the Congress, and today also happens to be the date, each year, when American people have to pay their taxes for last year.

Many American citizens at this time of the year wonder why in the world the tax codes, the tax laws, are so complicated and so unfair. We here in Washington don't hear clearly the voices of those who are concerned, who are cheated by the present tax laws, who don't understand the complicated tax codes, and who have been treated unfairly for many years.

that's fair. The voices that we hear in Washington when tax reform is proposed are the voices of those special interest groups, because they are powerful, are rich, are influential, and are present here through lobbyists and spokesmen and lawyers and accountants, are trying to protect the selfish special privilege that has been carved out for them in the past, and whose tax bills have to be paid by the average American workman and the average American family.

These average Americans foot the bill for the rich and others who mark off from their tax payments high-priced meals, high-priced theater tickets, ball-game tickets, first-class air travel, even country club dues. And because the expenses of Government are fairly well fixed because of the services demanded, somebody has to pay when those rich, influential people don't. And the ones who pay are the quiet, average American working family members who expect to be protected, but quite often are not.

The low and middle American families also pay the taxes for the multinational corporations who have special privileges concerning foreign earnings and, in the process, also are encouraged to export jobs that are badly needed here in our own country.

Under the proposals that have been made to Congress for tax reform, tax reduction, families who earn between $10,000 and $30,000 a year would have their taxes cut about $300 if the proposals go into effect.

But tax reform is not just economic. The tax codes touch, perhaps, more Americans than any other laws that we have. And the tax codes quite often are the measuring stick by which citizens can judge the effectiveness of their own Government and the fairness of their own Government and evolve, therefore, trust in their own Government.

I've seen recent news stories that said that there is no enthusiasm in Washington for tax reform. But there's a lot of enthusiasm in the White House, there's a lot of enthusiasm in the Treasury Department, and there's a lot of enthusiasm among American citizens who are tired of being treated unfairly and want to see tax reform implemented.

If the American people will let their voices be heard to equal those of the special interests, then the Congress will hear, and tax reform will finally go into effect in our country.

If we don't succeed in all our efforts this year, I intend to come back next year and the next and the next to make sure that American voices are heard and that our tax reform proposals are implemented and that tax codes will be simple and fair.

Thank you very much.

CAMP DAVID MEETINGS WITH ADMINISTRATION OFFICIALS

I might say that the meetings that we had this weekend at Camp David were profitable, very helpful to me, and I think that every member of the Cabinet, every member of the White House staff would agree with those assessments.

We measured how our administration had performed so far. We analyzed some problems and some failures that have been widely publicized. We recommitted ourselves to carrying out the commitments that I made during the campaign and to make our Government, from the executive branch, be more effective.

Thank you very much.

REPORTER. Will you do things differently, sir? Did you reach some decisions about different processes?

THE PRESIDENT. We'll do things better.

NOTE: The President spoke at 5:10 p.m. to reporters assembled in the Briefing Room at the White House.

Education Day, U.S.A., 1978

Proclamation 4562. April 17, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

On April 13 of this year the Congress of the United States concluded its deliberations on a joint resolution which recognized the need for this Nation to set aside a special day devoted to recognizing the importance of education in the lives of our citizens. To emphasize its commitment, the Congress has authorized and requested the President to issue a proclamation designating April 18, 1978, as Education Day, U.S.A., and calling for its appropriate observance. I am honored to join with the House of Representatives and the Senate in recognizing this need and privileged to comply with their request.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim Tuesday, April 18, 1978, as Education Day, U.S.A. and I ask all Americans to observe that day in such manner as reflects their commitment to education and their recognition of its importance to the welfare of this Nation.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this seventeenth day of April, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

National Oceans Week, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

Throughout history the ocean has been a magnet for explorers, scientists, merchants, adventurers—and dreamers. Where once the oceans were cloaked in superstition, today we plumb their depths with an amazing array of technological devices, and we are beginning to understand the vital role of the oceans in life on this planet. The world community looks to the oceans as a vital source of food, energy and mineral resources, while they remain crucial to trade as they have been since ancient times.

As governments, international organizations and private groups develop plans and programs to harvest some of the riches of the sea, we must also control marine pollution. We must unlock the secrets of the ocean to understand the results of man's activities—not only at sea, but on land as well—which adversely affect sea-life. It is essential that we discover and work with the oceans' capacity to survive misuse. All the peoples of the world must understand that the ocean cannot be subjected to unchecked exploitation, but because our Nation lies between the world's largest oceans, and because of our economic position, the United States has a special responsibility in preventing the deadening of the seas. A careful balance between conservation and commercial development must be achieved if the oceans are to meet the needs of future generations.

In order to increase public awareness of the importance of the oceans of the world, the Ninety-fifth Congress has adopted a joint resolution (S.J. Res. 124) requesting the President to issue a proclamation designating the week of April 16 through April 22, 1978, as National Oceans Week.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim the week beginning Sunday, April 16, 1978, as National Oceans Week.

I call upon public officials, users of the oceans and coasts, environmental organizations, industry, the media and civic leaders to join together to make the public aware of the importance of our ocean resources and I urge every American to take the time and trouble to learn about the proper use and management of our marine waters and the wealth of their contents.

Death of General Lucius D. Clay

Statement by the President. April 18, 1978

I am saddened by the death of Gen. Lucius D. Clay, who served his Nation throughout the world, in time of peace and war, as soldier, engineer, diplomat, statesman, industrialist, and financier.

After serving as General Eisenhower's deputy during World War II, General Clay went on to achieve worldwide eminence in his own right as Military Governor of the U.S. Zone of Germany and Commander in Chief of the United States forces in Europe.

He demonstrated America's determination that Berlin must remain free when he defied the Russian blockade of that city with the Berlin airlift. Perhaps of equal importance historically was his dedication to the reconstruction of West Germany's postwar economy.

I join millions of Americans in mourning General Clay's passing and in offering my sympathies to his family.

Special Session of the United Nations General Assembly on Disarmament

Accordance of the Rank of Ambassador to Lawrence D. Weiler. April 18, 1978

The President today announced that he has accorded the personal rank of Ambassador to Lawrence D. Weiler while he serves as Special Adviser to Ambassador Andrew Young at the United Nations General Assembly Special Session on Disarmament, scheduled for May 20.

Weiler is Special Coordinator for this U.N. Special Session at the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency (ACDA). He has been with ACDA from 1971 to 1973 in various positions, including Chief of the Office of Political Analysis and Research and Counselor of the Agency. From 1973 to 1977, he was at Stanford University as a visiting scholar, adjunct professor, and associate director of the arms control and disarmament program. He has been Special Coordinator for the U.N. Special Session since 1977.

President's Special Summit Representative

Appointment of Henry Owen. April 18, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of Henry Owen, of Washington, D.C., to be the President's Special Summit Representative with responsibilities for economic summits and for international economic policy.

Owen was born in New York City on August 26, 1920. He is a graduate of Harvard University and served in World War II as a lieutenant in the U.S. Navy. Following the war, he joined the State Department and served in various posts in the Department in Washington. From 1966 to 1969, he was Chairman of the Department's Policy Planning Council.

In 1969 he joined the Brookings Institution as director of foreign policy studies. During 1977 Owen was involved in the planning for the Downing Street summit meetings held in London last spring.

Panama Canal Treaty

Remarks on Senate Ratification of the Treaty. April 18, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. This is a day of which Americans can always feel proud, for now we have reminded the world and ourselves of the things that we stand for as a nation. The negotiations that led to these treaties began 14 years ago, and they continued under four administrations, four Presidents. I'm proud that they reached their conclusion while I was President. But I'm far prouder that we, as a people, have shown that in a full and open debate about difficult foreign policy objectives, that we will reach the decisions that are in the best interest of our Nation.

The debate has been long and hard. But in the end, it's given our decision a firm base in the will of the American people. Over the last 8 months, millions of Americans have studied the treaties, have registered their views and, in some cases, have changed their minds. No matter which side they took in this debate, most Americans have acted out of sincere concern about our Nation's interest.

I would like to express my thanks to a few for the job they've done. Under the leadership of Senators Byrd and Baker and Sparkman and others, the Senate has carried out its responsibility of advice and consent with great care. All of us owe them our thanks. I feel a special gratitude and admiration for those Senators who have done what was right, because it was right, despite tremendous pressure and, in some cases, political threats.

The loyal employees of the Panama Canal Zone and the Canal Zone Government also deserve our gratitude and our admiration for their performance during these months of great uncertainty.

And General Torrijos and the people of Panama, who have followed this debate closely and through every stage, have been willing partners and cooperative and patient friends. There is no better indication of the prospect for friendly relations between us in the future than their conduct during the last few months.

We now have a partnership with Panama to maintain and to operate and to defend the canal. We have the clear right to take whatever action is necessary to defend the canal and to keep it open and neutral and accessible. We do not have the right to interfere in Panama's internal affairs. That is a right we neither possess nor desire.

These treaties can mark the beginning of a new era in our relations not only with Panama but with all the rest of the world. They symbolize our determination to deal with the developing nations of the world, the small nations of the world, on the basis of mutual respect and partnership. But the treaties also reaffirm a spirit that is very strong, constant, and old in the American character.

Sixty-four years ago, when the first ship traveled through the canal, our people took legitimate pride in what our ingenuity, our perseverance, and our vision had brought about. We were a nation of builders, and the canal was one of our greatest glories.

And today we have shown that we remain true to that determination, that ingenuity, and most of all, that vision. Today we've proven that what is best and noblest in our national spirit will prevail. Today we've shown that we are still builders, with our face still turned confidently to the future. That is why I believe all Americans should share the pride I feel in the accomplishments which we registered today.

When I was coming in to make this announcement, the Ambassador of Panama, Gabriel Lewis, informed me that General Torrijos has accepted the terms of the treaty that passed the Senate this afternoon. And I want to reaffirm my thanks and my commitment to a true partnership with General Torrijos and the people of a great nation, Panama.

Thank you.

REPORTER. Mr. President, are you going down to Panama now?

THE PRESIDENT. Now?

Q. With these treaties in a few weeks, for formal ceremonies?

THE PRESIDENT. I have been invited by General Torrijos to come to Panama. I would like very much to accept his invitation.

Q. Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 7:07 p.m. to reporters assembled in the Briefing Room at the White House. His remarks were broadcast live on radio and television.

Earlier, the Senate had voted 68-32 to ratify the treaty.

Department of Energy

Nomination of John K. Mansfield To Be Inspector General. April 19, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate John K. Mansfield, of Farmington, Conn., to be Inspector General of the Department of Energy.

Mansfield was born October 8, 1921, in Chicago. He received a B.S. from Northwestern University in 1943. He served in the U.S. Army during World War II.

In 1949 he served as an instructor in the department of international relations at Yale University. From 1950 to 1956, he was on the staff of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy. From 1956 to 1959, he was assistant to the director of the Nuclear Division of Combustion Engineering in Windsor, Conn.

Mansfield served as staff director of the Subcommittee on National Policy Machinery of the Senate Committee on Government Operations from 1959 to 1962. In 1962 he became the first Inspector General of Foreign Assistance of the State Department, with the rank of Assistant Secretary of State.

In 1969 Mansfield joined the staff of the Bureau of International Scientific and Technological Affairs at the State Department, where he worked on a wide variety of foreign policy problems involving developments in science and technology.

Since 1974 he has been Special Assistant to the Assistant Secretary of State in charge of the Bureau of Oceans and International Environmental and Scientific Affairs. He has worked on a broad spectrum of policy issues concerning such matters as environmental problems, the science and technology attachés program, and technology transfer questions.

Mansfield has been a consultant to the Congress on various high technology problems and an adviser on scientific and technical manpower to the U.S. Delegation to the NATO Parliamentarians Conference.

United States Ambassador to Surinam

Nomination of Nancy Ostrander. April 19, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Nancy Ostrander, of Indianapolis, Ind., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Republic of Surinam. She would replace J. Owen Zurhellen, Jr., resigned.

Ostrander was born October 25, 1925, in Indianapolis. She received an A.B. from Butler University in 1947.

She entered the Foreign Service in 1947, and served in a clerical capacity in Santiago de Cuba from 1947 to 1950. From 1950 to 1954, she was mail and records supervisor in Havana, and from 1954 to 1957, she was communications and records officer in The Hague. From 1957 to 1961, she was administrative officer in Antwerp.

From 1961 to 1964, Ostrander was a personnel officer at the State Department. From 1964 to 1967, she was consular officer in Mexico City, and from 1967 to 1970, she was Chief of the Consular Section in Kingston. From 1970 to 1972, she was a consular officer in the Bureau of Consular Affairs at the State Department.

In 1973 and 1974, Ostrander attended the National War College. In 1974 and 1975, she was a personnel officer at the State Department, and in 1975 and 1976, she was Chief of the Consular Officer Division in the Bureau of Personnel. Since 1976 she has been personnel counselor for the Senior Officer Division in the Bureau of Personnel.

Task Force of the National Governors' Conference in 1970 and 1971. He was State Cochairman of the New England Regional Commission in 1969 and 1970.

International Joint Commission— United States and Canada

Nomination of Kenneth M. Curtis To Be a U.S. Commissioner. April 19, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Kenneth M. Curtis, of Cape Elizabeth, Maine, to be a Commissioner on the part of the United States on the International Joint Commission—United States and Canada. He would replace Victor Smith, resigned.

Curtis was born February 8, 1931, in Leeds, Maine. He received a B.S. from Maine Maritime Academy in 1952 and a J.D. from Portland University Law School in 1959. He served in the U.S. Navy during the Korean war.

Older Americans Month, 1978

Proclamation 4564. April 19, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

When the month of May was first set aside in 1963 in special tribute to our Nation's senior citizens, there were fewer than eighteen million Americans over the age of sixty-five. Today, their number exceeds twenty-three million.

Older Americans are an invaluable source of talent, skills and experience. Their sacrifice and hard work in the past have brought us through wars and hard times, and kept our Nation faithful to the values and principles on which it was founded. They are our link with what has gone before, remembering the good things we are in constant danger of losing, as well as the bad things we have overcome, and how it was possible. They can help us understand the mistakes of the past so that we do not repeat them. They can help us gather strength and courage from the wisdom of the past to make a better future for our children.

Their skills and knowledge are important to our economy, and it is important to their lives and health that they be able to remain as self-reliant as possible, through employment and other opportunities, and through necessary supportive services that enable them to live their later years in dignity and self-respect. Just as they must not be arbitrarily excluded from contributing to our society, they must not be asked to bear the burdens of society when they are no longer able.

These men and women are a vital part of this Nation. Like all Americans, they need comfortable and safe places to live, nutritious daily diets and adequate incomes and services to give them freedom to make choices. We all must work together to create these conditions in our communities.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate the month of May as Older Americans Month and I ask public officials at all levels, community agencies, educators, the clergy, the communications media and each American to help make it possible for older Americans to enjoy their later years.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this nineteenth day of April, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

Airline Deregulation Legislation

Statement by the President. April 19, 1978

I welcome the Senate's action tonight in passing, 83-9, the airline regulatory reform legislation.

This is an important step in the fight against inflation, as I said in my anti-inflation message last week. Many airline carriers have already begun to reduce fares in expectation of its enactment.

Making this bill law will guarantee that the trend toward lower fares continues and broadens to benefit more passengers—and it will put an end to a form of Government regulation of business that is not only unnecessary but also counter-productive from the public's point of view.

Many Senators—and Senators Cannon, Kennedy, and Pearson, in particular—deserve credit for their leadership on this bill. I urge the House to act upon it soon as well.

NOTE: The statement was released on April 20.

National Commission on Air Quality

Appointment of Seven Members. April 20, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of seven persons as members of the National Commission on Air Quality. The Commission was created last August and will consist of 13 members, of whom 9 are appointed by the President and 4 are Members of Congress. The Commission has a maximum of 3 years to deliver its final report to the President and the Congress.

Those appointed today are:

RICHARD E. AYRES, a staff attorney for the Natural Resources Defense Council in Washington and executive director of the NRDC Environmental Lobby;

TOM BRADLEY, mayor of Los Angeles;

ANNEMARIE F. CROCETTI, clinical associate professor at New York Medical College department of preventive medicine and adjunct professor in the school of education, health division, department of nutrition, at New York University;

JAY S. HAMMOND, Governor of Alaska;

JEANNE MALCHON, chair of the Pinellas County, Fla., Board of County Commissioners, and chair of the Florida Lung Association;

LLOYD MCBRIDE, international president of the United Steelworkers of America;

HAROLD W. TSO, director of the Environmental Protection Commission for the Navajo Tribe in Window Rock, Ariz.

National Energy Plan

THE PRESIDENT. One year ago today, I spoke to the Congress and to the American people about the need for a national energy plan. I said then that this was the gravest domestic challenge that would be faced, perhaps, in our lifetime, and that solving it would take cooperation and sacrifice from all our people. I also said that the proposals in this plan would be complicated and often unpopular and that no solution would be quick, but that we had no alternative but to begin and to act without delay. None of that has changed in the last year. All that has changed is that we have wasted 12 months of precious time.

During the past year we've spent $45 billion importing oil from foreign countries, an average of about $1,000 for every family in the United States. Because of these mammoth imports, our trade deficit has soared and the value of the dollar has dropped. These developments have caused part of the crucial problems that we face here at home of inflation and unemployment.

Because of this delay, governments and people all around the world are asking when we will summon the will to pass an energy plan as every other industrialized nation in the world has already done.

There have been some few promising developments in this last year. New oil from Alaska has given us a temporary reprieve from importing so much oil from overseas. But unless we act on energy legislation and to eliminate waste of energy, this temporary reprieve, counting all the Alaskan oil, will end in 18 months.

The American people have begun to respond by insulating their homes, by switching to lightweight cars, and by taking other action that will contribute to a permanent solution for our energy problems.

We are all more aware, I believe, of the need to conserve energy than we were 1 year ago. All of this has happened without legislation, but we cannot afford to wait any longer.

Although no final action has been taken, the Congress has tentatively agreed on three of the five issues that are before the conference committees now. I recognize that the remaining issues are difficult, and particularly the pricing of natural gas, an issue confronting our people and the Congress for at least 30 years. But now is the time to bring that congressional debate to an end.

We must have energy legislation without delay, and I call on the Congress to fulfill its duty to the American people. Where legislation requires firmness, I will continue to be firm. Where compromise is necessary, I will make reasonable compromises. And when it requires a special expression of the Nation's interest, I will speak for that interest, above the special interests that have hindered our progress so far.

The American people expect these same qualities from the Congress.

Thank you very much.

REPORTER. Sir, how long will you wait before you have to take administrative action if Congress doesn't act?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know yet.

NOTE: The President spoke at 3:31 p.m. to reporters assembled in the Briefing Room at the White House.

Presidential Scholars

Announcement of the Selection of 121 Students as Presidential Scholars of 1978, With a Message From the President. April 20, 1978

The President has sent mailgrams to 121 graduating high school seniors from every part of the country, naming them Presidential Scholars of 1978.

The group includes a boy and a girl from each State, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, Americans living abroad, and 15 chosen at large.

The students were selected by the Commission on Presidential Scholars in the only nationwide program for honoring academic excellence, leadership, other evidence of superior attainment and, for the first time this year, outstanding ability in the arts.

This is the 15th anniversary of the Presidential Scholars program, which was established by Executive order of President Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964. The Presidential Scholars receive no monetary award, but they will be brought to Washington May 21 to 25 for a program during which they will receive the 1978 Presidential Scholars medallions. The visit will include special interest seminars conducted by authorities in many fields, appointments with their Senators and Representatives, and forums, symposiums, and other events scheduled at the State Department, the Smithsonian Institution, and other agencies.

The text of the President's mailgram follows:

"What great pleasure it gives me to notify you of your selection as a 1978 Presidential Scholar! The members of the Commission on Presidential Scholars have made their difficult choices and the chairman informs me that you are one of 121 Presidential Scholars selected from across the nation on the basis of scholarship and leadership.

"Mrs. Carter and I are very proud of your achievements as well as your future promise. We hope you will be coming to Washington May 21st-25th, at which time you will receive the Presidential Scholars medallion."

Passover

Statement by the President. April 21, 1978

In Jewish tradition and practice, tonight is the night that is different from all other nights: the beginning of Passover, the Festival of Freedom.

Passover commemorates a particular struggle in a particular time and place. But its meaning is universal. It is a reminder to all of us—Jews and non-Jews alike—that the struggle for freedom and against oppression must forever be renewed.

Little more than a generation ago, the Holocaust—perhaps the cruelest chapter in the long history of man's inhumanity to man—took the lives of 6 million men, women, and children. And 35 years ago today, in the streets of the Warsaw Ghetto, Jewish fighters rose up in arms against their Nazi oppressors. We must never forget the reality and meaning of the Holocaust, or of the heroic resistance against it.

On behalf of the American people, I have committed myself and my administration to the cause of human rights. That commitment will remain firm.

In Jewish homes all over the world—in Israel, in Eastern and Western Europe, in the Soviet Union, in Latin America, and here in the United States—families and friends will gather tonight for the ceremony of the Seder. As they do, I greet them and assure them that the love of freedom they celebrate is shared by all the people of the United States.

President's Commission on Foreign Language and International Studies

Executive Order 12054. April 21, 1978

By virtue of the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and statutes of the United States of America, and in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Advisory Committee Act (5 U.S.C. App. I), it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. Establishment. (a) There is hereby established the President's Commission on Foreign Language and International Studies, hereinafter referred to as the Commission.

(b) The Commission shall consist of not more than twenty-five members to be appointed by the President, one of whom shall be designated by the President to chair the Commission.

SEC. 2. Functions. (a) The Commission shall conduct such public hearings, inquiries, and studies as may be necessary to make recommendations to the President and the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare in accordance with the objectives of the Commission outlined in subsection (b) of this Section.

(b) The objectives of the Commission shall be to:

(1) Recommend means for directing public attention to the importance of foreign language and international studies for the improvement of communications and understanding with other nations in an increasingly interdependent world;

(2) Assess the need in the United States for foreign language and area specialists, ways in which foreign language and international studies contribute to meeting these needs, and the job market for individuals with these skills.

(3) Recommend what foreign language area studies programs are appropriate at all academic levels and recommend desirable levels and kinds of support for each that should be provided by the public and private sectors.

(4) Review existing legislative authorities and make recommendations for changes needed to carry out most effectively the Commission's recommendations.

SEC. 3. Administration. (a) To the extent authorized by law:

(1) All necessary expenses incurred in connection with the work of the Commission shall be paid from funds available to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

(2) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare may provide, or otherwise obtain, appropriate professional, technical, clerical and administrative personnel as may be necessary to enable the Commission to perform its functions.

(3) Executive agencies shall assist or otherwise cooperate with the Commission in the performance of its functions.

(4) Each member of the Commission who is not otherwise employed in the Government may receive compensation at the rate of $100.00 per day for each day such member is engaged in the work of the Commission, and may also receive travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence (5 U.S.C. 5702 and 5703).

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other Executive order, the functions of the President under the Federal Advisory Committee Act (5 U.S.C. App. I), except that of reporting annually to the Congress, which are applicable to the Commission, shall be performed by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare in accordance with guidelines and procedures prescribed by the Administrator of General Services.

SEC. 4. Termination and Final Report. The Commission shall submit its final report to the President not later than six months after its first meeting and shall terminate thirty days thereafter.

Human Rights Violations in Cambodia

Statement by the President. April 21, 1978

America cannot avoid the responsibility to speak out in condemnation of the Cambodian Government, the worst violator of human rights in the world today. Thousands of refugees from Cambodia have accused their Government of inflicting death on hundreds of thousands of the Cambodian people through the genocidal policies it has implemented over the past 3 years. Witnesses have recounted abuses that include mass killings, inhuman treatment of the supporters of the previous government, the forced deportation of urban dwellers, and the total suppression of recognized political and religious freedoms, as well as deprivation of food and health care for the general population. Summary executions continue in Cambodia today, and fear of the authorities is pervasive.

We support the growing international protest against the policies of this inhumane regime. On April 17 the Canadian House of Commons, in a unanimous motion, expressed the horror of all its members in the acts of genocide carried out in Cambodia and called on all governments which maintain relations with Canada to protest against the slaughter.

In the private sphere, a Norwegian committee supported by leaders of the major Norwegian political parties will hold hearings in Oslo, beginning today, to illuminate through public testimony the tragic situation existing in Cambodia. Amnesty International has issued an appeal to the Cambodian Government to respond to allegations of continuing summary killings in that country. We welcome and applaud these initiatives.

We also welcome the recent action taken by the United Nations Human Rights Commission, which, this year, in consequence of a British initiative, adopted by consensus a resolution asking the Cambodian Government to respond to allegations of human rights violations.

The American Government again condemns the abuses of human rights which have occurred in Cambodia. It is an obligation of every member of the international community to protest the policies of this or any nation which cruelly and systematically violates the right of its people to enjoy life and basic human dignities.

Withdrawal of U.S. Ground Combat Forces From the Republic of Korea

Statement by the President. April 21, 1978

Peace and stability on the Korean Peninsula and in Northeast Asia are vital to our national interest. This Nation is fully determined to maintain its commitment to the Republic of Korea (ROK).

In announcing my decision to withdraw our ground combat forces from Korea over a 4-5 year period, I stressed that it was essential to improve South Korea defense forces so as to confidently maintain an adequate military balance on the peninsula. I also announced that we will take other measures to maintain that balance, including increasing our air force in Korea in October of this year.

I also asked the Congress last October to approve a program to help strengthen South Korean military capabilities, particularly legislation to authorize the transfer to South Korea of a significant portion of the equipment of our departing ground combat forces.

In view of the crowded legislative calendar, and also because of other matters concerning Korea, there is a possibility that the Congress may not act now on this proposal. In the light of this development, I believe it prudent to adjust the scheduled withdrawals.

—The redeployment of noncombat elements will continue on schedule; 2,600 such personnel will be removed by December 31, 1978.

—One combat battalion from the 2d Division will be withdrawn from Korea in December; however, the other two combat battalions of the brigade slated for withdrawal this year will remain in Korea until 1979.

—The plan to increase the U.S. air forces in Korea will not be changed.

Peace and stability in Northeast Asia are vital to our national interest. I urge the Congress to enact as soon as possible the authorization for $275 million in foreign military assistance credits for the ROK, which I have also proposed, and to move expeditiously to deal with the $800 million equipment transfer legislation.

Natural Gas Legislation

Statement by the President on the Tentative Agreement of the Energy Conference Committee. April 21, 1978

I am pleased and gratified that members of the energy conference have reached tentative agreement on natural gas legislation. This agreement represents a long-overdue step toward the creation of a truly national market for natural gas, as well as a crucial breakthrough toward enactment of the Nation's first and long-delayed national energy plan.

This agreement could not have been reached without the tireless efforts of both Democrats and Republicans working in the national interest to overcome the years of conflict and strongly held positions that have characterized this issue.

A solution to the natural gas issue has eluded Presidents and Congresses for over a quarter of a century. If, as I hope, this agreement is approved by the conference, it will be the first conference report on natural gas in 22 years.

I am particularly pleased that this hard-fought compromise, according to best available estimates, will cost American consumers no more than they would pay if today's inadequate regulatory system were to be retained. If this compromise is accepted by the Congress, new supplies of natural gas formerly available only in the intrastate market will flow to the gas-starved interstate system at reasonable prices. These new supplies will replace far more expensive alternative fuels, including imported oil.

I want to give special recognition to conference chairman Harley Staggers of West Virginia, and energy committee chairman Henry Jackson of Washington, as well as energy committee chairmen John Dingell of Michigan and Lud Ashley of Ohio.

In addition, this accord could not have been achieved without the special efforts of Senators Dale Bumpers of Arkansas, Pete Domenici of New Mexico, Jim McClure of Idaho, Mark Hatfield of Oregon, Bennett Johnston of Louisiana, and Wendell Ford of Kentucky, and Congressmen Bob Eckhardt of Texas, Paul Rogers of Florida, Philip Sharp of Indiana, and Charles Wilson of Texas.

United States Sinai Support Mission

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. April 24, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In conformity with Section 4 of Public Law 94-110 of October 13, 1975, I am pleased to transmit herewith the Fifth Report of the United States Sinai Support Mission. It describes the continuing operation of the United States early warning system in the Sinai and its contribution to maintaining the disengagement arrangements between Egypt and Israel under the Sinai II Agreement signed on September 4, 1975.

The estimated cost for operating and maintaining the U.S. early warning system in Fiscal Year 1978, including all contractor and headquarters expenses, is expected to be about ten percent less than the $12.2 million appropriated. For Fiscal Year 1979, the budget is estimated at $11.7 million.

During the six-month period covered in this report, twenty-two minor violations of the Sinai II Agreement were detected. In each instance the violation was an unauthorized aircraft overflight. None of these incidents was serious.

Both parties to the Agreement recently reaffirmed to the Director of the Sinai Support Mission their full confidence in the manner in which the U.S. is discharging its responsibilities in the Sinai and wished this effort to continue as it is at present.

Dramatic developments in the Middle East over the past six months expanded hopes for a comprehensive peace settlement. While the diplomatic process is underway, I believe it imperative that the U.S. continue to meet fully its obligations under existing agreements. The activities of the Sinai Support Mission play an important part in fulfilling these obligations and I urge continued Congressional support for this effective peacekeeping mission.

JIMMY CARTER

The White House,
April 24, 1978.

NOTE: The report is entitled "Report to the Congress, SSM, United States Sinai Support Mission, April 13, 1978" (19 pages plus annexes).

Law Day, U.S.A., 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

More than any other country, the United States of America is founded upon law. Our people are enormously varied in ethnic and cultural background, in religious belief, and even in language and place of origin. What unites us in our diversity is a common commitment to the Constitution and the laws, and the liberties they represent. These are the basis of our very Nationhood.

This year we once again set aside a special day to honor our commitment to the rule of law. For this year's observance, the American Bar Association has selected the theme of "Your Access to Justice." It is a most appropriate one, for it asks us to reflect not only upon how our legal system can be made more responsive to our needs, but also upon the nature of justice itself.

Access to justice involves issues that lie beyond the scope of any single group. The law is not the private property of lawyers, nor is justice the exclusive province of judges and juries. In the final analysis, true justice is not a matter of courts and law books, but of a commitment in each of us to liberty and to mutual respect. Accordingly, the efforts of the legal profession to elicit the help and advice of all Americans are to be commended.

To encourage the people of the United States to consider their individual responsibilities with respect to our legal system, the Congress, by joint resolution approved April 7, 1961 (75 Stat. 43, 36 U.S.C. 164) has requested the President to issue a proclamation calling upon the American people to observe the first day of May of each year as Law Day, U.S.A.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, ask all Americans to celebrate Monday, May 1, 1978, as Law Day, U.S.A., and to honor the principle of equal justice under law. I ask all public officials to display the flag of the United States on all public buildings on that day.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-fifth day of April, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

National Architectural Barrier Awareness Week, 1978

Proclamation 4566. April 25, 1978

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

Physical access is often the key to whether people can enjoy their rights and freedoms, and exercise their responsibilities. Every day, however, millions of elderly and handicapped Americans are denied access to places of employment, houses of worship, shops, schools, public services, recreational areas and many other facilities that other Americans take for granted.

If all Americans are to have true access, we must remove the architectural barriers in our society that block some of our people from full participation and self-reliance. We must also remove the barriers of attitude and custom that have prevented many people from doing what they can.

The Congress expressed its commitment to the removal of physical barriers from Federal buildings by enacting the Architectural and Transportation Barriers Act in 1968. The Architectural and Transportation Barriers Compliance Board, created to enforce that act, will soon launch a national media campaign about barriers using the slogan, "Access America."

This Administration has taken steps to improve the access of handicapped citizens by issuing regulations under Section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act which require recipients of federal financial assistance to improve the accessibility of their programs to the disabled. We have also proposed a loan fund to assist institutions to pay for physical alterations when needed.

Many of the barriers that block people from opportunity and fulfillment are not subject to Federal regulation. Their elimination will require awareness and concern on the part of business and industry, state and local governments and organizations of all sorts, as well as individuals, in order that our society may provide access for full participation to all our people.

To encourage public awareness of the problems of such barriers, the Ninety-fifth Congress has adopted a joint resolution (H.J. Res. 578) requesting the President to issue a proclamation designating the third week in May of 1978 and of 1979 as National Architectural Barrier Awareness Week and calling for its appropriate observance.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate the third week of May, 1978 as National Architectural Barrier Awareness Week and ask all Americans to do all that lies within their power to remove these unnecessary barriers and to eliminate any lingering social and psychological stigma surrounding disabilities. Together we can make access a reality for all Americans.

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM

THE PRESIDENT. Before I became President I realized and was warned that dealing with the Federal bureaucracy would be one of the worst problems I would have to face. It's been even worse than I had anticipated. Of all the steps that we can take to make government more efficient and effective, reforming the civil service system is the most important of all.

The civil service reform proposals which I submitted last month will return the civil service to some system of reward and incentive for the tens of thousands of superb public servants who want to do a good job for the American people. This will also give managers a chance to manage. It will reward excellence, good service, dedication, and will protect employees' vital and legitimate rights.

It will also expand the protection against political abuse that employees need in order to do their jobs well and will make our civil service one of the most dependable and one of the most effective and honest in the whole world.

Nearly everyone in our country will benefit from the civil service reform proposals. For those in private business, it will mean faster government action, less intrusion in the private sector of our economy. For taxpayers, it will mean that we get more for the money that we pay. For those who depend on government for help, it will mean better services to them, quicker, more effective.

And most of all, for the civil service employees, for the Government employees, it will mean that they can do their jobs better and more effectively. They only have one life to live, and sometimes in a sacrificial way they want to dedicate their lives to public service, and this will let them do a better job.

When criticism and debate in the Congress lead to a stronger plan, then I'll support those changes. But I will object very strenuously to weakening our proposal. And I do object also very strenuously to false accusations, specifically one that's been raised recently that this will intrude into the privacy of public servants and injects politics and possible abuse into the system to damage those who serve the Government. In fact, to the creation of a merit protection board and an office of special counsel, political abuse is specifically removed.

I know that everyone wants a better government, particularly those of us like myself who are responsible for leadership and management of the United States Government.

In a way, I believe that our Nation is being tested these days. We have a period of relative calm, free from great crisis or threat to our national security, and we are being tested to see whether or not we can take advantage of this opportunity for improvement.

It will reveal, I think, whether we can deal with conflicting, narrow special interests and act in the national interest of our country.

Civil service reform is now before the Congress. It will test me and the Congress as well, and I believe that the Congress will give the right answer to the question: "Can we have a better government?" I think we can.

QUESTIONS

OIL IMPORTS

Q. Mr. President, where do you stand now on the possibility of imposing, by Executive order or administrative action, oil import fees, and how soon might you act?

I understand a couple of your advisers are suggesting a May 1 deadline.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, no one has suggested a deadline that early. As a matter of fact, we have just finished the fourth major element of a five-part, comprehensive fuel or energy program with natural gas deregulation. And now this is being recommended to the complete conference committee.

The next step is the crude oil equalization tax, which will be addressed by the Finance Committee in the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee in the House, representatives of them in a conference committee.

I've talked to the chairmen of both those committees about the crude oil equalization tax, the fifth element of our major proposals.

It's too early, I think, to consider administrative action. I still hope and expect that the Congress will act and will complete the fifth element of our energy plan and present the entire package as it should be to the Congress in one body.

ENHANCED RADIATION WEAPONS

Q. Mr. President, President Brezhnev has offered to not build the neutron bomb if you agree or the U.S. agrees to do likewise. Is that the word you're looking for to halt the program?

THE PRESIDENT. No. The Soviets know and President Brezhnev knows that the neutron weapon is designed to be used against massive and perhaps overwhelming tank forces in the Western and Eastern European area.

The Soviets, over a period of years, have greatly built up their tank forces and others, stronger than have the NATO Allies. The neutron weapons are designed to equalize that inequality, along with many other steps that our country is now taking.

The Soviets have no use for a neutron weapon, so the offer by Brezhnev to refrain from building the neutron weapons has no significance in the European theater, and he knows this.

We are strengthening NATO in other ways. Ourselves, our NATO Allies will meet here in Washington the last of May with a recommitment, which is already well in progress, for a long-range strengthening of NATO in all its aspects.

But this statement by Brezhnev concerning the neutron weapon has no significance at all.

MIDDLE EAST ARMS SALES

Q. Mr. President, are you going to heed the calls of the congressional leadership of your own party and delay the formal submission of the package sale of war-planes to the Congress or break it up in any way?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I've not been asked by the leadership in the Congress to delay. I have had one Senator who came to see me about holding off on this proposal. Secretary Vance and I have been in close communication, both with one another and with leaders in the Congress, for a number of weeks concerning the arms sales package that will be presented to the Congress very shortly. This package will be presented in individual, component parts to the Congress. It's the only legal way to do it.

The Congress will act on those major sales proposals individually to Israel, to Egypt, and to Saudi Arabia. Each one is important. Each one completes a commitment that has been made by either me, or, even in the case of the Saudis and Israel, our predecessors for these sales.

I look upon them as a package, and if the Congress should accept a portion and reject another, then my intent is to withdraw the sales proposal altogether. But the Congress will not receive nor act on these proposals as a package. They have to act, according to the law, on individual items.

These proposals are in the national interest. I think it's important to our country to meet our commitments. The one that's perhaps the most controversial is the sale of F-15's to the Saudi Arabians. This was a promise that was made to the Saudi Arabians in September of 1975, to let them have a choice of F-16's or F-15's. They want these weapons for defensive purposes.

I recommitted this Nation to provide these planes both last year and again this year. And my deep belief is that, since in the Middle East our preeminent consideration is the long-range and permanent security and peacefulness for the people of Israel, that to treat the moderate Arabs with fairness and with friendship and to strengthen their commitment to us in return is in the best interests of our own country and of Israel.

We are negotiating or discussing these matters with the Congress. But there will be no delay of the sales proposal beyond the point where it can be completed by the time the Congress goes into recess—maybe 2 or 3 days, no longer than that.

Q. Mr. President, do you think it proper or do you think it right for the Foreign Minister of another government to interfere in the legislative processes of this Government? I'm talking particularly about your Middle East arms package here, legislation which you've said is in the best interest of the United States. Do you think it's right?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I have made my decision about the arms sales package after very careful consideration, a close study of decisions and opinions expressed by my predecessors in the White House, careful consultation with the State Department and our Defense Department, our military leaders, and I made my recommendation to the Congress—I will make it shortly—on what I consider to be in the best interests of our own Nation with a well-balanced and friendly attitude toward our allies and friends in the Middle East.

In each one of these instances, the arms sales proposals were made as a result of requests by the governments involved. And I think that's the basis on which the decision should be made, by my making the request to the Congress, by Congress considering my request for approval of the sales on the best interests of our country as judged by me and the Congress.

TAX REDUCTION

Q. Mr. President, many Democrats in the House Ways and Means Committee, including the chairman, are urging you to scale back your net tax cut to something under $20 billion. And the Federal Reserve Chairman today suggested that you delay the effect of whatever tax cut until next January 1st, all because apparently they feel that it's inflationary now, looking down the road.

Will you consider either of those suggestions?

THE PRESIDENT. No. A $25 billion reduction in taxes on the American people would not be inflationary. It is, in my judgment and the best judgment of the economic advisers who work with me, about the right figure. We only have about an 82-percent utilization of our production capacity now. We do not have excessive demand as a cause for inflationary increases in prices of our products.

We have a cycle of wage increases, price increases that kind of grow on one another. And I don't believe it would be advisable and I do not intend to change my recommendation that the net between the tax reforms and the tax reductions would approximately equal to $25 billion.

I think that the best time to make it effective is the 1st of October. I hope that the Congress can act rapidly enough to make the reduction effective then.

The last quarter's results of growth in our national products showed some leveling off. It needs to be kept strong and vigorous. If this tax proposal does not go through, by the end of 1979 it would cost every family in America, on the average, $600 in income, about $40 billion in reduced income, because of a constrained economy that did not continue to grow.

And if the tax reduction of $25 billion was eliminated, it would mean that we would have a million more people out of work by the end of the first 12 months after the tax reduction than we would have otherwise.

So, for all those reasons and others, I think the $25 billion in tax reduction on our people, which is needed and which would help them, is about the right figure.

MIDDLE EAST ARMS SALES

Q. Mr. President, just to follow up on the Middle East thing, I would like to pursue it just a little bit more maybe from a slightly different angle. The Israeli Foreign Minister, Mr. Dayan, has suggested that Israel might be willing to give up its own fighter planes in your package if the sales were stopped to Saudi Arabia and Egypt.

Now, in the light of your own professed interest in cutting back on foreign arms sales, would you consider withdrawing the entire package to prevent a new escalation of the arms race in the Middle East?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I would not. As I said earlier, the process through which we sell arms—and this sales proposal would be completed 5 years in the future, by—I think the last deliveries would be 1983—is initiated by a request from governments, foreign governments, that we permit the sale of arms to them. As I said earlier, we committed ourselves to help Saudi Arabia with arms sales to protect themselves in September of 1975.

At the same time, approximately, in the fall of '75, our Government committed to help Israel with their proposal by making arms sales available to them. Obviously, if any nation withdrew its request for arms sales, that would change the entire procedure.

I have never heard of Foreign Minister Dayan's statement that they did not need the weapons or would withdraw their request for weapons until today. Mr. Dayan is on the way to our country. He will be meeting shortly with the Secretary of State and others, and I think only after very close consultations with them can we determine whether or not Israel desires to go ahead with the arms sales commitment that I've made to them.

But I do not intend to withdraw the arms sales proposals after they are submitted to the Congress, and I do not intend to delay.

Q. If Mr. Dayan did in fact tell you that Israel would withdraw its request, would you then be willing to pull back the whole package?

THE PRESIDENT. I can't imagine that happening, and I would rather not answer a hypothetical question of that kind.

MIDDLE EAST PEACE NEGOTIATIONS

Q. You mentioned that Mr. Dayan is coming. I just wonder, sir, do you have any reason at all to feel optimistic that the negotiations between Israel and Egypt can somehow be brought off dead center?

I know Mr. Atherton's been in Cairo, and you've had consultations. What is the outlook now?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I have reason to be optimistic, but I can't predict success anytime soon. This has been going on for 30 years.

I think compared to a year ago, for instance, remarkable progress has been made. After the visit of President Sadat to Jerusalem, there was a remarkable sense of excessive hope or euphoria that swept the world, that peace was imminent. Since then, I've met extensively with President Sadat and with Prime Minister Begin and also with the Foreign Ministers of the two countries involved. And there's still hope that we can move toward a peaceful settlement.

I think if there were not hope, that Foreign Minister Dayan would not be coming to Washington to meet with our own officials to explore further avenues for progress.

As you know, since Prime Minister Begin was here, Ezer Weizman, who is the Defense Minister of Israel, has been to Egypt twice (once)<sup>1</sup> to meet with President Sadat. So, discussions are going on and explorations are continuing.

And I am firmly convinced that both the Israelis and the Egyptians want peace. They both are concerned about the terms of peace. After years of hatred and even active combat, there's still an element of distrust about the future intentions of each other.

But I am hopeful that we can continue to make progress. My commitment is deep and irreversible. As long as I'm in the White House as President, I will continue to pursue, without any slacking of my interests or commitment, the avenue toward peace.

And I anticipate that now and in the future there will be temporary periods of discouragement and withdrawal of the negotiating parties. So, I think every evidence that I have both publicly and privately known is that both sides want peace and the progress toward peace is steady.

VIEWS ON THE CONGRESS

Q. Mr. President, last week you used very strong language to criticize Congress for wasting a year on energy legislation, and you also urged Congress to be more responsive to the public desire for tax reform.

Since this allegedly laggardly, unresponsive Congress is controlled by the Democrats, and since congressional elections will be held this fall, doesn't this constitute an attack on members of your own party?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I wouldn't characterize it as an attack. I think it was an accurate description of the fact that for 12 months Congress had had a very good energy proposal before it and had not acted conclusively on it.

The day after I made that statement, the negotiating team within the conference committee did resolve to their own satisfaction the question of the regulation and pricing of natural gas, one of the most difficult political questions that ever addressed Congress. This has been kicking around now for at least 30 years. I think Truman vetoed the first natural gas de-regulation bill. I think it's a step in the right direction.

Now, out of the five major categories of proposals I made to the Congress a year ago, four of them have been resolved at least at the conference level, and now the remaining issue is the pricing of oil.

We, last year, imported $45 billion worth of oil, too much, and I believe the Congress is beginning to see that the public supports action on the energy legislation and that when they do act it will help our whole economy.

I think that one of the reasons that the stock market has gone up, I think almost 75 points in the last 2 weeks, unprecedented rise, is, among other things, a new commitment to fighting inflation and the apparent willingness of Congress now to act on the energy legislation—those two things.

So, I'm not attacking the Congress, but I reserve the right to point out the inactivity of Congress, which I think on occasion does inspire them to act more rapidly.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Q. Mr. President, a few days ago you met with some top executives of big corporations to discuss inflation. Did you discuss unemployment at the same time? If so, could you tell us about that as it relates to unemployment?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, we did discuss unemployment. I pointed out to the executives who were here that in the last, I'd say, 12 months, because of the good action on the part of the Democratic Congress in putting into law our stimulus package, that we had had a dramatic drop in the unemployment rate, and that a year ago, they, around that table, including myself and the members of my Cabinet who were there, had been almost completely committed or concerned about unemployment. That is now going in the right direction. I think the last 3 or 4 months show that the unemployment rate is at 6 percent or a little above, almost 2 full percentage points less than it was 15 months ago, when I became President. This has got to continue.

We also discussed the fact that the focusing of Federal programs concerning reducing unemployment can now be placed upon those who are most difficult to employ—minority citizens, women, and others who are the last ones hired and the first ones fired, and the young people who also have a very high unemployment rate.

So, we are not slackening off at all on the employment question. The programs that we put into effect are still in effect. They are getting more and more specifically effective with different groups as time goes on. My belief is that the unemployment rate will continue to decrease, particularly among those groups that I've just described and, at the same time, we can tackle inflation with a much higher concentration of our own effort and commitment and public awareness.

The two are not in conflict. We've seen that when the last administration, which happens to have been Republican, concentrated on inflation by letting unemployment go up, it did not work. So, I believe the best thing is to do what we've already done, and that is to try to hold down inflation and bring down unemployment at the same time. That's what we are trying to do.

LOBBYING ACTIVITY IN CONGRESS

Q. Mr. President, in view of the increased lobbying on the Hill, witness the Panama Canal and your civil service reform and all of this, can you support Senator Kennedy's new expected legislation on lobbies?

THE PRESIDENT. I strongly support the lobby control legislation that's now before the Congress. I'm not sure that I know exactly the terms of Senator Kennedy's own bill. The Congress will vote this week, the House of Representatives will vote this week, on a very effective lobby control bill, a lobby reform bill, and I support that strongly.

It was one of the themes that I pursued during my own campaign for President. We've been actively involved in drafting it in the strongest possible terms, and I do support it.

INTEREST RATES

Q. Mr. President, were you surprised last week when the Federal Reserve raised the short-term interest rate, and have you any reaction to it?

THE PRESIDENT. I didn't have any prior knowledge that the Federal Reserve was going to raise the interest rates. I do get a report frequently and regularly about the supply of money and how much it is increasing. I understand after the action was taken, because of an explanation by the Chairman to Charlie Schultze, that the reason they did raise the interest rates was because the money supply was increasing more rapidly than they desired or thought was advisable for our country. And obviously, as you know, the Federal Reserve Board is completely independent of me. They have no reason to consult with me before they make a decision, and don't do it as a matter of policy.

But I think that the interest rates ought to be kept as low as possible, and as you know, I can help to control that by the form of economic proposals I make to the Congress, the budget levels and so forth. And the Congress can help to determine that by the rate of taxation and the size of the deficit, and the Federal Reserve primarily by controlling in indirect means the supply of money.

But that's an independent action. I did not know about it ahead of time. I understand the reason that they did it. I would like to do everything I can—I know that Bill Miller would, too—to hold down interest rate levels.

MIDDLE EAST ARMS SALES

Q. Mr. President, your spokesmen have said that there will be written assurances from Saudi Arabia and Egypt that they will not use the warplanes against Israel in any future conflict. And further, various administration spokesmen have pointed out that the Saudi Arabian Government will be dependent on the U.S. for technical support for these planes, and this support could always be cut off in the event that a future conflict would start and that the Saudis desired to use the weapons against Israel.

Is it your understanding that both types of assurances will be in effect?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we would not sell the planes to the Saudi Arabians if we thought that the desire was to use them against Israel. I'm completely convinced that the Saudis want their airplanes to be used to protect their own country.

The Saudis have informed officials in our Government that they do not desire to deploy them at Tabuk, which is the airfield nearest to Israel, and I know for a fact that the configuration of the weapons on the F-15 that the Saudis have offered is primarily a defensive configuration. And for those reasons I feel sure that the problems that you described are adequately addressed in the proposals that I've made to the Congress and in the statements that the Saudis have already made.

NEW YORK CITY

Q. Mr. President, the long-term loan package for New York City is in a great deal of trouble on Capitol Hill. I'm curious, sir, just how much of a commitment are you prepared to make to push for that legislation in the coming weeks?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, it's one of the major goals of our administration to have economic aid for New York City. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mike Blumenthal, has discussed this since the first day, first few days that we were in office, with the mayor of New York, Beame, and now Koch, and also with Governor Carey and other officials in New York—the labor leaders, the bankers in New York City, and others. We've also had close consultations with the committees in Congress.

We have proposed a package that I think would alleviate New York City's short-term and long-term financial problems. But a major part of the responsibility has got to fall upon the people in New York City itself.

Unless New York is willing to commit themselves and to prove to us that they can and will balance the budget through careful consideration of how money is expended to the levels of taxation involved, unless the leaders in New York City, both in and out of government, prove to us and the Congress that they will operate or cooperate together to put New York City back on a sound basis, I don't think it's possible for the Congress to pass the New York City legislative proposal that we have already submitted to the Congress.

I think that, so far, indications are that all persons involved—ourselves, the congressional leaders, and the New York City officials in and out of government—are committed to this common goal. So, I believe the Congress will pass the legislation. I think the proposal we made will help to solve New York City's problems without costing the American taxpayers anything. And I believe that it will bring all of us together in a much more cooperative way.

Judy [Judy Woodruff, NBC News].

TAX REDUCTION AND REFORM

Q. Mr. President, if I could just follow up on an earlier tax question, how unfair do you think the tax burden is that this country now places on the middle class? And if you do think it's unfair, then why are you so insistent on pushing tax reforms that most people believe are going to hit the middle class the worst and on resisting a rollback in social security taxes that would also penalize the middle class?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, let me answer your last question first.

One of the things that we had to do last year was to bring the social security system out of near bankruptcy into a sound economic position. Two of the three major reserve funds for the social security were on the verge of bankruptcy, and the Congress had to increase the social security payments to keep the social security system sound. They acted courageously and properly in that respect.

In order to make sure that the taxpayers in all categories, with very few exceptions, have a net reduction in their taxes this year, even after paying increased social security benefits, that's where the tax reduction proposal comes in.

If the Congress should not act in accordance with my request and lower income taxes, then there would be a net increase in taxes paid by the middle-income groups.

Another factor that has not yet been adequately publicized is that those very people who pay high income taxes, those $20, $25, $30,000 citizens having that much income per year, will also get greater benefits when they retire. So, in a way it's kind of an investment for them.

We have a lot of abuses in the system that ought to be eliminated. Last year, for instance, one medical doctor, a surgeon, owns a yacht, and he took a $14,000 tax credit, tax exemption, for entertaining other doctors on his yacht. This is legal under the present law. Most American citizens don't have a yacht, and when they go for a small pleasure ride, if they do have a small boat, they can't deduct it as an income tax deduction. And when that doctor didn't pay his $14,000 in taxes, other average, working American families had to pay his taxes for him.

We've another instance that I recall from the statistics I've read, that one businessman charged off 338 lunches last year, more than $10,000 in so-called business lunches, more than many American families make in all. And the average, working American had to pay that guy's taxes for him. I think that's a gross abuse of the average American family. And that's the kind of corrections that we're trying to put in.

On Capitol Hill now there is concentrated an unbelievable number of highly qualified, very intelligent, very effective lobbyists trying to induce the Members of Congress to preserve those special privileges for people who have them because they are so powerful and so influential, now and in the past, that they could carve out for themselves some special deal in the income tax laws of our country at the expense of the average American family. That's where tax reform comes in.

So, tax reduction is important to make sure we don't put an extra tax burden on our people, even counting social security. Tax reform is necessary to let our tax code be simple and fair for a change. Both those changes, both those recommendations are urgently needed.

FRANK CORMIER [Associated Press].
Thank you, Mr. President.

Department of Justice

Nomination of Gilbert G. Pompa To Be Director of the Community Relations Service. April 26, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Gilbert G. Pompa, of San Antonio, Tex., to be Director of the Community Relations Service at the Justice Department. He would replace Benjamin F. Holman, who has resigned.

Pompa was born October 1, 1931, in Devine, Tex. He received an LL.B. from St. Mary's University in 1958. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1950 to 1952.

Pompa practiced law in San Antonio from 1958 to 1960. From 1960 to 1963, he was assistant city attorney for San Antonio, and from 1963 to 1967, he was assistant district attorney of Bexar County, Tex.

Pompa has been with the Community Relations Service since 1967, serving as a field representative, then assistant director for field services, then equal opportunity officer. He has been Deputy Director since 1976 and Acting Director since 1977.

Public Disclosure of Lobbying Legislation

Statement on House of Representatives Approval of H.R. 8494. April 26, 1978

I want to congratulate the House of Representatives for its passage today of H.R. 8494, the proposed Public Disclosure of Lobbying Act of 1978. I am especially grateful to Congressman George Danielson for his leadership in helping to formulate the bill and guide it through the House.

Lobbying is a constitutionally protected activity that plays an important role in the governmental process. It is precisely because of the importance of lobbying in the conduct of the public's business that it should be more open to the public's scrutiny. This bill will enable the American people to understand and see more clearly how the legislative process is being affected by organizations that engage in significant lobbying activities.

I urge the Senate to act quickly on a lobby registration and disclosure bill so that we can have an effective new law by the end of this season.

NOTE: The statement was released on April 27.

Institutes Honoring Senators Hubert H. Humphrey and Everett M. Dirksen

Remarks on Signing S. 2452 Into Law. April 27, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Senator Humphrey and Senator Wendell Anderson and the Vice President and I assembled here for a very significant signing ceremony.

This is a bill that has been passed by the Congress authorizing the Commissioner of Education to make grants to two institutes established, one in Minnesota, in honor of Senator Hubert Humphrey, the other one in Illinois, in honor of Republican leader Senator Everett Dirksen.

These institutes are designed to further the study of politics in its finest form, to improve the quality of the Congress, particularly emphasized at the Dirksen Institute. And it sets reasonable limits on how much American taxpayers' money can be devoted to these institutes, which I think is a very worthy expenditure in these instances.

Because of the close association, both in the Senate and in the home State, between the Vice President and Senator Humphrey, I've asked him to make a few comments about this. I particularly want to congratulate Senator Muriel Humphrey for the great work she and her husband did together. And Wendell Anderson is here associated with this.

I think this is a good bipartisan demonstration of the fact that both Republicans and Democrats in the Congress, when working in harmony, can further the purposes of our Nation for the best interests of the whole world. Both Senator Humphrey and Senator Dirksen were interested not only in domestic affairs in the finest sense of the word but also were interested in international matters. And to honor these two great men with these institutes for further study and analysis will be an additional benefit derived from their lives for the people of the United States.

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It was my privilege to serve for several years with Senator Dirksen, and we became very close friends. He was many things, but I've never known anybody on the Senate floor who, when he spoke, drew a more interested crowd than did Senator Dirksen. He always made the Senate an interesting institution. He loved it; he served it through most of his political career. And on his passing, I don't know of anybody who had more friends than did Senator Dirksen.

We asked Senator Baker to be with us today, but he is in Geneva for consultations in our crucial SALT talks there. And we are pleased that we have Darek and Cynthia Baker with us, their children, who are here representing their mother and father at this important event.

And, of course, our relationship with Senator Humphrey is well known. As I said some time back, he served almost as my surrogate father for years. We stood together in every conceivable kind of battle, and I consider the matter of enormous pride and enormous privilege that I was permitted to live and to serve in public life as a close friend of one of the greatest public servants ever to serve in the history of our country.

And I'm grateful that the Congress has made these grants now in the memory of these two Senators. And it's the right kind of memorial. This will go for research, it will go for training. It will train new public leaders and scholars in political science, in public affairs, and is the kind of living memorial I am sure Muriel and Hubert wanted, I know that the Baker family wants for Senator Dirksen.

So, I'm delighted to be here, and thank the Congress for their help.

THE PRESIDENT. I know you are proud of your grandfather, and Muriel obviously is proud of her husband. Now I would like to sign these.

[At this point, the President signed the bill.]

Thank you very much. Congratulations.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9 a.m. at the signing ceremony in the Cabinet Room at the White House.

As enacted, S. 2452 is Public Law 95-270, approved April 27. The bill authorizes grants of $5 million and $2.5 million, respectively, to the Hubert H. Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs, located at the University of Minnesota in Minneapolis-St. Paul, and the Everett McKinley Dirksen Congressional Leadership Research Center in Pekin, Ill.

Federal Audiovisual Programs

*Announcement of Results Following Administration Review of the Programs.
April 27, 1978*

The administration today announced the results of a year-long review of Federal audiovisual programs. It released a report identifying areas of waste and inefficiency in the $500 million spent on these programs annually, and announced steps to make expenditures more effective. The study identified such problems as:

Proliferation and underutilization of television facilities.

In the past, the Government has maintained no comprehensive list of facilities, and there has been little facility sharing. Many studios have been used at less than half-capacity. One agency recently proposed spending more than $4 million on a one-time audiovisual training program, including the purchase of more than $2 million in playback equipment. Had this expenditure been approved, at the end of a brief training period the equipment would have been sold for a fraction of the purchase price.

Ineffective distribution of materials.

Agencies often produce motion pictures without a clear idea of the intended audience and without an effective distribution plan. Many Government films intended for general audiences end up being shown only to limited groups.

Agency self-promotion.

Some films merely promote agency images rather than provide support for programs. Film proposals often simply state that the film is made to make the agency look good. This sort of effort will be barred as a result of action taken following the review.

Wasteful duplication.

Since there is no comprehensive catalog of Government films, duplication is common. For example, two military departments recently completed nearly identical films, at costs of more than $70,000 each, on how to avoid being trapped by foreign agents. A third military department proposed yet another film which would use the same approach to convey the same message.

During the study, a number of projects were identified which appeared to be wasteful, duplicate existing material, or failed to identify a target audience. Already, projects totaling more than $4 million have been cancelled. Other recommendations, still under consideration, could result in additional savings of more than $8 million.

Based on the review, a number of agencies have already drafted new procedures to reduce waste and duplication in their audiovisual activities.

In cooperation with the Office of Management and Budget, a new Audiovisual Management Circular has been developed and put into effect. The circular included the following requirements:

- Underutilized production facilities will be consolidated, reduced in size, or closed down.
- Audiovisual material should be used to support specific agency programs, not for agency self-promotion.
- A master catalog will be prepared. To reduce duplication, agencies will be required to use the catalog to see if what they need already exists.
- Production will be justified on criteria such as need for the material, costs, intended audience, and planned distribution.
- Records of audiovisual products and expenditures on in-house production will be maintained in a single location and be a matter of public record.

The General Services Administration has been assigned the responsibility of providing guidance to agencies in implementing the circular and the recommendations made during the review.

The review of Government programs was conducted by Robert Lissit, under the direction of the Office of Telecommunications Policy and, subsequently, the National Telecommunications and Information Administration. It was coordinated with members of the White House staff, with the participation of OMB's Office of Federal Procurement Policy.

President's Environmental Youth Awards

April 27, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. I'd like to say just a word before we begin the awards ceremony.

Last year I initiated a program to recognize outstanding young people throughout our country who are moving on their own, particularly at the local community level, to improve the environmental quality of our Nation. The whole thrust of this effort is to encourage young people to participate, to analyze how they can contribute to the quality of life around their own homes in a practical way, not just a theoretical way, and to let the judgment of how successful they are be determined by those who live in the community itself.

We've got just a small group, about 15 here this morning, to receive awards that will be given by the Environmental Protection Agency. They represent about 70,000 young people who participated within the last 12 months in this very notable and worthwhile effort. And I'd like to call on Doug Costle, now, and Barbara Blum to read the citations, and I will participate in the award of the honors.

I've studied what they have done in the different communities represented here, and I think when you see what they've done, you'll understand that it's been a practical matter, in solid waste disposal sites, the quality of water in a local stream, the enhancement of the beauty of a major community. These kinds of things are very practical, down to earth, but extremely important.

Barbara, Doug?

MR. COSTLE. Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen, the first group of young people here today are from the Marie Reed Community Learning Center. Now, they've already undertaken some beautification projects, but one of the interesting things this group of 11-year-olds is doing is planting a garden this spring to grow vegetables that in fact will be used in the school lunchroom. And they've been particularly active, and we'd like first to ask the President if he wouldn't present the award to them.

MS. BLUM. Mr. President, I'd like to present Tyrone Arrington.

THE PRESIDENT. Very good. This group, by the way, is from Washington, D.C., right?

MR. COSTLE. That's right.

THE PRESIDENT. Congratulations.

MS. BLUM. And this is Allen King.

THE PRESIDENT. Allen, which one of those vegetables are you looking forward to having? Have you got a favorite vegetable?

MR. KING. No. [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. This group has been involved, so far, in beautification, right? And you're also going to do the vegetable production. Very good.

MS. BLUM. Mr. President, Scotty Vaughan.

THE PRESIDENT. Scotty Vaughan, congratulations to you.

MR. COSTLE. Mr. President, this next young man is from Breese, Illinois, and he is really a rather remarkable young fellow. He started a very careful effort to do stream water quality monitoring. He went out and bought his own equipment, he set up his own lab, he picked eight sites. He's done over 2,000 samples to test the water of the streams in his neighborhood for pollution. And he's picked up in those samples examples of petroleum-related discharges, of area-source discharges, and also ordinary sewage discharges. But he's done this entirely on his own. He's really quite a remarkable young man.

MS. BLUM. Steven Michael Mensing, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Steven? Tell me how the quality of—Beaver Creek, right?

MR. MENSING. Right.

THE PRESIDENT. How's the quality changed since you've been doing your tests—at all?

MR. MENSING. Since I've begun my tests, an oil pump has been removed, so that's going to take away some of the problems.

THE PRESIDENT. Very good. Make sure everybody in your community knows what they can do to make Beaver Creek a purer and more beautiful stream. Good luck to you.

MR. MENSING. Thank you, Mr. President.

MR. COSTLE. Mr. President, the next award winners are from Ballou Senior High School here in Washington. And they have been interested in a variety of things. Most notably they've started a major recycling center, and they're recycling aluminum. I think they've already recycled on the order of 10,000 cans. They also took an interest in noise problems, and they've made a number of recommendations, as I understand it, that the school's actually adopted, that have in fact reduced the noise levels with which they have to contend. And we're particularly proud of this group.

MS. BLUM. Mr. President, Donna Cunningham.

THE PRESIDENT. Donna, congratulations to you. I'm very proud of you.

I might point out that this is a permanent recycling center that they've established, primarily for aluminum, and they've done noise studies in their own classroom areas to make sure that noise pollution is both recognized and reduced.

This is something that could be important as a project for schools throughout the country, because quite often, we don't realize how high the noise level comes and how disturbing it can be, not only to concentration on studies but also actually to the health of the students involved.

MS. BLUM. And the second person on the project, Leslie Only.

THE PRESIDENT. Leslie, good luck to you, and thank you for the good work you've done.

MR. COSTLE. Mr. President, our final group is from B.M.C. Durfee High School in Fall River, Massachusetts. Now, they've been involved in an ongoing committee effort at the school for over 3 years. Their first area of interest was water quality, and they've done a number of surveys in that area. They've more recently gotten interested in the solid waste problems of the city, and they've spent time at the municipal incinerator, they've done air sampling at that incinerator, and they've come up with a number of very concrete suggestions on how to introduce resource recovery in that area and to improve the way the garbage problem is in fact handled.

MS. BLUM. Mr. President, may I present Mary Ellen Gurnett.

THE PRESIDENT. Mary Ellen, congratulations to you.

MS. BLUM. And this is Richard Mechaber.

THE PRESIDENT. Richard, congratulations.

MS. BLUM. Ann Marie Medeiros.

THE PRESIDENT. Ann Marie, thank you for coming.

MS. BLUM. Frances Melvin.

THE PRESIDENT. Frances, congratulations.

Ms. BLUM. Joanne Nicoletti.

THE PRESIDENT. Joanne, good luck, and thank you for the good work.

Ms. BLUM. Joseph Sabik.

THE PRESIDENT. Joseph, good to see you.

Ms. BLUM. Janet Vincelette (Ms. Blum should have said "Ann Salois.")<sup>1</sup>

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much. Is that the wrong name?

Ms. BLUM. Stephen Vincelette.

THE PRESIDENT. Is that right? Okay.

Ms. BLUM. Janice Yee.

THE PRESIDENT. Janice, congratulations to you.

Well, I want to say in closing that this is a group who have been chosen to represent the 70,000 other young people of their age who have participated in these practical explorations of streams, yards, and schoolgrounds, noise levels, garbage dumps, waste disposal, air pollution, every aspect of environmental quality. And what they do can make Doug Costle's job much easier in the future by cutting down on the violations of the law and the violations of the purity of the air and water and earth that God gave us in our beautiful country.

Congratulations to you, Doug, on establishing the program and seeing it grow. I hope it'll be an even greater success, Barbara, this coming year.

Ms. BLUM. Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you, everybody. We are deeply indebted to you for setting an example for the rest of the country, and I'm proud of you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 12 noon at the ceremony in the Cabinet Room at the White House. Also participating in the ceremony were Douglas M. Costle, Administrator, and Barbara Blum, Deputy Administrator, Environmental Protection Agency.

Consumer Affairs

April 27, 1978

Memorandum for the Heads of Departments and Agencies

Because decisions made by government have a direct and substantial impact on the American consumer, I have a firm commitment to consumer involvement in government. One of this Administration's principal goals is to ensure that each agency of the Federal Government adequately responds to consumer needs in its development of policy and provides adequate opportunities for consumer participation in its decisionmaking processes.

Therefore, I am immediately strengthening the White House Office of Consumer Affairs and increasing its responsibilities. I am asking my Special Assistant for Consumer Affairs, Esther Peterson, to fulfill the following responsibilities:

- To participate in the development of domestic policy decisions and to advise me concerning the potential impact on consumers of proposed or existing policies and programs, and pending legislation so that I may have the benefit of the consumer point of view when making decisions.
- To survey the consumer programs of the various Federal agencies in order to determine if there is a meaningful consumer presence in each agency and to make recommendations to me on how my Administration might further assure consumer involvement in agency decisionmaking.
- To undertake a complete review of Federal agency consumer programs and to advise me as to whether these programs are responsive to the needs of consumers consistent with the consumer policies and goals of my Administration. I am asking that this review be completed in time for our FY 1980 budget assessments and our 1979 legislative proposals.

- To coordinate the activities of Federal agency consumer programs in order to avoid duplication and to ensure that they are efficiently administered.

To assist my Special Assistant for Consumer Affairs in fulfilling these responsibilities, I direct all executive departments and agencies to cooperate with and provide information to my Special Assistant as needed. In implementing these responsibilities, my Special Assistant will, from time to time, consult and meet with the Secretary, or appropriate Assistant Secretary, of each Federal department and agency responsible for consumer programs, for the purpose of establishing a framework within which to evaluate and review the policies, budgets, activities, and structure of consumer-related programs in each agency.

I have also asked my Special Assistant for Consumer Affairs to meet with responsible representatives of business, labor, farm, and consumer groups in fulfilling the new responsibilities outlined in this memorandum.

I am confident that all will give their full support to my Special Assistant in the performance of new responsibilities and duties outlined here.

Export of Special Nuclear Material to India

Message to the Congress Transmitting Executive Order 12055. April 27, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting herewith, pursuant to Section 126b(2) of the Atomic Energy

Act of 1954, as amended, an Executive Order authorizing the export of 7,638 Kgs. of low-enriched uranium to India for use in the fueling of its Tarapur Atomic Power Station.

In our Agreement for Cooperation with India, the United States agreed to supply all of the fuel requirements for that Power Station, and India agreed to operate it exclusively on U.S.-supplied fuel. We contracted to supply the specific fuel here involved a number of years ago.

An application for a license to export this fuel was submitted to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission early last year. This application was carefully reviewed within the Executive Branch, which concluded that the proposed export would not be inimical to the common defense and security, that it would meet all the immediate statutory criteria under the then pending Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act, and that the license should be issued. Later that month, the Commission was officially notified of the Executive Branch findings and recommendations.

On April 20, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission found itself unable to agree upon the issuance of this license, being divided by a 2-2 vote. The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 wisely provided for just such a contingency. Previously, there was no clear way of dealing with a situation in which the Commission was unable to decide upon the issuance of an export license, and no way of ensuring that in cases where the licensing process would lead to a result that the President believed would be seriously prejudicial to the achievement of United States non-proliferation objectives, such prejudice could be avoided.

I have determined that this is such a case. The Government of India has given us its commitments to use our exports only at the Tarapur Atomic Power Station and not for any explosive or military purpose, and I have the highest confidence that it will honor these commitments. I am convinced that denial of this export would seriously undermine our efforts to persuade India to accept full-scope safeguards, and would seriously prejudice the achievement of other U.S. non-proliferation goals. I intend to pursue these matters further with the Government of India.

A period in which to seek agreement to full-scope safeguards was clearly provided for in the Act. The Act permits a continuation of exports during this period, including exports in cases where there are questions as to whether and when that objective may be achieved. Rather than prejudice the prospects for success in such efforts by refusing to fulfill an existing commitment that is important to India's power supply, we should be using this period to find, in the light of the new legislation's requirements, mutually acceptable ways of meeting both India's need for continued operation of the Tarapur Atomic Power Station and our need for full-scope safeguards and the attainment of other non-proliferation objectives.

In transmitting this Executive Order to you pursuant to Section 126b(2) of the Act, I wish to make clear that I am not departing from the reservations I expressed at the time I signed the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 concerning the constitutionality of provisions of that Act which purport to allow Congress to overturn my decisions by actions not subject to my veto power.

Export of Special Nuclear Material to India

Executive Order 12055. April 27, 1978

By virtue of the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution of the United States of America and by Section 126b(2) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 (42 U.S.C. 2155), as amended by Section 304(a) of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 (Public Law 95-242, 92 Stat. 131), and having determined that withholding the export proposed pursuant to Nuclear Regulatory Commission export license application XSNM-1060 would be seriously prejudicial to the achievement of the United States non-proliferation objectives, that export to India is authorized; however, such export shall not occur for a period of 60 days as defined by Section 130g of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended.

President's Commission on Mental Health

Remarks on Receiving the Commission's Final Report. April 27, 1978

Rosalynn mentioned that last February, when we established the Commission, that I didn't authorize much time nor money. She pointed out in February how difficult it would be to bring together the widely and disparate groups who have always been interested in mental illness of all kinds and get a report completed in this short a period of not much more than a year. I told her that all she had to worry about was getting a mental health report finished by April, that I would have a comprehensive energy plan finished by October last year. [Laughter]

So, I launched my effort by calling it the moral equivalent of war. The other night Rosalynn said that if the President and the Congress in the Pacific war in the 1940's had been as effective as the Congress and I have on the energy plan, that the people in Plains would all be speaking Japanese. [Laughter]

I have seen my wife and dedicated professionals and volunteers work on improving the mental health status in Georgia while I was Governor. And I knew that in the choice of this Commission, who stand behind me on the stage, that we had put together a group with a wide range of credentials, experience, dedication, knowledge, and commitment that would be unexcelled. They were each chosen very carefully. They've worked harmoniously together.

About one out of seven Americans need mental treatment of some kind at any particular moment. This affliction in all its varied forms touches almost every family in the United States. The effort to bring treatment to those who lack it because of discrimination, because of inattention on the part of public officials, because of an inadequate allotment of medical care from one community to another, because of an absence of close cooperation between the Federal, State, and local governments, between government and the private sector of our Nation, between those who deal in physical health and the inseparable questions of mental health, have caused this unnecessary suffering.

Twenty-five years ago we spent about $1.7 billion on mental health in this country. Now we spend ten times this much, about $17 billion, about half of which is public funds. I've looked through this report, and Rosalynn has explained to me the major thrust of it. It is a superb analysis of the problems that we still have in the adequate delivery of mental health care to the people of our country.

There is not a heavy emphasis on increased budget allotments nor initiation of new programs, but there's an emphasis on how we can coordinate delivery of existing programs better with some modest increase in the budget which I intend to support and recommend to the Congress next year.

In this allotment of additional funds, which, as I say, is very modest, we will emphasize the prevention of mental illness, the care for those who chronically suffer from mental illness, the training of additional personnel who are qualified to treat those who suffer from this illness, the better distribution of their services around the country and to communities which are not presently served, and additional research to determine with a minimum expenditure of American finances how we can better deal with this severe problem that our Nation still experiences.

This will not be a costly program, but it will be a program that can save enormous amounts of public funds, because to care for a person who is suffering from mental illness unnecessarily is an extremely expensive proposition, costing tens of thousands of dollars, sometimes each year, for a normal lifespan of 50 or 60 years, for a mentally afflicted person. So, it's an excellent investment in the future.

I'm very grateful for what my wife has done, Tom Bryant, and the members of the Commission. I've never seen a group work with more dedication and produce a better product. And I and Joe Califano, Pat Harris, and the Members of the Congress who are here—Senator Kennedy is here representing the Senate, Paul Rogers is here representing the House—we are all dedicated to carrying out the recommendations of this report. I think it will have a profound beneficial effect on our country in years to come.

And as President I'm deeply indebted to this group and the 450 other people who worked on this report for what they have contributed to our own ability to serve the American people better. Rosalynn and all of you, thank you very much for what you've done.

NOTE: The ceremony began at 2 p.m. in the East Room at the White House. Prior to his remarks, the President received the report from Mrs. Carter, Honorary Chairperson of the Commission. Dr. Thomas E. Bryant is Chairman of the Commission.

The report is entitled "Report to the President From the President's Commission on Mental Health, 1978" (Government Printing Office, 94 pages plus appendices).

Loyalty Day, 1978

Proclamation 4567. April 27, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

Throughout the remainder of our third century of national existence, America will face problems that will differ markedly from those we have confronted in the past. Yet some things will remain constant. Among these is the loyalty of the American people.

Because we are a free people, the loyalty we feel to our country is deeper than that which any imposed political or ideological orthodoxy could possibly evoke. And as long as we continue to remain faithful to the principles and freedoms on which our republic was founded, that loyalty will see us through whatever challenges lie ahead.

To encourage the people of the United States to reflect upon the liberties and institutions that have inspired the loyalty of so many generations of Americans, the Congress, by joint resolution of July 18, 1958 (72 Stat. 369; 36 U.S.C. 162) has designated the first day of May of each year as Loyalty Day and has requested the President to issue a proclamation calling for its appropriate observance.

Now, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, call upon all Americans to observe Monday, May 1, 1978, as Loyalty Day. I ask the appropriate officials of the Government to display the flag of the United States on that day on all Government buildings.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this twenty-seventh day of April, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

The President's Visit to Panama

Announcement of the Visit. April 28, 1978

President Carter has accepted an invitation from Brig. Gen. Omar Torrijos to visit Panama. In consultations with Panama, the dates of June 16 and 17 have been set for the visit.

The principal purpose of the visit is to sign the protocol confirming the exchange of the documents ratifying the Panama Canal treaties. Pursuant to a reservation adopted by the Senate, the effective date of this exchange will be March 31, 1979, unless Congress passes implementing legislation at an earlier date.

The details of the President's schedule are being worked out with the Government of Panama.

Tree-Planting Ceremony

*Remarks at the Planting of a Cedar of Lebanon on the White House Grounds.
April 28, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. Mr. Ambassador and Senator Abourezk, Congresswoman Oakar, Congressman Toby Moffett, and distinguished members of the American Lebanese community:

This afternoon we are participating in a ceremony that has both enjoyable connotations and, I think, very strong historical and symbolic significance. In the Bible, the Cedars of Lebanon are mentioned more than 60 times, and there are on the hills near Beirut trees that have been living there for more than 2,500 years, symbols of beauty and strength of an ancient and proud heritage and of the symbolism of peace and a commitment to historical development.

Since 1943, Lebanon, as an independent nation, has been a good exemplification for democracy in the finest aspects of that form of government which we share.

The tree that we plant today is one of the Cedars of Lebanon, and it will be here on the historic White House grounds, a constant reminder of these attributes which I've just described, and also of the friendship that binds our country with the nation of Lebanon.

There are many people who live in the United States whose families still live in Lebanon and who have maintained their close kinship and friendship there. I look on Lebanon with a heart filled with gratitude and appreciation, friendship, and also deep sorrow and concern.

In recent months and in recent years, I don't know of any nation that has suffered more in an unwarranted, undeserved way than has Lebanon and her people. Just in recent weeks, hundreds of Lebanese have been killed, and perhaps 200,000 made homeless. The heart and the concern of the world go out to the people of Lebanon.

We hope and we pray that soon peace can come to that fine and noble and beleaguered and suffering land and that the brave people there, who have set an example for progress in the Middle East, can have peace restored to their country. Hardly a city or town or hamlet or family exists in Lebanon that hasn't suffered recently and very deeply, and I'm very grateful that these Lebanese Americans assembled around me have honored the people of the United States and the White House grounds itself by this gift of this Cedar of Lebanon tree.

Thank you all on behalf of our country. And I'm dedicated, through reminder of this gift and through my own knowledge and commitment, to seeing that the ties that have been of such great importance to us in the past will be even stronger in the future—the friendship between the people of Lebanon and the people of the United States.

Thank you very much.

PAUL A. COREY. Mr. President, responding on behalf of the American Lebanese League and the total American Lebanese community in this country is our distinguished national chairman, Dr. Elias Saadi.

DR. SAADI. Mr. President, distinguished assembly:

An old Arabic saying goes that the hand of God rests on the heart of the King. Today, by planting this Cedar of Lebanon, you have touched our hearts, sir, our hearts so heavily burdened with agony of the Lebanese people, and, Mr. President, you have consoled us. By this generous and symbolic act, you have signaled to the world your concern.

This cedar, which is so much celebrated in Scripture, has become a symbol of strength and timelessness. Today this cedar, which provides so much inspiration to us as Americans, is a symbol of hope to free people everywhere. We plant this tree in the fertile soil of our land and hope that it takes root in its adopted country as did our forefathers. Let it be a constant reminder of their success in becoming part of the American dream. Let it be a constant remembrance of the traditional ties between the United States and Lebanon, and let it be a living memorial that righteousness and justice in the pursuit of human rights are indeed enduring virtues.

Today, Mr. President, the Lebanese people are struggling to preserve their democracy and their freedom and retain a society of genuine pluralism. As a result, their human rights have been violated in a serious and significant way.

We express our gratitude to you, Mr. President, for your leadership in the action taken by the United Nations in forming the U.N. Interim Force in Lebanon, UNIFIL. We hope this will lead and expect it to lead to the ability of Lebanon to be the sole authority within its borders. We look to you, Mr. President, for continued leadership for a stable Lebanon, which we believe is the key to Middle East peace.

Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 2:16 p.m. at the Southwest Jefferson Mound on the South Grounds. Also participating in the ceremony were Lebanese Ambassador to the United States Najati Kabbani, and Paul A. Corey, president, and Dr. Elias T. Saadi, chairman of the board of the American Lebanese League, which had presented the cedar to the President.

National Transportation Safety Board

Nomination of Francis H. McAdams To Be a Member. April 28, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Francis H. McAdams, of Washington, D.C., for reappointment as a member of the National Transportation Safety Board for a term expiring December 31, 1982.

McAdams was born December 27, 1915, in Brooklyn, N.Y. He holds A.B., LL.B., and LL.M. degrees from Georgetown University. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1942 to 1946.

From 1946 to 1948, McAdams was a corporate and trial attorney for Capital Airlines, and from 1948 to 1951, he was an attorney-trial examiner and air safety investigator for the Civil Aeronautics Board. From 1951 to 1954, he was senior trial attorney for the Civil Aeronautics Board.

From 1954 to 1958, McAdams practiced law in Chicago. He was executive assistant and legal adviser to the Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board from 1958 until 1967, when he became one of the original members of the National Transportation Safety Board.

Territory of Guam

Message to the Congress Transmitting the Territory's Proposed Constitution. April 28, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the provisions of Section 5 of the Act of October 21, 1976 (Public Law 94-584), I am hereby transmitting for the consideration of the Congress a proposed constitution for the Territory of Guam. The constitution, drafted by a territorial constitutional convention, was officially submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, who accepted it on my behalf, by the Honorable Ricardo J. Bordallo, Governor of Guam, on March 1, 1978.

Public Law 94-584 requires that I submit the constitution to the Congress, along with my comments. I am confident that the Congress will share my belief that the basic principles incorporated into the constitution provide a firm foundation upon which the people of Guam can assume greater responsibilities of local self-government in political union with the United States. Because it is their constitution, and must be respected as such, I shall confine my comments to those aspects of the document which relate directly and significantly to the territorial-Federal relationship. Accordingly, I would like to bring to the attention of the Congress the following aspects of the proposed constitution:

—Contrary to the express requirement of Section 2(b)(1) of Public Law 94-584 (the Enabling Act), the constitution does not explicitly recognize the sovereignty of the United States over Guam or the supremacy of its laws, a point noted by the Departments of State, Justice, and Interior in their reviews of the document. Accordingly, I ask the Congress to consider complications which could arise with respect to future claims of sovereignty and supremacy should it decline to take any of the corrective actions prescribed in Section 5 of the Enabling Act.

—Article IV, Section 1, of the constitution vests in the elected Governor responsibility for the faithful execution of the Constitution and laws of the United States applicable to Guam. In view of the Supreme Court's decision in Buckley v. Valeo (424 U.S. 1) that persons who enforce the laws of the United States must be appointed in the constitutionally prescribed manner, I ask the Congress to give careful consideration to this provision. Moreover, I suggest to the Congress that responsibility for the execution of Federal law is not a matter of local self-government and invite the Congress to consider whether the inclusion of such a clause, even if deemed constitutionally permissible, could lead to friction between the Governor and the Federal Government.

—Article V, Section 4(a), of the constitution provides for legislative apportionment on the basis of the number of registered voters in each district. I call to the attention of the Congress the Supreme Court's admonition in Burns v. Richardson (384 U.S. 73) and Ely v. Klahr (403 U.S. 108) that the use of voter registration as a basis may perpetuate underrepresentation of groups constitutionally entitled to participate in the electoral process and is permissible only if it produces a distribution of legislators not substantially different from that which would have resulted from the use of a permissible population basis.

—Article X, Section 4, of the constitution would amend the provision in Section 11 of the Organic Act of Guam (48 U.S. 1423a), which imposes public debt limitations on the territory. In light of the territory's fragile local economy and the continued financial responsibility of the Federal Government for Guam, I ask the Congress to give careful consideration to this provision.

In view of its responsibility under the Territories Clause of the United States Constitution, the Congress may wish to review the proposed constitution for Guam on bases other than just the effect of its provisions on the territorial-Federal relationship to which I have limited my comments.

Specifically, the appropriate committees of the Congress may wish to examine whether certain provisions of the Guam constitution are drafted with sufficient clarity to avoid the type of litigation that could preclude effective government. For example, the elevation to constitutional status of certain rights in Article II of the proposed constitution could cause such a result. Under our own system, many of these same rights are provided for by statute, not by the Constitution itself.

Also, the amendment procedure contained in Article XIV of the proposed constitution does not provide for review by the Congress, a requirement which does pertain to the basic document. The Congress may wish to consider the friction which could arise between Guam and the Federal Government should the constitution be amended in a way which would conflict with United States law.

Accordingly, I have directed the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Interior to provide the appropriate committees of both Houses with such technical advice and assistance as may be required. Both Departments have conducted thorough analyses of the proposed constitution and can offer the Congress additional information and recommended changes in language should the Congress choose to take any of the corrective actions prescribed in Section 5 of the Enabling Act.

I trust these comments will be of use to the Congress in its review.

National Federation of Democratic Women

*Remarks at a White House Reception.
April 28, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much for coming.

How many of you think we're going to have a tremendous Democratic victory in 1978? [Applause] How many of you helped us have a big Democratic victory in 1976? [Applause] Thank you very, very much.

Well, the National Federation of Democratic Women has meant a lot to me even before anyone knew I had any plans to run for President. In May of 1974, I made a speech in Omaha, Nebraska. Was anyone here there? [Applause] Very good. And a little bit after that, three women drove all the way from Kansas down to Atlanta to ask me if I would run for President in 1976. And, as you know, I took their advice. [Laughter] And I've been taking the advice of Democratic women both before and since, and your advice turned out, at least for me and, I think, the Nation, to be good.

Is Margaret Hobelman here, or Marie Vickers, and Harriet [Terry]? Very good. Well, I thank those three women and all of you for being so vital to me in my own campaign and to the country.

Let me say just a few things that are of importance to you and to our country and to me. I believe in the United States and what it stands for, and I believe in the Democratic Party and what it stands for.

For 8 years, as you know, in this house, the White House, we didn't have a Democratic vision, we didn't have a Democratic conviction, we didn't have Democratic leadership and Democratic Party ideas. But all that time, the essence of what our Nation is, what it stands for, what the Democratic Party is, what it stands for, was living in the hearts and minds of a majority of the American people and was nurtured and kept alive by you and those like you who never gave up hope for seeing our programs and our commitments realized in this great country.

There are more than 200,000 women listed as members of this organization. About 40 States are represented here this afternoon. And we have begun to put into effect, with the help of an excellent Democratic Congress, those things for which our Nation yearned for all those years.

This time last year the overwhelming concern of the American people, myself, the Congress, all of you, was to put Americans back to work. We added more than 4 million net jobs in the United States in 1 year, thanks to you, thanks to the Democratic Congress. And we saw the unemployment rate drop from about 8 percent, now to just one-tenth of a percent above 6. And there's a renewed hope and confidence among American people that Democrats can provide jobs for those that want to work.

Now we've got another problem, equally important, that needs to be addressed with the same degree of commitment, confidence, and tenacity, and that is to control inflation, which is tending to sweep across our country. And with tough, sound management and a commitment by industry, business, and labor and government to deal with this difficult issue, I believe we can also hold down inflation. Do you all agree? [Applause]

We've tried to revive, through leadership in the White House and from the Congress, a realization of what it is that makes Americans proud. We've suffered a great deal in recent years from the Vietnam war. We've suffered from the embarrassment of Watergate, from the revelation of illegalities in the CIA, and Americans had kind of lost their spirit. But after 2 years of campaigning with the help of many of you, and because of the advice of many of you, we've raised a standard now around the world which is rallying people in all nations to recommit themselves to freedom, to individuality, to democracy under the broad banner of human rights.

That's what our Nation stands for; that's what we're going to stand for as long as I'm in the White House and as long as you give me your support.

One of the tough things that I have found to deal with in Washington is the Federal bureaucracy. It's a lot worse than I thought it was, and we are trying to do something about it.

One of the things that you helped me with already this year is to restore the stature and the mutual trust that exists and can exist even more vividly between our own Nation and the developing nations of the world, particularly in Latin America. You helped me with the Panama Canal treaties. We won a tremendous victory, and I thank you for it.

Now we've got another domestic assignment, and that is to reform the civil service system. We want to have a government where the very fine and dedicated public employees who have one life to live and who have chosen to make their career in helping other people through government processes a part of the democratic system. In the past they have been hamstrung by a mechanism or bureaucracy that doesn't work, and we are trying to reform that system. And I need your help on that as well, and I hope you will give me that help.

Please contact all the Members of Congress that you know—and that's probably every one of them—and make sure they help. It'll be a good thing politically. It'll be a great credit to the Democratic Party. It'll make my job easier and make our own government more responsive to the people's needs.

Now, there are a lot of parts of that reorganization. I'd just like to mention one of them to show you how difficult this is politically, but how important it is to our country, and that's the subject of veterans preferences. I'm a veteran. I served 11 years in the Navy. My father was a veteran. He served in the First World War. My son is a veteran. He served in Vietnam. But we have too long had veterans preferences in government hiring that were much greater, much more stringent than the Congress ever originally intended.

The purpose of the veterans preference was to help those who offered their lives and their time to serving our country in a time of danger, but they've been abused because of the great political influence of the veterans organizations—and I belong to the American Legion. But now we have a provision whereby an officer can serve in the Navy at a very reasonable salary these days, can retire after 20 years of service on a very healthy pension, and when he comes to get a job in the Federal Government, he has preference over anyone else who applies if he has a reasonably good score on the test. And many times there are qualified women and others who make 100, who make a perfect score on the competitive test, who cannot even be considered for a job.

So, what we want to do is to keep the veterans preference for those who have served in the Armed Forces for the last 10 years. That will get all the Vietnam veterans and those who are disabled and let the rest of the veterans compete with you for jobs in the Federal Government. That's one of the things we want to do.

But you can see that if you are quiet or timid or don't much care, then, of course, the veterans organizations and others are going to keep those preferences that they have. So, we need to have you fight hard to make these changes.

Among the top civil service grades, the managers, 65 percent of those are male veterans; 3 percent are women. That needs to be changed. And if you'll help me, we'll change it.

Let me just say one other thing. This is going to be a difficult political year, because we've addressed some highly controversial subjects that had never been dealt with in a forceful and aggressive way before. The Panama Canal Treaty is just one of them.

We're looking for a comprehensive, permanent peace in the Middle East. We are expanding our interests into Africa. We are looking for a SALT agreement, a comprehensive test ban. We are trying to bring a settlement to the Cyprus question, many other very controversial foreign affairs questions that we are dealing with.

We're looking for a comprehensive energy policy, and I think you all know that every time you address one of these longstanding, political questions, you arouse opposition from those who have benefited in the past from dormancy. And when you address something like tax reform, you really shake up people that, because of influence and privilege, get some special preference in the tax codes, and you know who pays for it is Democrats. The Republicans are the ones ordinarily that get the benefits. The Democrats are the ones that pay for it. We need to change that, right? [Applause]

Well, we were partners in 1976, when I was elected President. We'll be partners again this year in electing Democrats to the Congress. But the most important partnership of all is the one that must exist between organized Democratic women and the administration here in Washington and in the statehouse as well, who try to serve our country in an effective way.

So, I hope you will get involved directly in the campaign contest during 1978. It's crucial that we show the Nation that we stand for the principles that have always been important to our party, that we are effective in administering the affairs of elected office, that we can work in harmony even in very controversial times, and although there's a slight malaise and a distrust of government left over from the previous administration, we Democrats are going to correct that if we work together in the future.

Thank you very much, God bless you.

One other thing I want to say: I love every one of you.

Thank you very much.

MRS. CARTER. I just want to welcome you to the White House and tell you how glad I am that you're here.

I look around and see so many faces of people that I walked up and down the streets with and campaigned with. And I want you to know that this house belongs to you as much as it does to us, and we know that we wouldn't be here if it had not been for your help.

Another thing, as Jimmy said, we need your continuing help, because you can not only influence your representatives in Congress but you can help us influence public opinion, the people around you. You're organized, you're strong, and we have to have the public opinion on our side as we work together to make our country a better place to live and to work and to play. So we need you, we need your help. And welcome to the White House.

THE PRESIDENT. Joan Mondale has already made a talk to you, but I want to let you know that we've been blessed here in the White House and in the Oval Office with the best pair of partners that anyone ever had. There is no decision that I make that's not shared with Fritz Mondale. There's no information that I have about the most top-secret international and sensitive issues that he doesn't share with me completely. I have never had a meeting since I've been President from which he was excluded, and he has never disappointed me at all.

One thing that I would like to see us all do together this year is get the equal rights amendment passed. Okay? [Applause]

Goodbye, everybody. See you all later.

Civil Aeronautics Board

Executive Order 12056. April 28, 1978

EXEMPTION OF G. JOSEPH MINETTI FROM MANDATORY RETIREMENT

G. Joseph Minetti, Member, Civil Aeronautics Board, became subject to mandatory retirement for age on July 31, 1977, under the provisions of Section 8335 of Title 5 of the United States Code unless exempted by Executive Order. Mr. Minetti was exempted from mandatory retirement until September 30, 1977, by Executive Order No. 12006 of July 29, 1977, until October 31, 1977, by Executive Order No. 12011 of September 30, 1977, until January 31, 1978, by Executive Order No. 12016 of October 31, 1977, and until May 1, 1978 by Executive Order No. 12037 of January 31, 1978.

In my judgment, the public interest requires that G. Joseph Minetti continue to be exempt from such mandatory retirement.

NOW, THEREFORE, by virtue of the authority vested in me by subsection (c) of Section 8335 of Title 5 of the United States Code, I hereby exempt G. Joseph Minetti from mandatory retirement until August 31, 1978.

Middle East Arms Sales

Remarks by the Secretary of State on the Administration Proposals. April 28, 1978

The administration is today transmitting to Congress formal notification of proposals to sell aircraft to Israel, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia. As indicated in our informal notification last February, the proposed sales involve 75 F-16's and 15 F-15's to Israel, 50 F-5's to Egypt, and 60 F-15's to Saudi Arabia.

These proposals are an important part of our search for peace in the Middle East. They maintain and enhance our close relationship with three key governments in the Middle East. Each of the three countries has a unique contribution to make to the objective of achieving a lasting peace.

As a nation, we have a strong and unshakable commitment to the security of Israel. The proposed sales to Israel will help preserve Israel's ability to defend itself.

The proposed sales to Egypt and Saudi Arabia have been based upon careful analysis of how best to meet their defense needs while maintaining the military balance in the region. These transactions will enhance the confidence in and friendship toward the United States on the part of each of these two countries with which we share vital mutual interests.

The proposed sales make it possible for the United States to maintain our historic commitment to the security of Israel while at the same time developing closer ties with moderate Arab nations which strongly support the peace process. They reflect our best judgment as to the national interest of the United States.

In submitting these proposed sales to Congress on the same day, the administration is not attempting to place conditions on the scope of the congressional review or the action by Congress. Indeed, we understand that the Congress will want to review these important transactions separately and with great care. We stand ready to facilitate that process.

At the same time, the responsibility of the President for the conduct of foreign affairs requires that he reserve judgment on the ultimate action to be taken until he has had an opportunity to review the action taken by the Congress on the proposals announced today.

NOTE: Secretary Vance spoke at 5:15 p.m. to reporters assembled in the Briefing Room at the White House.

Interview With the President

Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session With a Group of Editors and News Directors. April 28, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Some of you have been here for previous meetings like this, I noticed. We've had several hundred editors and top news executives come to the White House for these small group meetings in the last 15 months, and they've been very helpful to us and, I hope, also helpful to your own readers and listeners and viewers.

What I've done as a matter of course is to outline some of the current questions that I'm addressing and problems that I'm trying to solve, and then spend what time we have available answering your questions.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES

Right now, I'd say that getting the energy legislation passed is a top domestic priority. Dealing with the Federal bureaucracy is always a constant challenge, and I think the crux of the whole reorganization effort is in civil service reform, which is now being considered by the Post Office and Civil Service Committee in the House.

We have tax reform in the Ways and Means Committee. I think we'll do much better on the floor of the House and the Senate, perhaps, than the present prospects appear to be in the Ways and Means Committee.

We have, in addition to that, a constant pressure from inflationary growth. Bob Strauss has been designated as my direct representative to deal with both wage and price increases, to try to hold them down. He's slowly getting control of that new assignment. He's keeping his former assignment as the Special Trade Representative. As you can see, those two items are very closely interrelated.

But this doesn't mean that the other Cabinet officers and executive personnel are not directly involved. Mike Blumenthal, Charlie Schultze, Ray Marshall, Juanita Kreps—all of our Cabinet on a domestic basis are trying to concentrate with an ever-increasing intensity on controlling inflation. The latest statistics this year don't look good. We've had a fairly rapid increase in farm prices, which I think were warranted and needed after the very low prices last year. That's showing up now on the Consumer Price Index, as well as the adverse effects from the winter weather and the coal strike.

But I believe our economy is very sound, and I think the recent indications on the value of the dollar in international monetary markets and the value of stock on the exchanges in New York have been a good indication of renewed confidence in the American economy, which, of course, is highly justified.

We have a couple of very controversial issues coming up in the Congress on foreign affairs of immediate consequence. One is a proposal to sell weapons to three Middle Eastern countries—Israel, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia—and the proposal to lift the arms embargo against Turkey to try to get the Turkish-Greek relationships improved and to make some movement on Cyprus, which has now been stalemated almost 3 years. This is a very serious matter in both instances, and both of these decisions by the Congress are highly controversial and have some potential political damage to individual Members of Congress as they make these decisions.

The last week's vote on the Panama Canal treaties is perhaps the worst political vote that the Senators will have to cast, certainly in my term of office. And I think they made the right decision in a very courageous way.

We have a lot of other items that I won't go into unless you have specific questions. I'll be getting our water policy proposals on my desk within the next few days. We've been working intimately with Congress Members and also Governors and others in the Midwest and Western States, particularly on water policy. I think it's crucial to our country to have some predictability about how we assign priorities, how we spend money, the benefit-cost ratios, environmental considerations, and I believe that there's never been an issue that's come before me that has warranted and has received any more close consultation with local and State officials who are directly involved.

Perhaps now it would be better for you to ask me questions, rather than my taking any more of your time. I would like to ask, if you don't mind, that we terminate this meeting about 5 minutes before the half hour, so that I can have an individual photograph made with you. Those of you who are philosophically adverse to it can destroy the photograph. [Laughter]

QUESTIONS

TIMBER PRODUCTION

Q. Mr. President, Secretary Bergland told us there is consideration of tying the level of timber harvests more closely to the demands of the market and the price of wood products. Is that a serious consideration in your office, and if so, would it involve a deviation from traditional Forest Service harvest policies such as nondeclining even-flow?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we've had an almost unprecedented rate of growth in housing starts and construction in the last year and a half. And this has put additional pressures on the price of lumber, which I think are one of the major contributing factors to the inflation rate in, particularly, family homes. I think that we can increase the rate of timber harvest in public lands, both Federal and State lands, and also in the large land holdings of private individuals and companies.

I think we can do this without any adverse effect on environmental quality and without any adverse effect on ultimate total production of timber from these lands. I've had a meeting with some of the key harvesters of major quantities of timber here around this table from the Far West, and they have pledged to me—the processors of timber—that they will not only try to make their production more highly efficient, that is, waste less of the timber products, but also will try to increase the amount of timber that is processed in this country and ship a smaller portion of timber overseas in log form than has been the case in the past.

We will have a definitive analysis, that's been underway now since I've been in office, for publication in June, and the final decision in December. But I've asked in my anti-inflation speech before the American Society of Newspaper Editors that this report to me on how we can rapidly increase the rate of production on timberlands, to be on my desk within 30 days of that time.

PRESIDENT'S TRIP TO COLORADO

Q. Mr. President, your trip to Denver next week has been compared by some as a trip to a foreign country. Could you briefly assess your own views on your relationship with the West and, perhaps, comment on the solar energy package I understand you might address on your visit Wednesday?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I will. This will be my second trip to Denver since I've been President. The last time, I had a public hearing there, primarily related to water projects, as you know, which I thought was very good and constructive, and, in the process, invited the Western Governors to come to Denver to meet with me for that purpose. I'll be making an additional stop in Colorado, as well. This will be, coincidentally, on Sun Day, and I will be making a speech, relatively brief, on the use of solar power in the future.

Colorado has been blessed, I think, by the decision that I made to place a major research facility for solar power in Colorado. But I look on this as a friendly visit with the prospect for reception to be good. We've devoted a lot of time to Western problems because they are unique, and some of them are long overdue in being addressed: grazing lands, basic water policy, the problems of impact aid for strip mining and other mineral harvesting—we proposed legislation, now, to the Congress for non-energy type mining operations, which I think will add stability to it—how to deal with the acreage limitation on federally subsidized, irrigated lands.

These are matters that have been in contention for decades or even generations. And although they are controversial—and that's the reason that previous Presidents have not been eager to address them—I think they should be addressed frankly and forcefully and fairly, and let those dissident arguments be laid to rest once and for all. So, I look forward to my trip, and it's not the first one to Denver, even since I've been in office.

MIDDLE EAST ARMS SALES

Q. Mr. President, Anthony Sampson, in "Arms Bazaar," quotes Kenneth Galbraith as saying that, in effect, the United States caused the India-Pakistan war by selling arms to Pakistan. In fact, they sold to both sides. It created an imbalance in that area, and that's what led to the war. Now, changing the balance in the Middle East, will it not likewise inevitably cause another war? Isn't it a repetition of a road to disaster if you lump these sales together, to sell both to the Arab countries and to Israel?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as you know, our arms policy in the Mideast has been to sell moderate supplies of arms to all of our close allies there and to give an extra attention to the needs of Israel, pretty much as defined by Israel.

I think it's obvious that the Israeli military strength is overwhelming in the air. We have longstanding commitments made to the Saudi Arabians, dating back to September of 1975, by President Ford and Secretary Kissinger. I reconfirmed that commitment, because our Nation's word of honor is at stake, early in my own administration when the Saudi leaders visited here.

This arms sales package, as such, is not a package as far as the Congress is concerned. These proposals will be submitted to Congress individually. Each one, separately, will be assessed by Congress in the best interests of our own country and that of our allies.

My own belief is that the Saudis have made their choice of weapons and the appurtenances or armaments on the F-15 on a basis of defense. The F-16 is more of an offensive weapon, and the Saudis have not ordered air-to-ground armaments that would be used in an offensive mode. They've also indicated to us that they do not intend to station the planes at Tabuk, which is a base close to Israel, but will be stationing these planes near Iraq and South Yemen as a defensive mechanism.

Just to close, this is a proposal that, in my opinion, is best for Israel. I think it would be a serious mistake for us to sever the friendly relationships and the mutual trust and confidence that's crucial, that presently does exist between ourselves and the moderate Arab leaders. I think our being the ones to sell these weapons to the Saudis—which will not be delivered completely until 1983—is advantageous as compared to the Saudis' completely unrestricted ability to buy the same type of weapons and same quantity of weapons from the French or, perhaps even later, from the Soviets. And their peaceful intentions are well recognized and trusted by me.

As you know, the sale of the F-5's to Egypt is not something that's even opposed by the Israelis, so far as I know. I was with Prime Minister Begin—in this room and over privately in the Mansion at the White House and in my little back office for several hours—for 2 full days this year, and Prime Minister Begin never mentioned to me one time any concern that he might have about the sale of weapons to Saudi Arabia or Egypt.

So, I think that this is a well-balanced proposal. Each sale was made on its own merits. I think that it is moderate in quantity. The weapons for Saudi Arabia and Egypt are acknowledged to be defensive in nature, and I think this provides us with the kind of relationship and influence in the moderate Arab world which is conducive to peace for Israel.

Q. I was with Prime Minister Begin, Mr. President, after he left you, and it is of greatest concern to him. In fact, it is to every Israeli leader, going back to Rabin and Peres and all of them. It's of tremendous concern to them, because by the time these weapons are delivered in 1981 or '82, you may not have the present rulers in Saudi Arabia because of the conditions that are going on over there right now. You might be delivering it to a pro-Communist government.

THE PRESIDENT. I can't dispute what you say about Begin's importunities or concerns to you. But I'm telling you that for 2 days he had my undivided attention, and he never mentioned it.

Now, the second point that you make is that we will provide, as is the case in all of our major arms sales, a servicing in spare parts for these weapons over a long contractual period. And this gives us a great knowledge of the pilots who fly the planes, the security measures that accrue to prevent violation of our own secrecy, the point of stationing of these planes, any modification in their armaments, the transfer of the F-15's from a basically defensive plane to one of offensive nature.

This relationship that we will have with the Saudi Arabians will help to prevent any shift in their attitude toward an offensive design against Israel. I think that this is good insurance that ought to be maintained.

NAVY BUDGET

Q. Mr. President, Edward Fike, San Diego Union. You made a heartening speech in Wake Forest warning the Soviet Union against the continued buildup of armaments, and then you came back to Washington and your first official act was to announce a drastic slash in the Navy building program. I'm from an area which is very concerned about that. And we now learn that several naval bases around the country are scheduled to be closed, including, possibly the Marine Corps training facility in San Diego. How can we reconcile this reduction in the Navy with a continued Soviet naval buildup throughout the world?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I might say that I used to live in San Diego and was on a submarine there, and I'm familiar with the interest of your neighbors in the Navy strength.

The makeup of the defense budget is primarily determined by submission from the Joint Chiefs and the Secretary of Defense and others to me through the Office of Management and Budget, and the portion of the total defense budget that is spent within the Navy circle is also determined by them. I make very slight modifications, although I study the issues.

When this proposal was made to me by Secretary of Defense Brown and by Graham Claytor, who came over to discuss it, the only change I made in their proposal was to add one submarine, Trident submarine, to their proposal. I think the Navy's portion of the budget is between 35 and 40 percent, about what it always has been. The size of the defense budget has been increased steadily since I've been in office. We added about 3 percent in total defense expenditures in this proposal for next year, above and beyond inflationary trends.

And I think that the Navy budget is a well-balanced budget. The argument that is going on in the Congress is whether we have a relatively few, highly expensive, large and nuclear-powered ships on the one hand, or a wider number, larger number of relatively inexpensive ships that are smaller and conventionally powered on the other hand. All the ships, as you know, are expensive.

But I don't have any apology to make for it. I think within the constraints of the overall budget—I think our deficit is excessive now—and the portion of the total budget that is allotted to defense expenditures, the portion of the defense budget that's allotted to the Navy, that it is a well-balanced proposal.

And to repeat myself once, I did not modify the recommendation of the Secretary of Defense, except to add one Trident submarine. I didn't cut down the recommendation that came to me from the Defense Department.

ENERGY SHORTAGE

Q. Mr. President, I'm Bob Hammes from St. Maries, Idaho. A spokesman for a previous administration said, "Don't pay any attention to what we say, but watch what we do." The people are seeing Government officials and high military figures using gas-guzzling automobiles, car races around the country every weekend, and other uses of petroleum, and they're thinking there really isn't a petroleum shortage. Can we somehow resolve this dichotomy?

THE PRESIDENT. It's hard to answer that question. My fear is that the dichotomy to which you refer will be resolved only when there is a tangible evidence of energy shortage brought about by suffering or deprivation of the American people themselves. Warnings about future shortages have apparently very little effect on the Congress or the public.

We have had some reduction in the rate of growth of energy consumption this year, and obviously our imports have dropped off somewhat with the increased influx of oil from Alaska.

We've done a great deal through Executive order of my own, and also among the top officials in the executive branch of National Government, in cutting down both the size of automobiles, and we cut drastically on the number of automobiles that are available and used. And we've also increased gasoline efficiency by mandatory law passed by the Congress and also by eliminating the large number of chauffeur-driven automobiles that were formerly used by literally hundreds of top executive officials. Those have been cut down to bare bones.

But I don't think I can answer your question any better than that. When lines are backed up at gas stations, at service stations, the public believes there's a need to conserve. When the lines disappear, then they don't believe it any longer.

But I believe that in the long run, that the legal restraints that have been placed on automobile efficiency will pay rich dividends. And the passage of the energy legislation that I have proposed to the Congress will be another major step forward, even in the absence of demonstrable shortages that work a deprivation on our public.

OIL SALES TO JAPAN

Q. Mr. President, Bob Thompson, Seattle Post-Intelligencer. We heard two officials of your administration this morning suggest there's renewed talk about selling Alaskan crude oil to Japan. Do you favor such a policy? What will the impact be on our energy crisis, and would you propose it to Congress?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I haven't made any decision on that proposal, which has been, I think, an historic one. It's a repetitive kind of proposal that originates from a lot of sources, and it's been given renewed life by the fact that now we have, with the Alaskan oil shipments to the west coast, a glut of oil in the California area.

Our own preference is that the Sohio line should be expedited, with its completion to bring California and Alaskan oil into the Texas area for refining and further distribution, and also that we expedite the completion of a gasline that would originate in your part of the country, heading east, to serve the Midwest. The proposal about transferring oil either from California, the heavy crude, to Japan or to transfer some of the Alaskan crude to Japan is not one that's been proposed to me.

PRESIDENT'S RELATIONSHIP WITH WESTERN STATES

Q. Mr. President, the West was one of the areas where you and Vice President Mondale did least well in the Presidential election, and I think opinion polls show that if the election were held again now, you might not get any more votes. Do you anticipate any difficulty for your party this year? Do you anticipate doing better or worse, should you run for reelection? And are there any policies that you are designing to improve your standing in the West?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think the recent polls—the only one I've seen lately is Harris poll that shows that on a nationwide basis, I would do better now than I did against Ford, because it was a very close vote, as you know. I think I had a 6 or 7 point lead over Ford in a hypothetical race, and only had 1 or 2 percent when I actually won. I think that it's almost inevitable that the Democratic Members of Congress this year will do better in the West than I did—[laugh-ter]*—*in the Presidential race, because as you pointed out, I carried very few States in the West. I came very close in a few. But I think the Democrats will have a good success this year. They've got an excellent record when it's analyzed carefully.

I think when the Congress adjourns late this summer, there will be a much more careful and factual analysis of what has been accomplished and what has not been accomplished. So the record is going to be good. I think there's a minimal amount of coattail riding these days, not just because of me but also my immediate predecessors.

The new classes in Congress, the 94th and 95th Congresses, are highly independent. They ran their campaigns basically the same way I did, one priding oneself in not being a part of the establishment, not being dominated by the political leaders, being tied directly to constituents, or being independent in attitude and in the legislative process. So, I think there's a much more close welding now of Members of Congress, particularly the newer classes, to their own constituents than there has been in the past, historically, and a much less interrelationship between individual Members of Congress and the popularity or unpopularity of an incumbent President. Back in the days of Eisenhower, Roosevelt, back that far, there was a very close melding of the two. But I don't think that's the case anymore, regardless of who's in the White House.

So, I think that as I said earlier, the problems that we did have in 1976 in the West were primarily attributed to the fact that I was not well known, I had to concentrate my efforts where I thought my success would be most notable. And the second point is I think that we've had an exacerbation of that problem, because we've tried to address some very, very controversial issues that have been ignored for too long. But my belief is that after this year, when these issues have been resolved, either by us, by the Congress, or by the courts, that those problems will be lessened.

MR. WURFEL. Thank you, sir.

Q. Mr. President?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I may answer one more question.

PRESIDENT'S TRIP TO WESTERN STATES

Q. Have you decided who will accompany you on your trip, Mr. President, the Western trip—the Cabinet officers, some of your family, what Congressmen, White House staff?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know yet. I would guess that it would be among the—Dr. Schlesinger, I'm sure, will be with me for part of the trip, Bergland will probably be with me, and Cecil Andrus will probably be with me for part of the trip. I really don't know. Do you happen to know, Walt?

MR. WURFEL. No, sir.

THE PRESIDENT. I haven't really seen the list of people who will go with me, but I know that those three will be there for part of the trip. I need Bergland particularly, for instance, for the timber area, Oregon and Washington. Schlesinger needs to be with me in Colorado for the solar energy question; Cecil Andrus in California and other places for addressing the question of maximum acreage to be owned by families in the irrigated regions where water comes from Federal sources. But I can't answer your question any better than that at this point.

Let me say that I always get a lot out of these sessions, because you ask the kind of questions that very seldom come up at a White House news conference. They are much more substantive and related directly to the people's interests and needs in the States and communities, and I thank you for coming.

NOTE: The interview began at 1 p.m. in the Cabinet Room at the White House. Walter W. Wurfel is Deputy Press Secretary.

The transcript of the interview was released on April 29.

United States-Canada Reciprocal Fisheries Agreement

Message to the Congress Transmitting the Agreement. May 1, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a Reciprocal Fisheries Agreement for 1978 between the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada, effected by an exchange of diplomatic notes dated April 10 and April 11, 1978.

The Agreement, which continues through 1978 the provisions of the 1977 Reciprocal Fisheries Agreement with a few modifications, protects important United States interests in our fisheries off Canada and maintains the opportunity for conclusion of long-term maritime arrangements on boundaries, hydrocarbons and fisheries resources, including salmon, between the United States and Canada.

As was the case with the 1977 Reciprocal Fisheries Agreement, positive Congressional action is required to bring the 1978 Agreement into force. I recommend that the Congress give favorable consideration to the Agreement at an early date to establish the legal basis for the continuation of reciprocal United States-Canadian fisheries during 1978.

30th Anniversary of the State of Israel

Remarks of the President and Prime Minister Menahem Begin at a White House Reception. May 1, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. It's a great pleasure for me and for Rosalynn to hold this reception for my friends, Prime Minister and Mrs. Begin, and for the distinguished Americans who have joined us today in honor of the 30th anniversary of the State of Israel.

We've just come to the close of the Passover holidays, an annual reminder of the exodus and dispersal of the Jewish people. Since the destruction of the Second Temple led to the Diaspora nearly 2,000 years ago, Jews have said a prayer ending with "Next year in Jerusalem."

Through all these years we shared hope of a homeland. The shared hope of a homeland held together in spirit a people who were scattered all over the world. During those 2,000 years, Jews often suffered religious discrimination, inquisitions, pogroms, and death. Jews were too frequently treated as strangers, even after living for generations as inhabitants of countries.

After I visited Israel in 1973, I read Arthur Morris' book "While Six Million Died," the tragic account of the ultimate in man's inhumanity to man, the Holocaust. Six million people were killed, most of European Jewry. They died not only because of Nazi brutality but also because the entire world turned its back on them during their years of suffering. No country was willing to give the Jews of Europe a home where they could escape from their torment.

Out of the ashes of the Holocaust was born the State of Israel, a promise of refuge and security and of return, at last, to the Biblical land from which the Jews were driven so many hundreds of years ago.

It will always be a proud chapter in the history of our own country that the United States was the first nation to recognize the legal existence of Israel in 1948—30 long, fruitful, sometimes seemingly short years in history.

George Santayana wrote that, and I quote, “Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it.” The past brutality against the Jewish people throughout the world and the ultimate tragedy of the Holocaust are events that Jews will always remember, but they are also lessons which this country and all the civilized world should never forget.

Through the indomitable will and character of its own people and with the unshakable commitment of the United States to its security, the existence of the State of Israel will ensure for all times that the Jewish people will not be condemned to repeat the Holocaust.

The policies of the United States Government have been influenced by these indelible memories of the past. We continue to provide substantial economic and military assistance to Israel. We have obtained, this past year, tough antiboycott legislation to protect from discrimination American Jews and American companies doing business with Israel. We champion the human rights of Jews in the Soviet Union and in other nations and encourage their right of emigration.

We do these things because they are right and because they are necessary and because they are true to the traditions of our country.

Many nations have memorials to the Holocaust victims. There is no such formal memorial in the United States. To ensure that we in the United States never forget, I will appoint immediately a Presidential commission to report to me within 6 months on an appropriate memorial in this country to the 6 million who were killed in the Holocaust.

We may from time to time have our transient differences with the leaders of Israel—[laughter]—as we do with leaders of other countries who are our close friends and allies. But we will never waver from our deep friendship and partnership with Israel and our total, absolute commitment to Israel’s security.

The establishment of the nation of Israel is a fulfillment of Biblical prophecy and the very essence of its fulfillment. In the Jewish tradition, 30 stands for the age of strength, and Israel, thank God, is strong.

There is a Jewish saying, “From strength to strength.” And I trust that Israel will indeed evolve from a strength rooted in determination and vigilance to a strength that is reinforced and maintained by a just and lasting peace with its neighbors.

That prospect is coming closer to reality today than at any time since the creation of a State of Israel. We remain deeply committed to help in any possible way to bring the day closer when Israel will live in security and in peace. For 30 years we have stood at the side of the proud and independent nation of Israel. I can say without reservation, as the President of the United States of America, that we will continue to do so, not just for another 30 years but forever.

Thank you very much.

THE PRIME MINISTER. Mr. President, our dear friends, may I humbly tell you that today we heard from the President of the United States one of the greatest moral statements ever.

We have always believed in the moral greatness of America. We appeal to it in difficult times. We never lost hope that it will win, because we have always remembered the famous moral precept of your predecessor, Mr. President, Abraham Lincoln, "Right makes might."

On behalf of right, we fought for our country and for our liberty. In the thirties, our people looked for a haven and didn't find it. In the forties, they cried out for help and didn't get it. And then we reached the conclusion that if we don't fight and conquer our liberty, nobody will give it to us. So, in the tradition of the American people, we rose to fight. There were the great sacrifices, the suffering, but today is a day of rejoicing. Vesamachta bechagecha!

Although in the life of her people for many generations, sadness and joy are intermingled, yesterday we remembered the fallen heroes of the ghettos, the helpless left alone to fight not even for their lives, not even for their liberty, but for human dignity and for the dignity of their people, because those lone fighters indeed fought for all humanity.

But today is a day of rejoicing. Thirty years ago, a little flag, blue and white, was hoisted before the eyes of all the nations to see, namely, Judea rose again, Israel will live.

And when we remember what happened until that day—their people, what persecution and humiliation they went through and, ultimately, mass physical destruction, then we can appreciate what an effort was necessary and was made in order to achieve that day of our national renaissance.

Let us rejoice. The blessing of freedom is incomparable to any other. Only he who lost it can appreciate it. And we had lost it; we regained it with the efforts and the self-sacrifice of our best men.

So today, let us remember our heroes who made our victory possible and our independence assured.

Today also, my dear friends, is from another point of view, a day of rejoicing. The President and I just finished a discussion and a private talk, and earlier we had a talk with the Secretary of State.

May I tell you, bringing you good tidings with all my heart, thank God—baruch hashem—these discussions and talks are characterized with friendship, with understanding. There is that feeling that America and Israel are inseparable, friends and allies.

Mr. President, we too, as you, hope that there will come a day when our brethren in the Soviet Union will be free to go to the historic homeland of our people. The Jewish people will never give up a fight for liberty and for justice. Never.

Now, Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen, as we rejoice in the achievement of Israel's independence, a holiday not only for the Jewish people but for all free nations, for all women and men of good will, let us rededicate ourselves to the great concepts of our prophets—of human freedom and dignity and justice and the great vision of peace.

Mr. President, we shall go on working for peace with all our heart and all our soul, because we yearn for it and want it. And let us hope that the road for peace will be reopened with your help, Mr. President, as we said to each other just a while ago.

And now, Mr. President, having heard your most moving words, which we shall never forget, I would like to conclude my remarks with the following short, simple statement: For freedom, for justice, for human progress, and for human dignity, let there be everlasting friendship between the great United States of America and the renewed State of Israel.

NOTE: The President spoke at 2:10 p.m. on the South Grounds of the White House at the reception honoring Prime Minister and Mrs. Begin and Jewish leaders.

National Commission on the International Year of the Child, 1979

Appointment of Jean C. Young as Chairman.
May 1, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of Jean C. Young, of Atlanta, Ga., as Chairman of the National Commission on the International Year of the Child, 1979.

Young was born July 1, 1933, in Marion, Ala. She holds a B.S. in elementary education from Manchester College in Indiana and an M.S. in education from Queens College (New York).

She has been a classroom teacher, supervising teacher for the Teacher Corps, area resource teacher, and coordinator of elementary and preschool programs with the Atlanta Public School System. She participated in the development of Atlanta Junior College, serving as assistant to the president, public relations officer, and instructor of developmental studies.

Young has published a manual for parents of preschool children, "Bridging the Gap." She participated in an international student volunteer project with refugee children from Eastern Europe in Austria.

Zero-Base Budgeting

Announcement of a Report Concerning
First-Year Results in the Federal Government.
May 2, 1978

The White House released today a detailed assessment of first-year results of zero-base budgeting (ZBB) in the Federal Government. It found that departments and agencies "got off to a good start" in putting the process to work.

President Carter commended department heads recently for instituting ZBB within the short time available to develop the fiscal year 1979 budget, and said he expected the process "to aid even more in the 1980 budget cycle." ZBB provides a systematic process by which managers at various levels can analyze performance and allocate resources effectively and economically among Government programs.

James T. McIntyre, Jr., Director of the Office of Management and Budget, said his agency is revising ZBB guidelines to make the process even more useful in tightening the 1980 budget. OMB prepared the first-year assessment, which noted that:

- Agency budget priorities were explicitly identified and stated;
  - Agencies were better able to restrain the size of their budget requests;
  - Management participation in the budget process increased at all levels.
- As a result, agencies generally reported a better understanding of the relationship of their separate program plans and policy initiatives.

The report describes some of the savings attributable to ZBB. No single dollar figure can be pinned down to represent total ZBB economies in the 1979 budget, the report explained, since many resulted from a combination of factors. The report does cite a number of instances in which operations were discontinued or funds and personnel were shifted to achieve maximum use of the dollar.

Savings were realized when requests for more money could not be justified within the ZBB discipline. In addition, many large requests never reached OMB, because agencies recognized in ranking priorities that the proposals could not be justified.

Major changes to improve the 1980 process will emphasize the development and study of minimum program levels, eliminate unnecessary paperwork, and broaden the involvement of managers.

NOTE: On the same day, the White House released the 13-page report entitled "Assessment of the First Year of Zero-Base Budgeting."

International Health Program

Statement Announcing a Program To Strengthen U.S. Participation. May 2, 1978

We in the United States enjoy one of the highest standards of health in the world. Infectious diseases are no longer a major cause of death, and most Americans take for granted that their children will reach healthy adulthood. This is not true in many other parts of the world. Each year, more than 15.5 million children, nearly all of them in the developing countries, die before they reach the age of 5. Hundreds of millions of people are afflicted by such diseases as malaria, leprosy, and schistosomiasis, diseases which are unfamiliar to most Americans but which exact a terrible toll in human suffering and wasted productive potential. As many as 40 million people suffer some form of blindness—a truly global problem that is largely preventable and often reversible.

No nation can any longer view these tragic conditions as someone else's problem. In a world growing more interdependent day by day, we increasingly share each other's distress and dangers, as well as the fruits of mankind's successes.

Late last month, the World Health Organization confirmed that we appear to be in the final stage of the eradication of smallpox; no case has been reported anywhere in the world in the last 6 months. This historic accomplishment shows what can be achieved when nations cooperate with deep commitment.

My administration is dedicated to supporting programs which help people meet their basic human needs. The United States, in partnership with international organizations and with other countries, must develop a truly international program to improve worldwide health, nutrition, and family planning. We have a long history of shared effort with other nations in the field of health, and we plan to build on the solid record we have established.

Consistent with the announced expansion of foreign aid, and our effort to focus that aid on the poorest of the world's people, my administration has undertaken a review of international health needs. Our aim was to determine the most effective ways in which the U.S. Government and private organizations could help reduce the personal and economic impact of widespread malnutrition, infectious diseases, and other health hazards, including those associated with frequent childbirth.

As a result of that study, I am announcing today my intention to launch a program to strengthen the participation of the United States in worldwide efforts to overcome disease and ill health.

Our efforts will be based on the following principles:

—A basic minimum level of health, nutrition, and family planning services should be available to the world's poor, whether they live in rural areas or urban slums.

—Developing nations can eventually meet their own health needs if we assist them in strengthening their institutions and building their own health systems.

—Community-based primary health care, including the use of community resources and the training of appropriate health personnel as near as possible to where they will deliver services, is the most effective means of achieving the standard of health we desire for all people.

Our objective is to concentrate on the prevention of disease and ill health. We will put special emphasis on providing clean drinking water, basic sanitation, basic immunizations, and efforts to prevent and treat blindness. This emphasis will be reflected in our own programs and in our support of priorities established by various international organizations.

We will work toward the lasting control or eradication of the major infectious diseases, particularly "tropical" diseases that continue to be the leading causes of death and disability.

We will give special attention to the major causes of death in children—diarrhea and respiratory disease, particularly when aggravated by malnutrition.

Private industry provides most of the goods and services needed to sustain the world's health. It can play an important role by exercising initiative and careful judgment in developing needed products and in helping to make sure they are used wisely to improve health in the developing world.

We recognize the invaluable contribution voluntary organizations have made in improving the health of people throughout the world and their special services in developing nations. We will strive to aid them in their efforts and to coordinate our activities.

We plan to:

—Strengthen institutions in our Government which are dealing with international health problems, reemphasizing our commitment to help meet the health needs of other nations, and improve the use of existing resources through better coordination.

—Build greater awareness among the American people of the legitimacy and the importance for our foreign policy goals of improving other people's capacity to meet their basic human needs.

—Work closely with nations around the world, individually and through organizations such as WHO, UNICEF, the World Bank, and the regional development banks, to improve the health of people everywhere.

—More fully involve American universities, technological foundations, and other private organizations in making U.S. scientific and professional resources more accessible to the developing world.

I have asked Secretary Califano to go to Geneva as head of the United States Delegation to the World Health Assembly, where he will describe further the steps my administration intends to take.

No one country alone can bear the responsibility to achieve these goals. I ask the leaders of other nations to join me in this global effort. Effective programs require detailed and careful planning. The strategy I am announcing today and which Secretary Califano will describe to the World Health Assembly next week will be developed as part of our budgetary and legislative recommendations for next year. Where possible, however, we will move immediately to carry out this program.

The world can someday meet the basic human needs of people everywhere—if we care enough, and if we start now. I believe all Americans share my personal commitment to the goal of a world free from unnecessary disease, a world in which life is held sacred, and in which children born anywhere on Earth have the same chance to grow up to enjoy a healthy, fulfilling life.

United States-Morocco Convention on Taxation and Fiscal Evasion

Message to the Senate Transmitting the Convention. May 2, 1978

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for Senate advice and consent to ratification, the Convention between the Government of the United States of America and the Kingdom of Morocco for the Avoidance of Double Taxation and the Prevention of Fiscal Evasion with Respect to Taxes on Income, signed at Rabat on August 1, 1977.

There is no convention on this subject presently in force between the United States and Morocco.

The Convention follows generally the form and context of most conventions of this type recently concluded by the United States. However, it contains some modifications of the standard provisions to accommodate the special need of Morocco as a developing country to minimize any revenue loss. Its primary purpose is to identify clearly each country's interest in avoiding double taxation and preventing the illegal evasion of taxation.

For the information of the Senate, I also transmit the report of the Department of State on to the Convention.

This Convention would promote closer economic cooperation and more active trade between the United States and Morocco by assuring investors about their tax liability, reducing the foreign tax in many cases and providing for cooperation between the two countries to avoid double taxation.

I urge the Senate to act quickly on this Convention and to give its advice and consent to ratification.

Federal Council on the Aging

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. May 2, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting herewith the annual report of the Federal Council on Aging in accordance with Section 205(f) of the Older Americans Act (P.L. 93-29).

As you know, the Council was created by the Congress to represent older Americans and make recommendations to the President, the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Commissioner of the Administration on Aging, and the Congress on Federal policies regarding the aging and federally conducted or assisted programs and other activities relating to or affecting them. This report describes the Council's concerns and projects as well as specific advocacy positions taken by the Council on Federal policies and programs affecting the elderly.

In my first year in office, the Council has been of great assistance in their unanimous support of strengthened financing of the social security system. As you know the Congress acted expeditiously to enact the 1977 Social Security Act amendments which I signed into law December 20, 1977. These measures will serve to assure a secure income for many older Americans in future years. I hope that the Congress will act this year on the Better Jobs and Income Act in response to the Council's earnest desire for the early enactment of welfare reform which affects many areas of "vital concern to older Americans."

While the Council recognizes that all of the concerns expressed in the report cannot be fully dealt with in the immediate future, I look forward to a continued close working relationship with the Council as evidenced by my appointment of Chairman Nelson Cruikshank as my Counselor on Aging.

In closing, let me assure you that we will continue to carefully consider the views of the Council as social and economic policy affecting the elderly is developed and implemented in the years to come.

National Small Business Person of the Year

THE PRESIDENT. First of all, let me welcome to the White House, to the Rose Garden, fellow small business persons of the United States. I always feel at home when I meet with those of you who have had a background as entrepreneurs, who have participated not only in ownership but also in the management of your own small business. I recognize not only the joys and accomplishments and the gratification of being a small business person but also the difficulties and the problems that are derived from that responsibility. And because of those difficulties, I sought a different job a couple of years ago, and thanks to some of you, I was successful. [Laughter]

Since I've been in the White House, being one of the few small businessmen who have ever served as President, I've made a special effort to open up government to the interrelationship that ought to exist between small business leaders of our Nation and the members of the Cabinet and the agencies of the Federal Government—not just to help the small business community of our Nation but, equally important, perhaps even more important, to help government, because your perspective and your knowledge and your experience is a great reservoir of advice and counsel and constructive criticism that can be a major factor in making government better.

We've had, now, small business groups meet with almost all of the members of the Cabinet, and there is constant arrangement for periodic meetings between small business leaders of all kinds and my Domestic Policy Adviser, Stu Eizenstat, and his associates. So, there's a continual interchange and exchange of ideas that's been very beneficial to me.

Yesterday I signed an executive order that will set up a procedure that will result in a new emphasis on industrial innovation. In the last few years, there's been a deterioration in the amount of benefit to our Nation of new ideas, new concepts, and innovative ideas from business that can be very constructive to us all.

Under Vernon Weaver's leadership we've increased in 1 year the guaranteed bank loans for small business by about 40 percent, from roughly $2 billion in 1976 to $2.65 billion in 1977. We've tried to deal also with special groups in the small business community who in the past have been deprived. For instance, we set as a goal last year to double the amount of Federal procurement from businesses owned by minority citizens. And we will meet that goal, and we hope to increase it another billion dollars this coming year.

When we passed the legislation last year to put into effect a very strong public works program, we set aside 10 percent of that to be awarded to minority contractors, and we've exceeded that goal. We've tried to increase the amount of Federal money deposited in banks owned by minority owners. And this is the kind of thrust that we've tried to maintain all the way through.

I brought into the White House, too, a knowledge of some of the problems caused by Federal agencies. We've got a wonderful leader now, both in the Labor Department and in OSHA, and last year alone, we reduced the number of OSHA regulations by 30 percent, and we're still working on them.

And Dr. Eula Bingham is spending a lot of her time out talking to people like you all over the country, to say what do we need to make sure that workers in our businesses, in our factories are safe and healthy and not have an onerous burden on both the workers and the employers in bringing about that safety and that good health that we all want.

I've asked Vernon Weaver and Senator Nelson to help me arrange a White House Conference on Small Business next year, and we are preparing for that very carefully.

In the process, we've identified 200 small businesses around the country as test cases, and we are trying to analyze throughout this period what Federal reports, documents, requests have to be filed, to see how many of them are necessary, how many of them can be eliminated, how many of them can be abbreviated, how many of them can be changed from a monthly report to a semiannual or annual report, how many of them can be combined so you don't have to send the same data to many Government agencies.

I think out of this process will come an additional degree of effectiveness for the Federal Government itself. I've asked all the major agency heads—will, within the next few days—to bring to the Small Business White House Conference one major proposal from their own agency that will be of benefit to people like you.

Well, I could go on and on listing the kinds of things that we are trying to do in partnership with you to strengthen our free enterprise system and to strengthen the ties that ought to exist between government, particularly the Federal level, and you.

I know how superb the performance of the small business leaders is in our country. And to be chosen as the outstanding small business person in our Nation is indeed a high honor. This afternoon we are recognizing the person that has been chosen from our whole country.

Ed Gaffney has been chosen the outstanding small business person of the year. He organized his own business, Ortho-Kinetics, I believe, in 1962, when his own mother, who was afflicted by arthritis, had a hard time being moved around and getting in and out of a wheelchair. And in the process, he has now evolved a very fine small business to help handicapped people of all kinds. Not only is his heart in the right place, a business that obviously serves others, but he's been very effective in the management, in the growth, and in deriving a substantial and justifiable profit from his effort.

So, it's with a great deal of pleasure that I introduce to you and to the people of the United States, the outstanding small business person of the year, Ed Gaffney.

Let me just read the title while Ed stands over here by me. "The United States of America Small Business Administration presents the National Small Business Person of the Year Award, 1978, to Edward Gaffney for exemplifying the imagination, initiative, independence, and integrity by which the American small business person makes a vital contribution to the Nation, to the economy, and to the free enterprise system,” signed “Vernon Weaver, Administrator, Small Business Administration.”

MR. GAFFNEY. Thank you very much. I hope you’re not all as surprised as my mother-in-law is. [Laughter]

I’d like to thank the Small Business Administration and all of you. It’s been a pleasure getting to know the few of you that I have, and Mr. Carter in particular. It’s very true that Mr. Carter has opened his administration to the small business movement, and I think that if we, as small businessmen, are unsuccessful in our efforts to improve the country, the fault lies with us. And we need to get organized and get to work and help Mr. Carter help us.

Thank you very much.

MR. WEAVER. Just one word. As the President said, he has called for a White House Conference in the fall of 1979. Right now, the small business community, we estimate, has the backing of more than 80 percent of the Congress. And with a President in the White House who was a small business person, who did get a loan from SBA, who paid it back—[laughter—who got help from our SCORE volunteer organization—and he gives a lot of credit for his successful business career to SCORE, by the way—if we can’t accomplish what needs to be accomplished in this next year, year and a half, for small business, we’ll never accomplish it.

As the President said, he’s asked every department to come up with one new idea that they can accomplish for you before that Conference, to be announced at that Conference. So, I believe the next 18 months are going to be the most significant months for the small business community in this history of this Nation. We want all of you to support it, and as many of you as can, come to the White House Conference.

Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much. Good luck to you, and we’ll see some of you next year.

NOTE: The President spoke at 2 p.m. in the Rose Garden at the White House. Also attending the ceremony were the winners of the State and Territorial Small Business Awards for 1978.

United States Ambassador to Singapore

May 2, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Richard F. Kneip, of Pierre, S. Dak., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Republic of Singapore. He would replace John H. Holdridge, resigned.

Kneip was born January 7, 1933, in Tyler, Minn. He attended South Dakota State University and St. John’s University. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1951 to 1955.

From 1962 to 1971, Kneip was owner of Kneip Sales Inc., a statewide wholesale milk equipment distributorship. He served in the South Dakota Senate from 1965 to 1971. Since 1971 he has been Governor of South Dakota.

Kneip has served as chairman of the Democratic Governors and as chairman of the Midwestern Governors' Conference. He is a member of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations.

in the department of chemical engineering at MIT. He also serves on the energy and environment committee of the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce. He is the author of numerous technical papers and reports.

New England River Basins Commission

Appointment of John R. Ehrenfeld as Chairman. May 2, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of John R. Ehrenfeld, of Cambridge, Mass., as Chairman of the New England River Basins Commission. He replaces Frank Gregg, who has been appointed Director of the Bureau of Land Management at the Interior Department.

Ehrenfeld was born May 16, 1931, in Chicago. He received an S.B. in 1953 and an Sc. D. in 1957 from Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

From 1959 to 1961, Ehrenfeld was a senior staff engineer for Arthur D. Little, Inc., and in 1961 and 1962, he was senior chemical engineer for Prototech, Inc. From 1962 to 1967, he was director of applied research for the Technology Division of GCA Corp.

In 1968 Ehrenfeld founded Walden Research Corp., one of the first environmental research companies in New England, and served as president and technical director until 1975. Since 1975 he has been vice president and technical director of Energy Resources Co. (ERCO) in Cambridge.

Ehrenfeld also serves on the board of the Massachusetts Science and Technology Foundation. He is a visiting lecturer

Better Hearing and Speech Month, May 1978

Message of the President. May 2, 1978

Communicative disability is a major health problem in our country today. Americans with hearing and speech handicaps number over twenty million. These disorders seriously affect the daily lives of people of all ages. The invisibility of communication impairment belies its serious consequences for those who must carry on normal living activities in our complex modern society.

Meeting the hearing and speech health service needs of men, women and children is thus a continuing challenge to our public and private health resources.

It is encouraging to know that the number of Americans who are overcoming hearing and speech handicaps is steadily increasing. During this national observance, I want to take the opportunity to applaud the individuals and groups who are involved in community activities relating to improved health, rehabilitation and social care for those with communicative disorders. Such steadfast effort in guiding and developing new programs in this area greatly enhances the well-being of those with hearing and speech disabilities and represents a most critical public service.

National Nursing Home Week, May 14–21, 1978

We must not forget our older Americans who have contributed so much to the growth and development of our society. The nursing home must reflect our appreciation and our unfailing concern for their well-being.

On behalf of a grateful nation, I therefore want to pay tribute to the many dedicated individuals who provide services to these in nursing homes. New knowledge about the elderly, new technology and improved skills have resulted in the saving of human life, the prolongation of the life span and the rehabilitation of the impaired and disabled. This noteworthy progress calls for a stronger than ever commitment by all of us to the health and well-being of our increasing numbers of citizens in their golden years. I know we will not fail them, and I ask all Americans to join in the spirit of this observance.

Advisory Committee on Federal Pay

Reappointment of Jerome M. Rosow as Chairman. May 3, 1978

The President today announced that he will reappoint Jerome M. Rosow, of New York, as Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Federal Pay. Rosow has served as Chairman of the Committee since 1972.

Rosow, 58, is president and founder of the Work in America Institute. He was Assistant Secretary of Labor for Policy, Evaluation and Research from 1969 to 1971. He is the author of numerous publications and articles on work and workers and has served as an adviser and consultant to numerous Government commissions and panels.

Bill Authorizing White House Conferences on the Arts and Humanities

*Statement on Signing H.J. Res. 649 Into Law.

Today I sign H.J. Res. 649, the 1979 White House Conferences on the Arts and Humanities act.

This administration believes deeply in the importance of the arts and the humanities to the vitality of our culture, and in the worth of Federal programs in this area. In their work on this bill, John Brademas, Claiborne Pell, and others have helped to demonstrate the need for a broad national discussion of the state of the arts and humanities.

However, I sign this bill today with some reservations. In my view, conducting separate conferences in arts and humanities would involve unnecessary expense and duplication and would miss an opportunity for a far more productive exchange of views and experiences among persons deeply concerned with our cultural life.

It is therefore my intention that this bill be implemented as efficiently and inexpensively—and as productively—as possible. I expect that the two conferences will function jointly or concurrently and that they will share staff and activities to the maximum extent possible.

NOTE: As enacted, H.J. Res. 649 is Public Law 95–272, approved May 3.

Golden, Colorado

*Remarks at the Solar Energy Research Institute on South Table Mountain.
May 3, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. Senator Haskell, Senator Hart, Governor Dick Lamm, and Congressman Tim Wirth, Dr. Rappaport, ladies and gentlemen:

As a matter of fact, we've not yet made a final decision about where to put the National Solar Energy Research Institute. I'm going around to visit several prospective sites to see where the Sun is actually shining. [Laughter]

BYSTANDER. The wind's blowing.

THE PRESIDENT. That's right. The wind is blowing, so that's enough; you qualify.

I am glad to be here where the Sun shines 300 days a year. And as a farmer, I'm also glad to be where it rains on occasion, because we have to test all kinds of potential solar equipment under varying kinds of weather conditions—dense clouds, light clouds, cold and warm temperatures and, of course, bright and clear, sunshiny days.

Maybe the fact that Colorado does have a remarkable degree of sunshine and beautiful weather has something to do with how effective your representatives in Washington have been in promoting solar energy. I've seen in my frequent visits to Colorado an intense interest in solar power that does not exist anywhere else in the Nation that I have been.

Floyd Haskell, Gary Hart in the Senate, Tim Wirth and others in the House of Representatives have dedicated much of their time and effort to the development of effective and responsible solar programs. We are lucky and you are lucky to have them representing you. And all of us in this country are lucky to have their leadership in the solar energy field.

Without that sort of solar commitment, the National Research Institute would not be here, and its four regional solar centers would never have been possible.

Here on South Table Mountain, if all goes according to plan, ground will be broken in the fall of 1979 for the institute's permanent home. Ninety percent of its energy needs will be supplied by the Sun.

The principal job of this national center will be to carry out basic research and development and to demonstrate projects in advanced solar technology. The principal job of the four regional centers will be the commercial application of these technologies. Both the National Institute and the regional centers will work as partners with State and local governments.

Dr. Rappaport and his staff have my full support in their efforts to make solar energy an important contributor to the daily energy needs of the United States of America.

A little more than a year ago, I proposed to the Congress and to the people of the United States a comprehensive energy program. And now, at last, we have made a promising start towards conserving our limited resources of fossil and mineral fuel.

As the plan itself states, and I quote, "America's hope for energy to sustain economic growth beyond the year 2000 rests in large measure on the development of renewable and essentially inexhaustible sources of energy."

No matter how good a job of conservation we do, the world's supply of oil and gas will dwindle, become more expensive, and finally run out.

Foreign oil already costs us four times as much as it did 5 years ago. Our spending on imported oil has increased from $2.7 billion in 1970 to more than $45 billion last year. As a result, inflation robs us all, the value of the dollar has dropped on international monetary markets, and our economy becomes more and more at the mercy of a foreign cartel.

We must begin the long, slow job of winning back our economic independence. Nobody can embargo sunlight. No cartel controls the Sun. Its energy will not run out. It will not pollute the air; it will not poison our waters. It's free from stench and smog. The Sun's power needs only to be collected, stored, and used.

We know that most of the technology for using the Sun's power already exists. And in my youth, as in many of yours, there were millions of windmills around the rural areas of our country. Hundreds of small damsites provided electric power. Some 10,000 years ago, in your area, Indians were using solar principles to heat dwellings at Mesa Verde and elsewhere.

The historically brief availability of low-cost energy from fossil fuels drove much of that early solar technology into temporary disuse, but now we are rebuilding on those earlier techniques.

The Anasazi Long House at Mesa Verde has fallen into ruins, but present day Coloradans have built perhaps as many as a thousand solar-heated homes, including the largest (solar-heated)<sup>1</sup> building in the United States, the North Campus of Denver Community College.

Larger and more efficient windmills are being designed, including one with a rotor as long as a football field. Damsites long abandoned in New England and elsewhere are being returned to use with improved equipment for generating electric power.

Government, private industry are working together and separately to develop dramatic new techniques, as well. Acres of mirrors can focus the Sun on "power towers" which will generate steam for electricity and for other use. Both gas and liquid fuel can be produced from animal wastes, wood chips, even garbage. Small, sun-powered engines are already in use for irrigation. Photovoltaic cells convert sunlight directly into electricity.

The question is no longer whether solar energy works. We know it works. The only question is how to cut costs so that solar power can be used more widely and so that it will set a cap on rising oil prices.

In many places, solar heating is as economical today as power from nonrenewable sources. And solar energy will become ever more competitive as the prices of energy from traditional sources rise and the enormous Federal subsidies for oil and other energy uses drop.

The cost of generating power from the Sun is going down even as the cost of oil is rising. The price of photovoltaic cells, for example, has gone down 50-fold since they first began to be used extensively in the space program.

The Government will speed this program by increasing demand for solar hardware, so that mass production can help to bring prices down. And the plan will increase use of residential solar systems by offering more than a billion dollars in tax credits over the next 7 years.

Credits of as much as $2,000 to each one of you, each homeowner, to install solar or wind energy systems will be available under the new comprehensive energy plan. I hope that homeowners will soon be able to take advantage of this major incentive to use solar technologies.

The plan will also make it easier to get loans for solar equipment, and we will further increase demand for solar technology by providing up to $100 million over 3 years to install solar equipment in Federal buildings. I intend to put in a demonstration solar hot-water system at the White House.

I'm going to abbreviate my speech if you have no particular objection, but there are a few more points I want to make specifically.

The Council on Environmental Quality recently estimated that we could meet as much as one-fourth of our energy demands for solar sources by the end of this century, and perhaps more than half by the year 2020. We must continue to make progress toward these goals.

The Department of Energy believes that photovoltaic cells can be competitive with conventional energy sources, perhaps as early as 1990. The Energy Department is working on many projects throughout this country, indeed throughout the world.

In fiscal 1979, with heating and cooling demonstrations, tax credits, and research and development with photovoltaics, wind, ocean thermals, and biomass, my total Federal proposal for solar energy amounts to more than one-half billion dollars. This is an increase of 64 percent in just 2 years.

In addition, I've been saving a small surprise for this particular occasion. We've been researching our energy needs in the last few months, and I have just instructed the Department of Energy, through reprogramming, to provide an additional $100 million for expanded efforts in solar research development demonstration projects and the development of commercial uses, such as windmills, in the next fiscal year.

This is an appropriate day to concentrate Government effort on solar energy—[laughter]—but the bulk of the effort must be done still by private enterprise, by individual initiative, and by the inventive genius of the United States.

I don't want to skip over mentioning a few leaders here in Colorado. Your neighbor, George Löf, has lived in and designed solar homes since almost any American since 1945. The Christian Reform Church Center of Hope is a solar showplace. Sam Primack has built dozens of solar-equipped houses in and around Denver. And they've been at a premium, with homeowners demanding the right to purchase such homes. The Federal Government is helping these kinds of projects all over our Nation.

Today I'm asking a domestic policy review of all our departments in the Federal Government, under the leadership of Jim Schlesinger, to go into more ways how every agency of Government can help solar energy become a part of the everyday life of American citizens.

Let me just say in closing that solar energy can already be a paying proposition, and American technological genius can bring the same blessings that the rural electrification program brought to me and millions of others when I lived as a small boy in Plains, Georgia.

I'm confident that American science and industry will lead the way in this new market here and in the developing nations of the world, as they earlier did in the spread of American aerospace, electronic, and computer technology.

These, then, are the challenges that we are finally beginning to meet. These are the challenges that we can meet, just as we met the challenge of the space race. And these are the challenges, with the help of all of you, that we will meet.

Sun Day may be the beginning and the dawning of the second solar age. With your help, we'll make this prediction come true.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 4:05 p.m. following a tour of the Solar Energy Research Institute. Dr. Paul Rappaport is director of the institute.

The President proclaimed May 3, 1978, as Sun Day by Proclamation 4558, of March 27. The text of the proclamation is printed on page 574 of this volume.

Remarks at a Fundraising Reception for Senator Floyd K. Haskell. May 3, 1978

Senator Hart, Governor Lamm, Congressman Tim Wirth, who's here somewhere, Mayor McNichols, Chairman Sheila Kowal, all of the distinguished Coloradans who are here:

I'm here in support of solar energy; I'm here in support of Colorado. But primarily tonight, I'm here in support of one of the great Senators of all time, Floyd Haskell.

It's an honor for me to come and visit your State again. I want to talk primarily tonight about a man who represents the finest aspect of America and American politics, a man who has a great deal of influence. There are not very many Members, even of the United States Senate, who could bring to Colorado the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of Interior without even trying very hard.

We have now a need to understand the comparisons between the Western part of our country and the Eastern. I grew up in an area which understood very clearly the differences between the North and the South. Lately, since agriculture, water, energy, environment became crucial issues in our country, I've seen these divisions arising between the Western part of our country and the East. One solution that's been presented by Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski is to sell jet planes to both sides. [Laughter] But I think that we've got a better solution than that, and that is to elect and reelect to public office people who know what our Nation has been, know what its greatness is today, and to know how to make it even greater in the future.

This afternoon I met with a group of farmers who came to talk to me about some of the problems that exist in American agriculture, that came to complain about some of the policies of our administration with which, I might say, Floyd Haskell disagrees. But one of the farmers said that the most important reason for us to have an acceptable program for American farmers is to keep in office a Democrat like Floyd Haskell who, as the farmer said, is a quiet man, a man of deep beliefs, a man of great political courage, a man who does his homework in Colorado and his legislative work built upon it in Washington, a man who is modest, a man who is effective, a man who has an inner strength and, more important of all, the farmer told me this afternoon, a man who knows and loves his fellow human beings.

Long before I was elected President, I knew about Floyd Haskell, because in the early days when public officials were beginning to become concerned about the war in Vietnam, there was a member of the State legislature named Floyd Haskell who, without publicity and without fanfare, said, "This is not right, I cannot abide it. And in my own individual way, I will do all I can to get our Nation out of a war which is sapping the strength and the commitment and the spirit of American people."

And because of that quiet demonstration of courage, as you well know, he appealed to the people of Colorado and, in an unexpected election result, he became a United States Senator who's carried that quiet courage to Washington to represent you, and I'm thankful for it.

He believes in peace through strength, not just military strength, which is important, but the strength of a character of American people.

When I began to speak out during the campaign for the ending of the spread of nuclear explosives throughout the world, nonproliferation, I discovered that Floyd Haskell was already in the forefront of Members of the Senate who were proposing legislation to prevent nonnuclear nations from having the ability to develop atomic weapons. And when I spoke out against an unfair, disgraceful tax system and called for decent basic tax reform when I got to Washington, I found out that many of my proposals which the Congress is now considering had long been espoused and supported—again you guessed it—by Floyd Haskell.

I've seen a resurgence throughout the world of interest in basic human rights. Again, this quiet, decent man has epitomized America's commitment for the world to see, of the preservation of innate human freedoms, an absence of political persecution, and the right of a person to live in a decent home, to have food to eat, an education for one's children, decent health care, and a right to develop as an individual.

Tonight I want to talk very briefly about another subject in which Senator Floyd Haskell has been a leader. One of the most important and difficult issues ever faced by the American Congress is that of establishing a comprehensive energy policy. Again, he is a leader, and he has singled out, as a special aspect of his interest, solar energy.

This has been derived by him, I know, from the people of Colorado. And he recognized very early that you experience here the blessing of 300 days of pure sunshine each year. Unfortunately, Floyd invited me to come to Colorado on one of the other 65. [Laughter]

He was on the committee in 1974 that established the concept of a solar energy research institute, not knowing at that time, but certainly hoping, that the nationwide headquarters for this effort would be in Colorado. And it's no accident that because of his good work as a leader of the Colorado delegation, that a package was put together with the help of Governor Lamm and others that made the decision to come to Golden, Colorado, based not on political influence, but based on the fact that you deserved it. And he made sure that Colorado deserved this honor.

We live in a great Nation and a fast-changing world. My own background is in engineering and physics. I was one of the early students and workers in establishing the concept that atomic power could be used for peaceful purposes. But as Floyd Haskell has pointed out in some of his speeches, it's not exactly logical to have a nuclear core developing millions of degrees of heat, and temperature heating a cooling agent to thousands of degrees, to be transported hundreds of miles, to heat a house to 68 degrees. But that's what we do.

And the tremendous Government subsidy that must go into systems of this kind and extremely low efficiency of this kind of heat production has long been recognized by him and others as wasteful and incompatible with the hopes and ideals of American people.

We've got a nuclear generator, a nuclear powerplant that serves us well. It's one on which Coloradans would like to see the future energy technology built. It's in a safe place—92 million miles away—and the name of it is the Sun.

Well, I think it's accurate to say that no one is against solar energy. But a lot of Americans, a lot of people around the world don't believe that it's time yet for solar energy to be used.

I grew up on a farm in deep south Georgia. We derived our only mechanical power from the wind. We plowed our fields with mules and horses fed by crops grown from the Sun. When we were ready for harvest, we didn't use natural gas or propane or oil to dry our crops. It was dried by the Sun. And this was a common practice in agriculture and other industries of all kinds throughout our Nation and throughout the world, indeed, just a few decades ago.

But because of the extremely and artificially cheap fossil fuels, the use of solar power has become a system honored by disuse. It's been forgotten. But now that the price of oil, gas, coal, nuclear are going up rapidly and inevitably, the time has now come for the second solar age. And I believe today, Sun Day, in Colorado is a good time to launch this new commitment which I, myself, as President, will honor, working with people like Floyd Haskell, whom you've come to honor tonight.

In closing, let me say that it's not an accident that the first loan program to permit homeowners to purchase a solar system for their own places of residence was initiated by Floyd Haskell. It is no coincidence that when energy legislation was being prepared, the tax credits being expanded to include passive solar heating systems and wind power was pursued and introduced by Floyd Haskell.

It's no coincidence that for years, 5 years, in service in the Senate, a leading proponent and a constant battler for research funds for solar power was Floyd Haskell.

This proves to you that day by day, month by month, year by year, not just on election year, he has fought for and worked for the things that are important to the people of Colorado.

I'd like to add one adjective in addition to what the farmer mentioned this afternoon, and that is that he's strong and independent. When he disagrees with me as President, he never hides that disagreement from me or from the world. And I've benefited greatly as a new President, a new student of Washington political life, from the calm and sound advice and counsel and constructive criticism of my friend, Floyd Haskell.

In many ways, he's a national treasure, and I know that you've come here tonight to let your voice be added to many others in support of him. But I can tell you this: This is not going to be an easy election year for Floyd Haskell nor for other Democrats in this country. It's going to take more than a quiet expression of support at a very inexpensive fundraising event like this. It is going to take days of hard work and dedication, even sacrifice of your own time, your own effort, your own influence and your own finances. And I hope as he's worked and sacrificed for you for the last 5 years, that you will do the same thing for him during the next few months. If you do, Colorado will be blessed again and so will the United States of America.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 8:44 p.m. at the Currigan Exhibition Center. In his opening remarks, he referred to Sheila Kowal, chairman of the Colorado Democratic Party.

Denver, Colorado

Remarks at the Governor's Annual Prayer Breakfast. May 4, 1978

Governor Dick Lamm and other political and professional leaders of Colorado, leaders in God's church, fellow citizens of a country that has been blessed by God with riches of all kinds, giving us a sense of self-worth which, perhaps, we do not deserve, and a growing sense that these blessings of God may have been appreciated too little and cared for with disdain or neglect:

When I was a small boy, there was a story that was always told about a man who was plowing in the field behind a mule, and he was very tired of this profession. And one day he knelt in the middle of the field and asked God to give him some guidance on how he should spend the rest of his life. And as he finished his prayer and looked up into the heavens, he thought he saw spelled out in the clouds something that looked like "g-o-a-p." So he said, "God wants me to go out and preach." So, after 2 years of unsuccessful ministry in the pulpit, he realized that God was telling him to go on and plow. [Laughter]

We ourselves, no matter what our profession might be, no matter what our calling might be in life, often feel that we are aliens in God's world. This morning we are remembering an admonition from native Americans who, perhaps, as much as any group of human beings on Earth, have lived and often still live in close communion with nature. And their admonition is "Touch the Earth."

God said, "The Earth is Mine and the fullness thereof." We are increasingly reminded of how much we have despoiled God's Earth.

A few days ago, I had a visitor in the Oval Office whose name was Iron Eyes Cody. I know all of you have seen the award-winning advertisement on television where a dignified, proud, quite native American, Iron Eyes Cody, walks across what seems to be God's beautiful Earth, looks down at his feet and sees trash, garbage, dips his hand in what ought to be a clear stream and comes up with filth, and a tear runs down his cheek. There are no words spoken, but the message is gripping and impelling.

We look upon the mysteries of nature with great wonder and a growing realization of the unfathomable accomplishment of God. Recently, for the first time, we detected with assurance a so-called black hole in the heavens, a phenomenon known to astronomers where a world such as we know collapses with such tremendous force that a cubic inch of that material can weigh thousands and thousands and thousands of tons, with a pole of gravity so great that nothing can escape, even a ray of light. And from our own observation here on Earth looking toward it, a black hole is created because no light can leave it nor pass near it.

These infinite phenomena cause us concern, but they also teach us how fragile is the environment created for us on Earth, given to us by God, carefully balanced, very delicate, subject to minute, incremental changes made by you and me which can destroy the very gift of life that we've received from God.

My first memory of farming during the thirties was struggling to preserve the quality of our land which steadily deteriorated—in Georgia, in Oklahoma, perhaps, here in Colorado. Because of inattention to our stewardship of the land, the topsoil was washed away, or the topsoil was blown away, or the quality of the earth itself deteriorated rapidly. And there was a sense of foreboding, of warning about the future getting ever more troubling to the farmers who lived there.

The church itself, all denominations, organized annual stewardship weeks, and the laymen and the pastors, the preachers, the priests would devote that whole week from the pulpit of God's church to teach farmers and others how to preserve the quality of their land. We didn't burn much oil and gasoline or coal in those days. The air was pure. The streams were contaminated only by earth which had washed away. But in those early days of warning in my own life 40 years ago, I have seen a deterioration since then with other forms of pollution that have caused us even greater concern.

As a coastal State, Georgia and others like it are faced with the present circumstance where sand beaches, so attractive to tourists and others who love the ocean, have disappeared because of a destruction of the sand dunes and the normal, inevitable actions of the waves and the air.

Noise impacts on our ears in such a way that we hardly recognize the level of disturbance that's constant to our human brains. The White House is located in an area of about 18 acres that seems to be quiet and peaceful. But when my wife and I play tennis on the court there, we cannot hear each other from one end of the court to the other when we try to shout out the score or communicate between two people.

We don't realize how much we have permitted a deterioration in the quality of the place where we live.

For millions of years, fossil fuels were built up with a strange chemical mechanism and a strange physical pressure mechanism. And in just a few decades, we've wasted most of those fossil fuels and now face with imminence deprivation for our children and our grandchildren, brought about by our own uncorrected, wasteful ways. This sense of carelessness or callousness or even destruction of God's earth and air and water has a depressing effect on the human spirit.

It's not just a physical thing; it's a spiritual thing. And as we who worship God care little about our own physical surroundings, so we've shown in the Christian church and other churches a callousness toward human beings.

I've traveled a lot in recent years, as President and before, to foreign countries. And there is a reluctance within the churches of all denominations to reach out a helping hand to the poor, the deprived, those who suffer from a deprivation of basic civil rights, basic human rights.

There is an upcoming conference in Mexico where that is and will be the main problem for church leaders to face—"How much should we care for our fellow human beings? How much should a church be isolated from people around the worshippers?"

We, as a nation, are committed to the preservation and enhancement of human rights. But quite often, we preach with a hollow voice because of an absence of a total commitment to civil rights, human rights, the basic needs of people in our own great and free land. But still there is a tie that binds us together which is a basis for future hope.

One of the most moving religious statements that I've ever heard was in the State Dining Room of the White House about a year ago, when Crown Prince Fahd from Saudi Arabia pointed out the indestructible religious commitment of the people of his land.

Later, when we were gratified to see a meeting between the Egyptians and the Israelis at their top leadership level and a breaking down of decades of insurmountable barriers between two peoples who genuinely want peace, as I talked privately with those leaders, they pointed out that the thing they had in common that gave them hope for the future was a common belief in God. They both say with pride, "We are children of Abraham." It gives a sense of community.

Perhaps the great struggle in the future will come in Africa between the free world and the Communist form of government. Black Africans have long felt a need for a deep religious faith, whether Islam, Christianity, or others, and they have an abhorrence of the intrusion of an atheistic officialdom in their own country.

So, our faith in God, no matter what form it may have taken in our own individual lives, can be a basis for repairing the damage that has been done to the human spirit and should be a constant reminder that we have an equivalent responsibility to care for the environment, the ecology, the place where we live. We have a responsibility for stewardship.

The Bible says that the body is a temple of God and that we should care for our own bodies and for those around us.

So, I think that as we've gone through this phase of constantly deteriorating commitment to the premises of God, we've now begun to realize our faults, our failures, and with that realization can come the basis for correcting our defects, answering difficult questions, resolving apparently insurmountable problems, and joining our hearts and minds together in a commitment for a better future—a future for the Earth, a future for our fellow men, and a future for our spirit as human beings under the guidance and with the commitment to God through prayer.

These should be the noble endeavors of all human beings. And in our own great Nation, the United States, we have a pulpit and we have a base for correcting our own mistakes and setting example for others throughout the Earth.

Thank you very much.

Denver, Colorado

Remarks at a Meeting With Environmental, Community, and Governmental Leaders.
May 4, 1978

Senator Haskell, Senator Hart, Governor Dick Lamm, Representatives Tim Wirth and Pat Schroeder, Mayor McNichols, ladies and gentlemen:

Yesterday when I arrived for Sun Day, it was raining. This morning when I'm going to talk about the smog—[laughter]—in Denver, you have beautiful skies.

I think this illustrates what careful planning can do. And I have had my heart warmed with the welcome here, and it is a wonderful thing for me to come back to your beautiful State and a beautiful city.

During the past decades, Americans have become dramatically more aware of two momentous problems, the problem of the environment and the problem of energy. It's no accident that these two great issues have become prominent at almost exactly the same time, for the use and abuse of energy has led to many of the injuries to the air, to the land, and to water.

Our growing consciousness of the environment has helped us to understand that we must develop and use energy far more carefully than we've ever done before. Today I'm pleased to announce two important initiatives that will help us to live at peace with our environmental needs and also our energy needs—the Denver Air Project, which I'll outline in a few minutes, and our new, 5-year proposal for inland energy impact assistance.

Not long ago in Denver, you could almost always see the mountains in the distance and you could almost always draw a deep breath of air with pleasure and safety. But today, a brown cloud of dangerous pollution frequently hides the mountains and invades the lungs of the people of this city.

Because of the great resources of the Rocky Mountain Plains Region—energy, mineral, agricultural, recreational—Denver has been growing at a rate two and a half times greater than that of the average American community.

By the year 2000, if present growth continues, you will, in Denver, add another Washington, D.C. Car use here, automobiles, has grown even faster than that. In fact, Denver has more cars per capita than any other metropolitan area in the United States, perhaps the world.

The result has been financial prosperity and also problems. Denver has the worst carbon monoxide problem in the whole Nation, three times worse than national health and safety standards permit. And other pollutants—hydrocarbons, sulfur oxides, particulates—endanger the air of your beautiful community.

The Denver Air Project will greatly improve the coordination, for the first time in the history of our country, of 25 different Federal activities that relate to air pollution in the metropolitan area. This has never been attempted before. The project will make an additional $15 million available for such activities as transit-related construction, van pool projects, free off-peak bus service, electric car use, and efforts to prevent tampering with antipollution devices on automobiles.

Up to $42 million may be made available as this project develops if it is successful, and I expect it to be successful.

In addition, a separate $16 million urban mass transit grant from the Department of Transportation will also go to improve bus service here in Denver.

I believe that we can deal with this problem not through heavy-handed government prohibitions, but rather through a positive demonstration of how Federal, State, and local resources and, of course, those of the private sector as well, can be brought to bear in a coordinated way.

The Federal Regional Council, under Betty Miller, has done an unprecedented job in bringing together all these forces in a common effort, working very closely with Alan Merson of the Environmental Protection Agency.

Denver's pollution problem is decentralized. It's not caused by a few large pollution-spouting factories or industrial plants, but it's caused by hundreds of thousands of individual vehicles. That means that everyone must help to deal with the problems. And I'm confident that the people of Denver will respond with support for the efforts that will be launched or enhanced through the Denver Air Project.

This morning I looked at a pledge card that's now being distributed among the people of Denver, asking individual citizens to promise to ride the bus, to ride a bicycle, to walk to work, to share a car, to have their air pollution devices carefully adjusted, to have special devices installed for the high altitude combustion required of automobile engines here, quite often built for a much denser atmosphere.

But the desire of people for a healthy environment, while meeting our own energy needs, is not unique in urban areas. Places like the western slope of Colorado and the coal fields of West Virginia will play a major role in helping our country meet pressing demands for alternatives to oil and natural gas.

When I announced my comprehensive energy plan a little more than a year ago, I promised that no State, no community, and no Indian tribe would be forced to bear an unfair share of the burden of meeting our national energy needs. We recognized the disruption of rural communities which rapid development of new energy sources can bring. The boom and bust syndrome in communities such as Craig must not continue.

My administration, Governor Lamm, and Governors of other Western and Appalachian States joined with community and tribal leaders in a task force to determine what additional Federal assistance was needed to help communities overcome the problems caused by extraordinary energy-related growth.

Senators Hart and Haskell had already done much of the spadework through hearings and through legislative proposals. Congress Members Wirth and Schroeder are enthusiastic supporters of this kind of legislation. Their work is now reflected in a new proposal for inland energy impact assistance, which I'm announcing here today. This proposal, which Senator Hart has agreed to incorporate into his own bill, recognizes that no one wants rampant, uncontrolled growth which destroys the natural environment, disrupts established patterns of life, and locks communities into expenditures with a short burst of effort which they cannot afford to maintain on a permanent basis.

It also recognizes that economic benefits, new jobs, and new tax revenues can result from new development in a beneficial way if it's properly planned.

My proposal is predicated on a strong partnership with the States, recognizing that they can better set priorities and policies which will assist communities while making sure that those whose benefit derives from new development pay their share of the cost.

This legislation will establish a 5-year program of energy impact assistance and other aid to inland areas, which will be funded by $675 million in direct Federal grants. It also provides up to $1½ billion in loan guarantees to States at subsidized interest rates. The Economic Development Assistance program will administer this program and give impacted areas one place to turn for assistance, the EDA.

Under this proposal, States and local communities will be guaranteed a timely voice in Federal decisionmaking related to energy development within their own jurisdictions. The Federal Government will join with States and communities, locally, to assess more fully the needs for facilities and services that are related directly to energy development.

The States and local governments in turn must be able to plan for energy development and to gradually increase their own contribution to meeting impact needs on a permanent basis.

This new program is both comprehensive and flexible enough to let States tailor impact assistance programs to their own specific needs.

Senator Haskell, along with the Members of the congressional delegation from the Appalachian States, has labored long and hard to provide impact assistance programs for housing. While I believe the new program meets all energy impact needs, not only housing, I would not object to Congress designating some of these new funds for the alternative housing program.

The cooperation and knowledge which I have found among the Governors, key Members of Congress whom I've already mentioned, and representatives of individual communities and tribes has really paid off. I believe that working together we can enact legislation this year which will give energy-impacted areas the help they need so much. Together, we will not fail.

Thank you very much.

Los Angeles, California

*Remarks at the 100th Anniversary Luncheon of the Los Angeles County Bar Association.
May 4, 1978*

Governor Brown, Mayor Bradley, President Williams, President-elect Taylor, distinguished members of the Los Angeles County Bar, ladies and gentlemen:

For the last half hour, I've been sitting in a room nearby listening to the report on the background of this tremendous organization and also listening to the report on the future of the organization. And I've been thrilled with your past accomplishments, and I've been touched by some of the struggles that you've experienced in your own history. I congratulate you on your 100th anniversary.

I would like to begin my speech with a quote from a book published in 1852.

"Jarndyce and Jarndyce drones on. This scarecrow of a suit has, in the course of time, become so complicated that no man alive knows what it means—innumerable children have been born into the case; innumerable old people have died out of it; whole families have inherited legendary hatreds with the suit—there are not three Jarndyces left upon the earth, perhaps since old Tom Jarndyce in despair blew his brains out at a coffee house in Chancery Lane, but Jarndyce and Jarndyce still drags its dreary length before the court."

This quotation comes from the novel "Bleak House," and although Charles Dickens, who, by the way, was a court reporter himself, was writing about a chancery suit in London long ago, he could have been writing about a modern antitrust suit in Federal Court. His subject was the same that should preoccupy you and me—lawyers, mayors, Governors, and the President of the United States, that is, ensuring that our legal system serves the ends of justice without delay.

I'm not a lawyer, but there is no question that has concerned me more throughout my adult life than that of human justice—striving to alleviate the inequalities, the unfairness, the chance differences of fortune that exist among people, and to help ensure that all people possess the basic material and political rights that they need for full participation in the life of our society.

I grew up in a community in Georgia that often did not provide simple justice for a majority of our citizens because of the divisions of privilege between those who owned land and property and those who did not, the divisions of power between those who controlled the political system and those who were controlled by it, the wall of discrimination that separated blacks and whites.

As a Governor and as a President, I've learned that, as Reinhold Niebuhr said, "It is the sad duty of politics to establish justice in a sinful world." I'm trying now as your President to carry our Nation's message of basic justice and human rights to other nations. But I know that we cannot speak of human rights in other countries unless we are going to do our utmost to protect the rights of our own people here at home.

Let me tell you about some of the things that concern me.

On the last day of the administration of Lyndon Johnson, the Government filed an antitrust suit against a major computer company. Nine years have passed; three new Presidential administrations have taken office; hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent on legal fees. But still the trial is not nearly over, and it has been speculated that the judge who has supervised it for the last 9 years may die or retire before the trial is completed, in which case it would start all over again. Generations of computers have come and gone; there is not a single computer now being sold that were being sold when the case began—but still the case goes on.

I'm worried about a legal system in which expensive talent on both sides produces interminable delay—especially when delay itself can often mean victory for one side.

Justice should not be forced to obey the timetables of those who seek to avoid it.

As a public official I've inspected many prisons, and I know that nearly all inmates are drawn from the ranks of the powerless and the poor. A child of privilege frequently receives the benefit of the doubt; a child of poverty seldom does.

In many courts, plea bargaining serves the convenience of the judge and the lawyers, not the ends of justice, because the courts simply lack the time to give everyone a fair trial.

We have the heaviest concentration of lawyers on Earth—1 for every 500 Americans; three times as many as are in England, four times as many as are in West Germany, twenty-one times as many as there are in Japan. We have more litigation, but I am not sure that we have more justice. No resources of talent and training in our own society, even including the medical care, is more wastefully or unfairly distributed than legal skills.

Ninety percent of our lawyers serve 10 percent of our people. We are over-lawyered and under-represented.

Excessive litigation and legal feather-bedding are encouraged. Noncontested divorces become major legal confrontations in many States. Complete title searches on the same property are unnecessarily repeated with each sale. Routine automobile accidents—the cases clog our courts while no-fault automobile insurance is opposed.

The number of medical malpractice suits skyrockets. Mahatma Gandhi, who himself was a very successful lawyer, said of his profession, and I quote, "Lawyers will as a rule advance quarrels rather than repress them." We do not serve justice when we encourage disputes in our society, rather than resolving them.

In my own region of the country, perhaps even yours as well, lawyers of great influence and prestige led the fight against civil rights and economic justice. They were paid lavish fees by their States and heaped with honors for their efforts. They knew all the maneuvers, and for too long they kept the promises of the Constitution of the United States from coming true.

The basic right to vote, to hold a job, to own a home, to be informed of one's legal rights when arrested, to have legal counsel if an indigent—these rights have been denied for generations in our country and are being recently won only after intense struggle.

I think about these things when I come to speak with you. What I think about most, however, is the enormous potential for good within an aroused legal profession and how often that potential has not been and is not used. More than any other nation on Earth, ours was created out of respect for the law. We had the first written Constitution—it's the oldest. We proclaimed ourselves a government of laws, not of men; we put our faith in interpretations of the laws to resolve our most basic disputes.

None of us would change our system of laws and justice for any other in the world. From the beginning, it made the citizens the masters of the state and not the other way around, and it has extended increasing protection to the poor and the victims of discrimination.

It's because of the enormous power of the law, and of the position of great influence and privilege which lawyers occupy within our society, that lawyers bear such a heavy obligation to serve the ends of true justice and, through dynamic effort, individually and collectively, through organizations such as this, search for those ends of justice.

I know that you understand these obligations. During the last generation, many of our most important advances toward racial integration and protection of our people against government and its abuse have been made through the courts.

I heard the comments a few minutes ago about Chief Justice Earl Warren, who has been an inspiration to all of us who serve in government. But let me mention briefly four challenges that we should face in order to improve justice in America: first, in making criminal justice fairer, faster, more sensible, and more certain; second, in holding the law to the highest standards of impartiality, honesty, and fairness; third, in ensuring that access to the legal systems does not depend on political influence or economic power; and fourth, in reducing our overreliance on litigation, and speeding up those cases that are litigated.

Our starting point in ensuring justice is to reduce crime through measures that are effective and fair.

There was encouraging progress in this direction last year, when the volume of crime fell for the first time in many years by 4 percent below the previous year's level. It's a welcome development, but it does not change the urgent need to control crime. States and local governments must take the lead in this effort, but the Federal Government must do its part.

We should streamline the Federal Criminal Code, which now contains many provisions which overlap, duplicate one another, are inconsistent, and need upgrading. With the leadership of Senators Eastland and Kennedy and the late Senator McClellan, a 12-year effort recently culminated in Senate passage of this new, comprehensive criminal code, I hope the House will pass it this year without delay.

We are working with congressional leaders to reorganize the Law Enforcement Assistance Agency, to gear our funding system to our most pressing needs, to provide better support for State and local governments, and to concentrate our help on improving the criminal justice system and reducing crime. I'll propose a consolidation and a reorganization of many of the functions now performed by more than 110 different Federal agencies that have direct responsibility for law enforcement.

We can reduce the tremendous overload on our criminal justice system by removing such crimes as drunkenness and vagrancy from the courts, thereby freeing the courts to deal with serious offenses and enabling us to treat these social illnesses in ways that offer a greater hope of success than conviction and incarceration.

I'm supporting uniform sentencing standards for Federal offenses, which will make the punishment for crimes more rational and fair and will help ensure that the rich and the poor are treated alike, no matter what court might convict them.

Powerful white-collar criminals cheat consumers of millions of dollars; public officials who abuse their high rank damage the integrity of our Nation in profound and longlasting ways. But too often, these bigshot crooks escape the full consequences of their acts. Justice must be blind to rank, power, and position. The Justice Department is now undertaking a major new effort on white-collar crime.

I've directed the Justice Department also to review our prison policy and propose alternatives to incarceration, such as stationhouse citations, supervised release, work-release programs, and other community-based facilities.

I urge all judges and all lawyers to use your enormous influence to make these efforts a success.

Our second challenge is to see that our legal system lives up to its noblest tradition of honesty and impartiality, so that all people stand equal before the bar of justice.

One of the most important steps that we can take is to restore public confidence in our system of justice, is to ensure that government decisions are thoroughly impartial, and that personal interests and influence have no part. I've required all major appointees of mine, as a condition of accepting office, to disclose their personal financial interests. I've also required them to pledge that after their term of public service is over, they would forgo all contacts with their former agency in Government for 1 year.

Last year, I proposed legislation to make these standards a permanent part of American law. In its current form, this ethics legislation would extend similar standards to the legislative and judicial branches of our Government. It's already passed the Senate and cleared the Rules Committee in the House and is ready for floor action without delay.

Last week, the House passed a bill I supported requiring those organizations which do significant lobbying of Congress to disclose their activities to the public. Although lobbying is a constitutionally protected activity, the American people have a right to know what major forces are affecting the legislative processes. It's time now for the Senate to follow the lead of the House and pass a lobby reform bill.

Law enforcement agencies must set a clear example for their respect for the law. Recently, as the number of undocumented aliens has grown, there's been a disturbing trend particularly in your part of the country toward routine police harassment of our Mexican American citizens. I know that your own bar association has studied this problem.

Last month, the Justice Department intervened in a harassment case in Texas where three policemen had been convicted for the death of a Mexican American prisoner. In filing for a review of the 1-year jail term given to the convicted men, the Justice Department said, and I quote, "The public perception of inequality and the belief that the life of a Mexican American citizen has little value can only do damage to respect for the laws and belief in justice."

This kind of harassment must stop, and my administration, working with you, will do what it can to see that it does. Moreover, we've submitted legislation to Congress now which will stop the flow of illegal immigration while fully protecting the rights of our Hispanic citizens.

When I was Governor of Georgia, I appointed judges on the basis of merit alone. And one of my first acts as President was to create nominating commissions to recommend candidates to me for all appointments as Federal circuit judges. I'm pleased that many Senators, including those from California, have now set up similar commissions at the district court level.

The passage of the Omnibus Judgeship Act, now pending in a House-Senate conference committee, will provide a test for the concept of merit selection. The conferees have recently agreed that the President should set standards and guidelines governing the selection of district judges, and I intend to use this authority to encourage establishment of more merit panels and to open the selection process.

The passage of this act—which will create 152 Federal judgeships—offers a unique opportunity to make our judiciary more fully representative of our population. We have an abominable record to date. Of the 525 Federal judges, only 20 are black or Hispanic, and only 6, about 1 percent, are women.

While the Federal bench in southern California has become more representative, this is not true elsewhere in the Nation. My Executive order on the Circuit Court Nominating Commission specifically requires special efforts to identify qualified minority and female candidates.

During too many of the struggles for equal justice, just in the lifetimes of you and me—the questions of one-man, one-vote, voting rights for blacks, representation for indigent clients, and others—much of the organized bar sat on the sidelines or actually opposed these efforts. In today's struggle for women's rights, the passage of the equal rights amendment and the full participation of women and minorities at all levels of our society, I hope that lawyers throughout the country will follow the actions that your bar association has already taken here in Los Angeles County.

The third challenge is suggested by the American Bar Association's theme for this year: "Access to Justice." Too often, the amount of justice that a person gets depends on the amount of money that he or she can pay. Access to justice must not depend on economic status, and it must not be thwarted by arbitrary procedural rules.

Overcoming these procedural barriers means that groups with distinct interests to defend—in civil rights, economic questions, environmental causes, and so forth—must be able to defend them fully. We are supporting efforts to broaden the use of class action and to expand the definitions of standing to sue. My administration supports bills before Congress that would empower citizens to participate in the proceedings of Federal agencies—a right that has too often been reserved for the large and the powerful corporations which have the legal resources to express their view forcefully.

We must remove the economic barriers to justice. When a poor family is cheated by a merchant, unfairly threatened with eviction, falsely accused of a crime, it can very rarely take advantage of the skilled legal talent at reasonable rates.

In the city of New York there are 35,000 lawyers—1 for every 200 citizens. But only a handful of these lawyers are available for service to the city's 1 million poor—1 lawyer for every 5,000 poor people. That's why we have now expanded the Legal Services Corporation. In fiscal year 1979, its budget will be more than twice as large as it was when my administration took office about a year ago.

But you know and I know that legal help is often beyond the reach of most of the middle-class Americans, as well. Here, too, I believe that the bar has an obligation to accommodate those with modest incomes. Free and open competition is the best way to bring legal services within the reach of average citizens. Another solution, which my administration supports, is the expansion of prepaid legal plans, legal clinics, and other low-cost alternatives, such as those pioneered by the United Automobile Workers. The Neighborhood Justice Center near here in Venice and Marvista is a good example of what we are trying to do.

I also ask that lawyers join the effort to stop inflation by following the example we've asked of every other group in our society and to join in decelerating the rise in legal fees. This morning, new inflation figures were published in Washington that caused me grave concern. How can we, the privileged members of American society, call upon the working people, the men and women of our country, to make a financial sacrifice to deal with inflation unless attorneys, doctors, accountants, other professionals, Presidents, assume the same responsibility to assist in our efforts to keep a lid on inflation?

One of the greatest failings of the organized bar in the past century since the American Bar Association was founded is that it has fought innovations. When greater competition has come to the legal profession, when no-fault systems have been adopted, when lawyers have begun to advertise or compete—in short, when the profession has accommodated the interests of the public, it's done so only when forced to.

Constructive work is now under way, and as this second century of the bar association begins, the people of this country are beginning to see leadership from the members of the bar.

But as we make litigation more accessible, our fourth challenge is to make the adversary system less necessary for the daily lives of most Americans—and more efficient when it must be used. By resorting to litigation at the drop of a hat, by regarding the adversary system as an end in itself, we have made justice more cumbersome, more expensive, and less equal than it ought to be. This is a phenomenon more and more widely recognized, I know, among members of the bar.

One answer is to be sure that other pathways to justice do exist. Many suggestions have already been made for making litigation less necessary, and my administration will work with you and other members of the bar to implement them.

In a great number of cases there is no sound reason for a lawyer to be involved in land transfers or title searches. Simplified procedures and use of modern computer technology can save consumers needless legal fees.

We must eliminate from our judicial system cases which can be resolved in other ways. No-fault automobile insurance systems, adopted by many States, are a step in the right direction. National standards for no-fault will have a much greater impact. We support no-fault divorce laws, like those passed when I was Governor of Georgia and the ones passed here in California, that can reduce litigation that's unnecessary and also the bitterness that litigation brings. We must look for ways to reduce the tremendous burden of medical malpractice costs.

Delays in our courts because of excessive litigation are matched by the interminable delays in many Federal regulatory agencies.

In trying to solve society's problems, our regulators have proposed unnecessarily detailed specifications and written regulations in the kind of gobbledygook that could employ a generation of law school graduates just to interpret them.

I've pledged to reduce this regulatory burden for the first time on American citizens, and we've taken some steps toward change. A few weeks ago, I signed an Executive order that will be carried out, which requires that heads of departments and agencies personally approve the regulatory agendas of their organizations, that regulations be signed by the one who wrote them, that regulations be gone over rigorously in "sunset" reviews to terminate them when they have served their purpose, that they be simply written, and that they are the most cost-effective rules possible to devise.

Where the free marketplace can do a better job than regulations—as in the setting of airline fares—I will work hard to deregulate that industry and to encourage free and effective competition.

The Senate has passed a superb airline deregulation bill. I predict that next week it will come out of the House subcommittee, and we expect success on the floor of the House.

We must also find a way to remove the vested interests in overlitigation and delay. Last year, corporations spent $24 billion on legal services—12 times as much as we spent on all Federal, State, and local courts combined. We must ask whether this is the right way or the best way to conserve our legal resources or to ensure justice.

We are reviewing suggestions for reducing litigation, including more arbitration, greater reliance on small claims courts, and experiments with alternative systems for resolving disputes, such as the experimental arbitration systems now in existence in San Francisco, in Philadelphia, and in other parts of our country.

But even with all these steps, much litigation will, of course, still be necessary. There are a variety of steps that can be taken together to make necessary litigation more efficient and to reduce unnecessary delays.

I support legislation now in Congress to expand the functions and the jurisdiction of Federal magistrates, to reduce the burden on Federal judges.

I support a speedy appeals act to reduce the delay between sentencing and appeal, and I've directed Attorney General Bell to study whether we can also apply strict time limits to civil trials and to regulatory proceedings.

Those of us—Presidents and lawyers—who enjoy privilege, power, and influence in our society can be called to harsh account for the ways we are using this power. Our hierarchy of privilege in this Nation, based not on birth but on social and economic status, tends to insulate some of us from the problems faced by the average American. The natural tendency for all of us is to ignore what does not touch us directly. The natural temptation when dealing with the law is to ensure that whatever is legal is just.

But if our Nation is to thrive, if we are to fulfill the vision and promise of our Founding Fathers, if we are truly to serve the ends of justice, we must look beyond these comfortable insulations of privilege.

I have too much respect for the potential of the law to believe that this leadership is not possible from you.

I hope that lawyers throughout the country will take up the challenges I have made today. I know you understand the responsibility to serve justice. You have dedicated your very lives to this task.

This responsibility is older than our Constitution, older than the Bill of Rights, older even than the tradition of the common law. It comes from the roots of our Western heritage, with the prophet Amos, who said, "Let justice roll down like waters, and righteousness like an ever-flowing stream."

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 12:13 p.m. at the Dorothy Chandler Pavilion of the Los Angeles Music Center. In his opening remarks, he referred to Samuel L. Williams, president, and John D. Taylor, president-elect, Los Angeles County Bar Association.

Following his remarks, the President attended a reception for bar and civic leaders and elected officials in the Founders Room at the Dorothy Chandler Pavilion.

Los Angeles, California

Remarks at the Senior Citizens Nutrition Center of the Watts Labor Community Action Committee. May 4, 1978

So I won't forget: Ted Watkins, Governor Brown, Mayor Tom Bradley, Congressman Hawkins and Senator Waters, Supervisor Hahn, Merv Dymally, other Members of the Congress, my friends, ladies and gentlemen:

How you doing? I'm glad to be back. As many of you may remember, this is where I started my campaign in Los Angeles. I was a stranger and you took me in. I thank you for it.

It's been almost 2 years since I was here also to dedicate part of the Martin Luther King Hospital, and 2 years ago this month, I spoke here at the Nutrition Center during the California primary. A lot has happened to me since then—[laughter]—and I saw as we came through a few minutes ago, around Franklin Square and in five or six other places, with the move on housing, that many things have been happening to you here in Watts. And I want to congratulate all of you who are responsible for making this community grow and thrive and be bound close together in a spirit of brotherhood and sisterhood and make progress. Thanks to you and all those on the stage with me.

I know that the Watts area has a lot of problems, but you've got a lot going on among all of you that's almost guaranteed to make the future even brighter. You've got Gus Hawkins, Ted Watkins. I've been talking to Gus in the automobile just a few minutes ago, and I'm working with him now in the Senate—we've already been successful in the House—to pass the Humphrey-Hawkins full employment bill that's going to help all of you and your neighbors.

You've got the largest percentage of homeowners of any urban black community in the whole country. And that speaks well of you, because I know of nothing that can create more security now and a better prospect for the future, for your children and your grandchildren, than to have a place you can call your own, a permanent home. And that's a fact that's not very well known around our country, about Watts, but it shows that you've got the spirit to overcome difficulties and plan for a great future.

And you've got people like Elvin Hudson at the Broadway Federal Savings and Loan who care enough—I wish all bankers did this—but he cares enough so that 90 percent of all the deposits made in his bank are loaned out, right here in this community, to let people own even more homes.

Other financial institutions have joined to provide storefront mortgaging counseling and to fund the Hope program. I know Mayor Bradley is very proud of that program. It's amazing how many people in our Nation don't know how to go and get financial assistance, to borrow some money, to buy furniture, to buy a home. And they need counseling, they need to be taught. And it doesn't have to be done by government agencies.

When you have enlightened public officials like these and enlightened lending institutions like you have, it makes it much easier for you to meet your needs. Like most inner-city neighborhoods, Watts has problems with redlining, where banks say we will make no loans, no matter what the quality of the family, no matter how secure their jobs in a certain part of our cities.

With my strong support, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board has issued tough, new rules which will help end redlining in all parts of the country. And you've set a good example here.

We've doubled money available for repairing and rehabilitating homes, and this has also been supplemented by new money to build more new housing for the low- and the moderate-income families. We've cut the FHA downpayments, and we've increased the insurance for mortgages to make it easier for the moderate-income family to become homeowners.

The new urban policy that we recently announced will further aid areas like Watts. It will provide employment tax credits and expanded training subsidies to encourage private industry to hire the unemployed who especially have a difficult time getting a job.

We're providing low-interest loans through a new national development bank, an expanded economic development grant program, and special investment tax credits to businesses to give them less taxes to pay if they will move their business and set up a new business in areas like your own where the unemployment rate is high.

We're providing direct payments to neighborhood groups and organizations, like those here in Watts, for community crime control, to repair housing, and for neighborhood development.

This urban policy will strengthen minority businesses. We passed a public works bill last year, several billions of dollars, $4 billion, and for the first time, with the help of people like the Congressman here on the stage with me, we put in the law that at least 10 percent of all the projects built had to be built by contractors owned by minority American citizens. We're going to beat that 10 percent.

We also set a goal that by the end of last year, we were going to have at least $100 million in Federal money deposited in banks owned by black citizens. We went over our goal. We're going to have even more this year.

In the past, the Government agencies haven't bought enough supplies, like filing cabinets, notebooks, furniture, from companies owned by minority citizens. But I pledged when I became President to double that in 1 year. We've already doubled it, and I pledge for next year to triple what we were doing in purchasing supplies and other things from companies owned by and employing black citizens and Spanish-speaking citizens.

I realize that we've still got a long way to go. We're partners, you and I, in trying to make America, the land, the country that we love, be fair to everybody, because too long in the past, because someone was poor, because someone was black, because someone was without influence, they weren't treated fairly by government—and by private industry and business, as well.

We're going to try to change that, and I believe we've already made some good progress. We've tried to bring people into Washington to help me, who understand these special problems. Just 2 weeks ago, for instance, Bob Kemp began his duties as the new Executive Director of a Council for Minority Businesses, and he will help me see that we meet the goals that I've just described to you. Until he was called to Washington, Bob was president of the Economic Resources Corporation, which built the Watts Industrial Park. This park has brought in already more than 900 new jobs, and this year it will add several hundred more, 80 percent of them for local residents like you and like your kinfolk.

The industrial park, like the Labor Action Committee projects in this center, represent the kind of development that inner-city neighborhoods need. Local people have just gotten together and brought in big national companies and dozens of smaller firms to create a broad and expanding economic base and new jobs.

You included a day care center to serve workers in the community. Projects like these show what a community can do for itself, with the right kind of help from the government, to meet some of its needs for jobs, housing, good health care, day care centers, and senior citizen services.

It was this spirit of cooperation for the common good that moved Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and Rosa Parks, and all the other Americans, black and white, who did so much to free this Nation from the ancient evil of discrimination that had divided and weakened us from the beginning. Thank God those days are almost over.

When I was here nearly 200 years—nearly 2 years ago—[laughter]—it seems like 200 years—[laughter]—when I was here nearly 2 years ago to dedicate the hospital to Martin Luther King's memory, I told you that we still have his dream. We still have your dream. We still have my dream.

I told you we must give our government back to the people. I spoke of a new day, of honest and compassionate and responsible government, of an America with a tax system that did not cheat the average citizen and give to the rich, of a time when there was a job for every man and woman who wanted to work, and a decent standard of living for those who were not able to work.

I've tried to fulfill those dreams through new jobs programs, through increased funding for education—more than ever before in the history of our country—and through child health programs.

Last year in this Nation, we had a net increase of 4.1 million jobs and, as you know, we cut the unemployment rate down 2 full percentage points in just 12 months. Well, we've made some progress. But we knew to begin with that the road would never be easy.

Sometimes our system moves slowly despite the best intentions. We need to attack the long-term problems that have built up over the years—energy, inflation, hospital costs going up too rapidly, welfare reform, and unemployment.

All these things touch most cruelly the poor and the elderly. I've sought to make this country the kind of place that you want it to be, a land of opportunity and justice and hope. I have felt your pain and I have shared your dreams and I take my strength as President of the United States from you.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 1:55 p.m. at the Bradley Multi-Purpose Center, a part of the Nutrition Center. In his opening remarks, he referred to Ted Watkins, director and founder of the Watts committee, California Assemblywoman Maxine Waters, County Supervisor Kenneth Hahn, and Lt. Gov. Mervyn M. Dymally.

During the motorcade to the Bradley Center, the President viewed and was briefed on new federally funded housing projects in the area.

THE PRESIDENT'S NEWS CONFERENCE OF MAY 4, 1978

Held in Portland, Oregon

THE PRESIDENT. Good evening, everybody.

First of all, let me say that it's a great pleasure to be back here in Portland. I've come west on this trip to talk about the most pressing issues that we've faced—energy and environment, urban policy, agriculture, jobs, inflation, criminal justice, tax reform—and also to listen to what westerners have to say. Our national agenda is a full one. We have a lot to discuss and a lot to do.

FEDERAL CIVIL SERVICE REFORM

One of the things at the very top of that list is making our Government work better. Reform of the civil service is the single most important step that we can take to ensure that the Government does what it's supposed to do—meet the needs of the American people with a minimum of waste and a maximum of efficiency.

We all want a government that is worthy of confidence and respect. That's what civil service reform is all about. Westerners have an extra stake in the efficiency of the civil service in the Federal Government, because the Federal Government plays a larger role in the life of this region than perhaps in any other. For example, the amount of public land in the West gives you a special stake in Federal decisions in the way they are implemented.

Since so many critical decisions are made in Washington, and Washington is physically remote from the West, responsiveness of our Government depends upon the ability to learn your needs and to give them a full and a fair consideration. A government whose capital is a whole continent away has to be that much more alert and responsive and competent.

Two months ago, I submitted to the Congress a comprehensive program of reform for the civil service. My aim has been to clear a path for honest, hard-working, and industrious civil servants, and to give them the tools to get the job done.

I want to reward competence and dedication. I want to clear out the incompetence and the unresponsiveness that cheat the American taxpayer and give all governments a bad name. And I want to make government more effective by establishing clear assignments of responsibility and authority.

We need to put the work ethic back in public service, and we need to put merit back in the merit system.

We are trying to do that in a way that honors and protects every Federal employee's rights, while giving managers in the Federal Government the authority that they need to do their job.

It's virtually impossible now to discipline those Federal employees who fail to perform. This is an issue of efficiency and good management, but it goes beyond that. It's also an issue of the performance and the vigor, the very life of our democratic system.

I think the American people in the West and all across the country are going to be watching how the Congress handles this very difficult but very important assignment to reform the bureaucracy of our Government, the keystone of which is to make the civil service work better.

Mr. Cadera.

QUESTIONS

TIMBER PRODUCTION

Q. Mr. President, Jim Cadera, the Oregonian. Soon you will receive recommendations from your staff on implementation of your proposal to increase lumber supplies by cutting more public and private timber. Will you allow a variance from the policy of even-flow in national forest timber harvesting if it is recommended? And I have a followup.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, what I am interested in, first of all, is to sustain the rate of harvest for our national forests on a constant basis in the years ahead. I would not want to have a crash program to harvest too much timber at this time. We now waste probably 6 billion board-feet of timber every year. So, we want to improve the efficiency of harvesting the public lands timber that we have now. We also want to make sure that after the logs are harvested, that the output of them is increased in efficiency, and we want to assess whether or not we need to improve or increase the harvesting on private and State lands.

But no matter what the recommendations are to me, I would increase production only to the extent that we could do this and have a constant future of sustained production in our national forests.

FOREST SERVICE PERSONNEL

Q. Will you order the Office of Management and Budget to increase Forest Service job ceilings to allow intensive management and dramatically increase timber harvesting?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, that's one of the things that we'll be addressing within the next few weeks. We have, in the past, been putting out for sale 11, 12 billion board-feet of lumber per year. And if there is a decision made to increase this harvest rate and to sustain our permanent harvest capability, then it might call for additional forest personnel. But I think, in any instance, what personnel we have working in our national forest needs to do a better job to enhance production of the forests that we have. There are about, I think, 300,000 acres of national forests in Oregon, Governor Straub told me, which was over-harvested in the past, which is now relatively nonproductive. This kind of over-harvesting in past years needs to be corrected. So, to improve the efficiency of production of the acres we have is a very important element, and it may take more personnel. If so, I would not hesitate to put them to work.

PRESIDENT'S INCOME TAXES

Q. Mr. President, have you resolved the IRS audit of your 1975 income taxes, and did you have to pay income taxes in 1977 and, if so, how much?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I had to pay income tax in 1977. I don't remember the exact figure, but it was a substantial amount. The 1975 audit, so far as I know, has not yet been completed. The last time I heard about it, the prospect was that it would be accurate within a couple hundred dollars.

NUCLEAR WASTE DISPOSAL

Q. Mr. President, Boyd Levet, KGW, Portland. Federal officials tell us that there will be no permanent nuclear waste disposal program until the middle 1980's. Nuclear plants across the Nation will have filled their temporary storage facilities by then. What do you propose to do in the interim, and would you impose a storage site on a State that decided that it did not want to have a storage site?

THE PRESIDENT. We've had nuclear power for peaceful purposes now for more than 30 years. And I think you know that in addition to that, we've had the production of atomic materials for weapons even earlier. There never has yet been a workable Federal policy for disposing of nuclear wastes on a permanent basis in Richland, Washington, for instance, where early supplies were produced.

I visited there often while I was in the Navy, and the underground storage there has sprung some leaks in recent years that have been detected.

We are now looking into the prospect of storing nuclear wastes in underground caverns which are, perhaps, salt-dome-type enclosures in some parts of the central Southwest.

We have also many commercial producers of atomic power who store their own spent nuclear fuel rods in various kinds of enclosures, both on the surface of the ground, in water tanks, and also buried underneath the surface of the ground.

By the end of this year, Dr. James Schlesinger will present to me a comprehensive proposal for a permanent waste disposal plan.

And to answer the last part of your question, I would not try to store nuclear wastes on any private lands in a State where opposition existed. There may be some very large military areas owned by the Federal Government where storage would be proper, and where there may be some opposition in a State. But we are trying to work that out now. One of the places we are looking at, for instance, is in New Mexico, and the process is including close consultations with local and State officials. It's a difficult problem that has not been resolved anywhere in the world yet.

NUCLEAR POWERPLANT SITING

Q. Mr. President, I'm Pat Wilkins from KATU, here in Portland. I would also like to ask a question about nuclear power, but it goes beyond the storage of nuclear waste.

I'm told by antinuclear groups here that their national goal is to shut down all nuclear plants. The tactic so far has been the same tactic that was used to shut down the Vietnam war—civil disobedience. Now, so far as our Trojan nuclear plant is concerned, that has so far resulted in about 200 arrests, and the consequent legal costs threaten to break the back of the tiny county trying the cases against them.

Now, more than that, the issue of nuclear power seems to be enlarging into an issue that could be seriously divisive for the people of the country as a whole. What I would like to know is, is this in your thinking, and do you have a plan to cope with such possibility?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, our national policy is to permit planning, siting, and construction of nuclear powerplants. Obviously, this is a decision to be made by local and State officials. I think when I ran for President in 1976, there were referenda on the ballots in 22 States of varying forms to restrict the production of nuclear power in those States. In almost every instance, those referenda were voted down by the people who were residents of that area.

We have, I think, some very good existing regulations which protect the public from the siting of nuclear powerplants in places that are dangerous. And I believe that the best solution to this problem is for people to abide by the law and for the local or State governments and people, through referenda, to decide whether they want nuclear powerplants there.

Obviously, the State legislatures could pass a law prohibiting it. When I was Governor of Georgia, I did approve the construction of a nuclear powerplant in Georgia. It was located in a place that was acceptable to the environmentalists, of which I considered myself to be one. So, I think the best way to handle it is for people to abide by the law, let local and State officials work out the location of powerplants, and if people object to their being constructed at all, through the legislative process or through referenda, to prohibit their construction in a State.

PRESIDENT'S CAMPAIGNING FOR

Q. Mr. President, concerning your trip out here to the Western States and the upcoming congressional campaign, some Democrats have been quoted as saying you may prove more a liability than an asset in the upcoming campaign. Assuming you disagree with that, sir, how do you respond, and how active will you be in the congressional campaign?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, if I had heard that from any Democrat, which I haven't, I would certainly not require them to attend the political rallies and the events in which I participate. I have no control over Members of the Congress. But I've never heard one say that. As a matter of fact, hardly a day goes by that some Members of the Congress—Governors don't request that I go with them to campaign in their States. I've been in two States so far already on the trip; one in Colorado, where there was a very strong and constructive relationship between me and the congressional delegations, some of whom were running for reelection, the Governors involved, and I think there's a very warm reception for me also.

So, I feel very good about the trip; don't think I'm a political handicap for Democrats who are running for office. If any of them think so, then their proximity to me is a voluntary matter.

NATIONAL WATER POLICY

Q. Connie Thompson with KOMO Television in Seattle, Washington. With growing pressure on your administration not to drastically reform the Nation's water policy, and also in light of the critical water supply picture, what, or how much of a reform do you plan to make in the Nation's water policy? What would be the reasons for any changes in your earlier plan for reform in that policy?

THE PRESIDENT. Long before I became President, there was a growing series of conflicts in this country concerning the use of water—conflicts between native Americans and white Americans; conflicts between environmentalists and those who desire increased power production from damming up free-flowing streams; conflicts between agricultural users, primarily for irrigation, and the producers of minerals and, particularly, fuel, like coal—and many of these longstanding disputes had begun to reach a crisis stage, resulting in interminable lawsuits, divisiveness, arguments, debates. And also, there had never been created in our country a comprehensive water policy that was evolved through close consultation among those conflicting groups.

We had never, either, had a way for Governors, mayors, Members of Congress, the President, the Cabinet, to consult with one another, to say, this is what we hope to do in the future with the water supplies that we have. And we've never had a way to set priorities on the expenditure of Federal and other funds.

Quite often we have approved, in the Congress, dams and other water projects that had a very low benefit-cost ratio. Sometimes they cost much more than the total benefits ever to be derived from a water project, because a Member of Congress had enough seniority or influence or the patience to wait for his or her project to get to the top of the list and be financed with public funds. There's a limited amount of money that can be spent for these very expensive water projects. And I want to be sure that when we do approve a project—and there will be many approved, I'm sure, in the future under my administration and others—that the most needed projects are the ones that get funded first, and that we don't continue to waste money on projects that are not needed and that are wasteful and, sometimes, even dangerous.

So, I think the evolution of the water policy is a very constructive thing. It's long overdue. We will have the water policy options presented to me when I get back to Washington. This next week my own staff and Secretary Andrus will be meeting with the staff, Members of Congress, and also the Governors, and the following week I will meet with the Western Governors. And then I will make a decision on what the water policy of our country should be. Many of those decisions will have to later be considered by Congress.

But I think the whole process is a very constructive one, long overdue, badly needed, to be sure we do harness water and use water to the best advantage in the future, protecting the interests of the people who are involved.

MIDDLE EAST ARMS SALES

Q. Are you willing to compromise on the number of warplanes you propose to sell to Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and Israel in order to achieve congressional approval of those sales? And the second part of my question is, do you see the same linkage between Saudi Arabian support of the American dollar and oil prices that Sheik Yamani did last week when he looked at the sale?

THE PRESIDENT. I think Sheik Yamani has recently denied saying what was reported from him about a close interconnection between continued involvement with the American dollar and friendship between Saudi Arabia and the United States and the sale of warplanes to Saudi Arabia. I think he's denied that.

I think the proposals that we have made to Congress—to Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and Israel for warplanes—ought not to be changed at all, and I hope and expect that the Congress will approve this proposal as we submitted it.

Obviously, there will be a lot of hard work to be done in the Congress. We'll be presenting testimony to the House committee on the 8th and 9th of May—and we've also testified yesterday for 6 or 7 hours in the Senate committee. I think we will win this proposal because it's right, it's good for our country, very badly needed.

One of the most crucial elements of a permanent maintenance of peace in the Middle East and the security of Israel is for us to have a relationship with the moderate Arab nations, like Egypt and Saudi Arabia, where they depend upon us to keep our word and where there is a clear recognition of the friendship and mutual trust between our countries.

We have provided these planes for Saudi Arabia, not to attack Israel; they are a defensive type of airplanes. And the Saudis have ordered configuration or appurtenances on the planes, fittings on the planes that are defensive in nature. So, they are designed and needed to defend Saudi Arabia. I see no reason to change any of those proposals.

INFLATION

Q. Mr. President, Ted Natt of the Daily News in Longview, Washington. Today there was more bad news about the economy. The wholesale price index went up a larger than usual amount. Do you have a point in your mind beyond which you'll take stronger action on inflation than you've taken thus far and, if so, what is it, where is that point?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't intend to impose wage and price controls. We are consulting now with labor and business leaders to get them to reduce their rate of increase of both wages and prices below what they did the last 2 years. We call that deceleration of inflation. And I'm going to be very strict in vetoing any proposals that the Congress makes that would increase the deficit that we already face for next year's fiscal budget, 1979.

My own admonitions to the American people—I spoke to the lawyers today and asked them to hold down their rate of fee increases. They have increased professional fees, maybe news people included, in the last 5 years, even more than oil prices have gone up. And so, I think that this is going to be a matter for all Americans to address. Everyone wants other people to be the ones to take action to hold down inflation, to hold down wages, to hold down prices, but it is going to have to be a common effort. And I'll do everything I can within the power of the Presidency to hold down the inflation rate.

A year ago, my primary consideration was putting American people back to work. And the Congress rallied with me, the American people, the private business sector rallied with me, and we've had remarkable success in the last 15 months in bringing the unemployment rate down.

We added more than 4 million jobs last year. I think the unemployment rate, in Oregon went down 3 full percentage points. And now we're going to address the same degree of determination to holding down the inflation rate without abandoning our effort to further reduce the unemployment rate.

Q. Mr. President, to follow that up, if I may: General Motors' response to your deceleration program was to announce an average increase of about $100 on each, or most, new model lines. A.T.&T.'s response, with estimated profits this year of $5 to $6 billion, was a statement by Chairman deButts that A.T.&T. probably would need a rate increase this year. And the response of several unions has been that they do, indeed, consider the coal settlement as a pattern for wage increases next year of 10, 12, or 13 percent.

In the light of that, what possible assurance can you give the American people that there is going to be any progress in fighting inflation?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I can't guarantee success. The only thing I can do is the best effort in my power. I can't mandate action by those people involved. That's not compatible with what I've heard from Tom Murphy, who is head of General Motors, or Mr. deButts, who's head of A.T.&T. My hope is still that from the automobile manufacturers—Ford, General Motors, and others—that they will hold their price increases below the 6 percent average for the last 2 years.

And we have two major labor settlements this year, as you know—railroads and Post Office employees.

We're going to do the best we can—I, Bob Strauss, and others—to hold down those wage settlements below the average that they got for the last 2 years on a nationwide wage-rate basis. And I believe we have a good chance to succeed. But it's going to take the concerted effort of all Americans to hold down the inflation rate. It's not something that government can do by itself. It's not something that one labor union can do by itself, nor one major corporation.

There's a common goal that we share not only with Americans but also with other countries. But it's a top priority in my economic package this year to hold down the inflation rate, and I hope that we'll have equal success as we did with unemployment last year.

INDIAN LAND CLAIMS

Q. Mr. President, I'm Randy Lewis, KEDO Radio in Longview, Washington. You mentioned native Americans a while ago. And that brings me to a question that's quite serious in the State of Washington, where there is growing resentment toward some land claims that native Americans are making, claiming treaty rights. There's also resentment that the Federal Government is taking an active role in supporting these land claims against the property rights of non-Indians. Are you aware of this feeling, and do you think there is a reassessment of this Federal role needed?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I'm aware of the feeling, of course. As you know, the disputes between native Indians and other Americans have been growing in recent years, primarily through the Federal courts. The ruling in this area concerning harvesting of fish between Indians and other Americans has been one of great importance to me and, I know, of high interest to all the people in this area.

We've had our Secretaries of Interior and Commerce working with the Department of Justice, trying to evolve a compromise between Indians and other Americans to try to take this case out of court.

We had a similar case that came to a head in Maine. I appointed Judge William Gunter to work out a compromise between the Indians and other residents in that area, and, hopefully, we can reach a solution there.

The Federal Government is charged with the responsibility of representing the Indian claims. Secretary Cecil Andrus, Department of Interior, is in the audience here.

And this creates an additional problem for us, but what we want is fairness and equity between native Americans and others. The case is not one that I can resolve from the White House. We can use our good offices as an intermediary, sometimes add negotiating services, and the members of my Cabinet can work with all elements involved. But even then, we have to get permission from the judges in the Federal courts to intercede, even to that degree.

Congress has acted in several instances with legislation which I have signed into law. But it's a longstanding problem. It's one that I hope we can resolve in the next few years. There are high disputes on both sides, and great quantities of money involved. It's a serious problem, one that we did not create, but it's been growing in importance for decades.

That's about the best answer I can give you. I don't know an easy answer to it.

ANGOLA

Q. What is your view, Mr. President, of the South African military action against Angola taken today, and what can the United States do in this case?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, our Congress and my predecessor in the White House finally reached an agreement that we would not intercede in Angola, a decision with which I agree. We are not about to send American troops to Angola to participate in a war in that western African country.

We want to see peace maintained. There have been so-called UNITA forces under Savimbe, operating in the south-eastern part of Angola ever since the last war a couple of years ago. President Neto, who heads up the government in Angola, has been quite concerned about this.

There are about 20,000 Cubans, also, in Angola supporting the Neto government.

Savimbe has denied to some of the European leaders with whom I've talked any supply of weapons or supply or other armaments from South Africa. I think he does get supplies from some other sources, not from us. But we have no intention to intercede in any war in Angola.

PRESIDENT'S POPULARITY IN POLLS

Q. Mr. President, Don Porter, KGW TV News, here in Portland. Sir, before you arrived much was written and said and made of the fact you are perceived by critics to have been unresponsive to problems of the West. Today, there's a new national poll that shows only 29 percent of those questioned think you are doing a good or excellent job as President. Presumably, you don't agree with these perceptions. My question is, do you think these perceptions hamper you in what you are trying to accomplish, and if so, do you have plans to try to counter them?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, one of the ways to counter them is to come to places where my policies might be in dispute or misunderstood and try to clarify the issues that are very difficult to solve and which involve not only me but involve the Congress, the Governors, mayors, and private citizens of our Nation.

We have addressed some issues that are very difficult to resolve. The unemployment rate was very high, the inflation rate was very high, the growth in our country was quite low and disturbing. We didn't have a strong enough relationship with the countries of Africa and Europe. The Middle East dispute has been going on for 30 years. We needed very badly and still need to have a SALT agreement with the Soviet Union. And we had been negotiating on the Panama Canal treaties for 14 years before I became President.

And we've tried to address these issues as strongly and as openly and as aggressively as is humanly capable to do. In addition to that, we've tried to bring some order out of chaos of some of the problems in the Federal Government—with welfare reform, the creation of a Department of Energy, to have a comprehensive energy policy for the first time, to put the civil service back in the proper working order, and all of these things cause some disturbance in the political structure of our country.

I feel very sure that almost all of the attempts that we have made are in the best interests of the American people. And I believe that as they are understood, that the present low rating in the polls will be improving. So, I am hopeful that my popularity in the polls will go up. I think any politician would feel the same, but I'm satisfied with the administration's progress so far. I've also found a very good reception on this trip to the West—better, I might say, than the last time I was out here.

Let me get Ann [Ann Compton, ABC News].

STRATEGIC ARMS LIMITATION

Q. Mr. President, this week you and some members of your administration have indicated there is not a new SALT compromise reached when Secretary Vance was in Moscow. Could you tell us what the United States has on the negotiating table in terms of SALT negotiations and whether the chances are better than remote that you and President Brezhnev would meet this summer?

THE PRESIDENT. We have not discussed any time for President Brezhnev to come here to the United States to meet with me. We extended him an invitation in the early days of my administration, because the last visit had been by President Ford to Vladivostok in the Soviet Union. I think the essence of it is that he is likely to come over here when we see a SALT agreement imminent, so that he and I, perhaps, can resolve the last, very few remaining issues that the negotiators can't resolve themselves.

Our determination is that any SALT agreement would protect the ability of the United States to defend itself against any conceivable attack. We would also insist upon the maintenance of equivalent capability, destructive power, between the nuclear armaments of our country and the Soviet Union. And on top of that, any SALT agreement would have to provide for adequate proof, verifiability of the other nation carrying out the terms of the agreement.

This is a very complicated subject. We have made a lot of progress in the last year, and my hope is that we can reach an agreement this year. But there are still several issues that have not been resolved.

Q. Have you put number figures, can you put number figures on what the United States is proposing at this point?

THE PRESIDENT. No. I think the American proposal has been revealed 4 or 5 months ago with the number of MIRV's that can be kept, the number of land-based missiles that can be kept by each side, and the total number of missiles of all kinds that can be kept. That's our proposal, but we've not reached agreement on all those matters, because they are interrelated. Any yielding on our part involving one of those figures would have to result in an equivalent advantage to our country by the Soviets yielding on a comparable figure.

We have not reached any point yet for revealing the details of our recent discussions with the Soviet Union.

HELEN THOMAS [United Press International]. Thank you, Mr. President.

NOTE: President Carter's thirty-first news conference began at 7:30 p.m. in the Ballroom at the Portland Hilton Hotel. It was broadcast live on radio and television.

Portland, Oregon

Remarks at a Reception for Community Leaders. May 4, 1978

Governor Straub and Mayor Goldschmidt, Congressman Bob Duncan and Jim Weaver, distinguished ladies and gentlemen, and my friends from the great State of Oregon:

I've enjoyed being in your State every time I've come. You've always received me with open arms and open hearts, and even when I was almost completely unknown and struggling almost by myself, looking for friends, you gave me a chance to cook hotcakes and to serve them, with Bob Straub, and we came within just a few votes of carrying Oregon, which will always be gratifying to me.

I was pleased to have a chance to conduct a regional press conference a few minutes ago. They always bring up the polls, and they always bring up the economy. One thing I've found is every time our poll rating goes down, the stock market goes up. [Laughter] So maybe I've found a way to solve the economic problems of our country.

This has been a very delightful trip. I was in Denver for an afternoon and the following morning. We made a major announcement on the enhancement of solar energy in our country. One of the major centers for the Nation will be there, as you know, in the Golden area, and we also know that Portland will be a major regional center, as well, for the development of solar power.

We've got a wonderful opportunity this year, in these early stages of my own administration, to work out some good policies that have long been neglected. Denver faces serious problems that you don't face. They have the highest air pollution rate in Denver of any city in our country; the most automobiles per capita. Is a matter of fact, their carbon monoxide rate is three times higher than the maximum Federal standards permit.

And we tried to launch, with 41 different Federal agencies, a concerted effort there to bring down this very serious problem of particulates and carbon monoxide, hydrocarbons, sulfur oxides, in that one beautiful city of our country. The essence of it is that the Federal Regional Council, my own staff in the White House, every Federal agency involved, the mayor of that city, Denver, the Governor, worked in concert with the congressional delegation to solve a serious problem.

We did the same thing last year in dealing with what was the crisis, as you remember, 16 months ago, 12 months ago, and that was the extremely high unemployment rate in our country. It was about 8 percent. We brought it down now to just a little above 6 percent. We added a net of 4.1 million jobs in the country, an unprecedented achievement. The Congress, I, many of you, worked in harmony.

These problems are difficult to solve. There are no easy answers. The Government can't do everything. And I think the beauty of the efforts that I've just described to you, those two examples, are that the private sector of our economy, just individual citizens, business, labor, with government at all levels, work together on a common problem.

You've got a wonderful city here, wonderful State. The beauty has never been in danger. And I know that you have natural resources and an intense interest in international affairs because of your foreign trade, one of the finest sea-ports in the world, and a lot to be thankful for in your great State. You've got some wonderful public officials to take care of your needs.

A little over a month ago, after 14 months of hard work, I announced a comprehensive urban policy for our Nation; one of the most difficult and intransigent challenges that we could possibly face.

Neil Goldschmidt told me on the way that he had studied it in detail, and he thinks it's a remarkable achievement. It's not based on new, expensive programs as a cornerstone of the effort, but it's based on making the present programs work better and then adding only incrementally in additional expenditures to round out needs that previously have not been addressed.

It is a policy that calls for an effective working alliance at all levels of government, again with the private sector, including business, labor, and just ordinary citizens in their communities and neighborhoods.

Its purpose is to serve individual communities, not just the badly deteriorated and damaged cities that are almost beyond salvation, not just the major metropolitan urban centers, but even good, sound, solid communities like Portland. And Portland is a good example of what can be accomplished with this kind of cooperation that I've just described to you.

Under the good leadership of Mayor Goldschmidt and Governor Straub, the city and State governments, business and labor, the community groups, have been working with the Economic Development Administration, the EDA, to develop a far-reaching economic investment strategy for Portland.

I think this State probably had the greatest reduction percentage-wise in unemployment last year of any with which I am familiar, almost 3½ percent, a remarkable achievement, which shows not only good administration in Washington and also in Oregon—[laughter]—but it also shows that the people of Oregon want to work if they are given a chance and given an opportunity for a job.

This evening, I'm very pleased to be able to announce some specific and substantial Federal support for the joint efforts that I've just described. Through the Economic Development Administration, $12 million will be provided during the next 18 months to strengthen Portland's economy and to create 6,000 more private jobs in your community.

This is a carefully evolved plan, initiated and, in effect, supervised by local and State officials, not (federal)<sup>1</sup> Government officials. The first phase will revitalize the northwest industrial district by improving road access and other facilities. EDA will provide about $2½ million for this purpose, about two-thirds of the total cost. The second phase will improve the Swan Island Industrial Park, develop other—[applause]—somebody is from Swan Island—develop other industrial facilities, and establish a revolving loan fund for business expansion. It will start in the coming fiscal year and will include $9.6 million in Federal funds.

Our urban policies and assistance are not just restricted to cities like your own. We recognize that preserving the special values of urban, suburban, and rural life depends on realizing how interdependent they are. There's no way for Portland to thrive unless other communities around you—up the river, down the river, up and down the coast—thrive along with it.

There's no way for the urban dwellers here to thrive, unless the forest timber producers and the farmers and the livestock producers also thrive. We recognize that preserving the special values of these component parts of our society are crucial to one another.

In this spirit, EDA has been working with towns and communities in Oregon on development projects involving fishing industry development, tourism and recreation, and light industrial park development in your smaller communities, all of which involve an overall EDA investment of about $7 million.

You and the other people in Portland are demonstrating what I strongly believe, that a cooperative partnership among Federal, State, and local governments and private business is the best way to generate the economic growth and the job opportunities that our communities need.

I'm proud of what we've done so far. It demonstrates that government can work. It demonstrates the strength of the American economy, something that's often forgotten. And I think it's good for all of us to be boosters not only of our own local communities but of our Nation.

I think a large part of some of our economic problems are caused by people always talking about the transient problems that we experience and not remembering that our Nation is the strongest, most dynamic, the most highly blessed by God of any nation on Earth. We have an underlying strength that's unshakable. So, we can weather the transient problems that we've faced, if we continue to work together.

That's what I'm committed to do. And with your help, we'll continue to see Portland one of the finest places to live in all the world.

Thank you very much.

*Informal Exchange With Reporters Upon Departure From the Olson Residence.
May 5, 1978*

Q. Good morning, Mr. President.

Q. Is there anything new in the world going on, Mr. President, that we should know about?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know of anything. I tried to read the news this morning. [Laughter]

SOUTH AFRICAN RAID IN ANGOLA

Q. What do you think of the South African invasion now?

Q. Did you ever find out about that South African thing?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. I got a report last night from Dr. Brzezinski in one of his briefings and Secretary Vance. I think you all know that the South Africans claim that it was just a retaliatory raid against the SWAPO forces who had invaded Namibia with small strikes, and they've claimed to have withdrawn and have not left any South African forces in Angola.

So we hope it's just a transient strike in retaliation, and we hope it's all over. We've expressed our concern to the South African Government and asked them for an explanation.

PRESIDENT'S TRIP TO WESTERN STATES

Q. How would you sum up your trip out here?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think it's been good. It has been a well-prepared trip.

I'll be meeting this morning with mayors and county officials from Idaho and Alaska, the State of Washington, Oregon, just to talk to them about how we can implement better some of the programs that we've got going on, particularly urban policy programs and some of the new housing programs we've put into effect, and to learn from them how well we are progressing on holding job opportunities open.

I think we've tried to form, through Jack Watson and the Cabinet members, a much closer relationship between us, in Washington, and the State and local officials, and in doing so, we hope that there will be a lot more benefit from the money we have to spend.

Q. Do you think this trip has helped solve what some perceive as a difficulty you have in this section of the country?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, somewhat. I think whenever I go out, it helps me to learn more about them and special sensitivities of areas in which I have never lived. And I think the preparation for the trip and the personal knowledge that I've been there and I've listened is of help, also.

We've got some problems that I think can be resolved fairly soon. Just the evolution of a water policy for the first time in history causes some people concern, but I think when the policy is evolved, when it's understood, we'll have much less dispute and dissidence in the future than we've had in the past.

The same thing applies to the d-2 lands in Alaska, which is the most important environmental decision that will be made in our generation.

The same thing applies to the limit on federally subsidized irrigated lands that we've had to face. This originated in the courts; the same thing with the Indian claims cases that have come up in the court—now we have to address them administratively. But I think after this first couple of years of trying to tackle problems that have been ignored for too long, there will be an understanding in the West that we really understand their problems and we're trying to deal with them, with their participation.

LEGAL AND MEDICAL PROFESSIONS

Q. You have got some lawyers upset. Mr. Spann of Atlanta, the ABA president, said he's surprised at you, that it's the Federal Government that needs to move on improving the quality of justice, not the legal profession in the first instance.

THE PRESIDENT. I think I expressed myself both clearly and accurately yesterday. And there's no doubt in my mind that lawyers care genuinely about their own clients, but quite often when they organize into a bar association, the bar association is primarily concerned about the welfare of lawyers and not the welfare of clients. And the same thing applies to other people like medical doctors.

I think doctors care very deeply about their patients, but when they organize into the American Medical Association, their responsibility is to the welfare of doctors. And quite often, those lobbying groups are the only ones that are heard in the State capitals and in the Capital of our country. So, I think it's very important that a President or a Governor express their genuine concern about some of the trends in the legal profession. I did it when I was Governor. My opinions have not changed.

And a major responsibility is now falling on lawyers to try to redress not only some of those differences that exist between themselves and their clients, obvious delay tactics in court, a misapplication of legal services away from poor people toward the rich, and an almost adamant and constant opposition to any sort of reforms that would help clients and help the criminal justice system in our country.

I think there's a trend in the right direction now. There's more responsiveness in organized groups, but it's primarily confined so far to the local bar associations like the one in Los Angeles County. And I hope this trend will continue, and I hope my speech yesterday will point out to them some clear needs in the legal profession.

Q. But you're as concerned about doctors as you are about attorneys?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I am. I think when I was Governor, my concern about the doctors was even more vivid than my concern about lawyers. But yesterday I addressed the attention of the Nation, I hope, to the problems in the legal profession, and I'm sure I'll find an occasion in the future to address the problems in medicine also.

MIDDLE EAST ARMS SALES

Q. You know there are a lot of reports in Washington that you would be willing to add more planes to Israel, that is, past 1983, increase the actual number of planes committed to Israel to sweeten the pot on that arms package. Is that correct?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, you know, what happens after 1983, into 1984 and '85, is not addressed in this proposal. I don't intend to change any part of the package of proposals that we put forward. We have emphasized the fact that the Congress can address them individually, and I think the Congress will be responsible. But I don't intend to change the proposals that we put forward.

Q. But, as you say, this package doesn't address things past 1983. You wouldn't be averse, would you, to some commitment beyond then that is not part of this package?

THE PRESIDENT. I think any modification in our proposal to the Congress that we have sent up would be a mistake.

GOVERNOR JERRY BROWN

Q. We had a poll out in Los Angeles yesterday that said about 45 percent of the people think Governor Brown is running for President. Did you get any idea whether he is going to or not?

THE PRESIDENT. No. Jerry Brown and I have a very good, friendly relationship. We've never had any disputes between us. We've consulted very closely on all major issues that affect California or, sometimes, the Nation as a whole.

When I ran for President, he was very helpful, very supportive. I think he's doing an excellent job as Governor. He's one of the few Governors, perhaps the only one so far as I can remember, who, when he's been to Washington, has spent the night with us in the White House. And I enjoy very much being with him, and there's never been any sort of difference between us. I think, as he said on many occasions, his primary concern now is to be elected to another term as Governor, and what happens later on in decisions made by either me or him is still highly conjectural. And I'm sure that he and I both are committed to keeping it that way for a while.

Q. So you still have not definitely decided to run for reelection?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I have not.

NOTE: The exchange began at 7:50 a.m. outside the residence of Paul and Janet Olson, where the President had spent the night.

Spokane, Washington

Remarks at Dedication Ceremonies for Riverfront Park. May 5, 1978

Senator Magnuson, Governor Ray, Governor Evans of Idaho, who is with us today, my friend Congressman Tom Foley, Congressman Dicks, Mayor Bair, Secretary Andrus and Secretary Bergland, many friends from Spokane:

During the last few days, I've been pleased to leave the city of Washington, D.C., and to visit the western part of our great Nation. I've been enjoying the beauty of it. I've been discussing with our citizens of all kinds, questions of great importance to ourselves, our families, our communities, our Nation, indeed, the entire world. I've been talking about the desire for peace, based on a strong America and a strong national defense. I've been talking about the beauty of our country, clean air, clean water, clean and productive land. I've been talking about our Nation's forests, our Nation's water resources, our Nation's fields that produce the food and fiber for us and the rest of the world.

I've been listening to suggestions and criticisms and talking with those who are experts on these subjects and who have a genuine desire to resolve the longstanding problems and questions which we all face—the questions of energy that have too long been ignored.

We now see these problems reaching a stage where they must be resolved. There are no easy answers. There are no quick solutions, because we have a strong, dynamic, growing, aggressive, competitive nation.

As President, I realize that I don't know all the answers, that Washington is not the source of all solutions, that there must be a genuine partnership between me, the Governors, the mayors, county officials, the Congress, and private citizens of all kinds, to make common sacrifices, to make common commitments, to realize the potential beauty and the greatness of our Nation.

It's good for me to come back to Spokane today to this same site where I was thrilled in 1974, when one of the days was called Georgia Day and I and my wife and my daughter, Amy, could look at the beauty of this river, stand in awe at the waterfall, see what a city of not great population could do to inspire the world, at the self-sacrifice and accomplishment that was exhibited here in Expo '74.

I wondered then about the background of Spokane and the future of this lovely site, once the excitement of Expo '74 was past. I flew in on a plane traveling tourist class, which was my custom then because of necessity, and I saw the beauty of your land. And today when I came on Air Force One, I had the same opportunity.

My friend Tom Foley thinks the Inland Empire is an American version of the Garden of Eden. And as I looked over the rich agricultural land and the beautiful mountains and hills and streams as I flew in this morning, I can see what he means.

You're lucky to be represented in Congress by a man like Tom Foley. In the last year and a half, I've learned why he is one of the most respected men in the Nation's Capital. In many areas, but especially farm agricultural policy—on which he does not always agree with me, I have to admit—he stands for responsible solutions that protect the interests of farmers and of all America. He understands, from a practical perspective, the special problems of farmers in this area, and he always represents your viewpoints very well.

This park is an achievement that would make any city proud, but you should also be especially proud of your Senator, Warren Magnuson, for the essential role he played in bringing this park into being.

As all of you know, it was Senator Magnuson who explained to the Federal Government the importance of this facility to your beautiful city and who helped to obtain Federal grants to aid in its construction.

As chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and soon to be President pro tempore of the Senate, Maggie is in an excellent position to continue his fine work for Spokane and the rest of Washington State—indeed, the entire Nation. He's one of the greatest Senators that I have ever known, and I respect and love him very much, as do all of you.

He expressed a philosophy that has always been my own: that the best government is a government closest to the people, that people ought to control their government, not let government control them, and that public officials should never forget who put us in office, and that we don't know all the answers at the State capital or the National Capital. The answers must be derived, even to most complicated questions involving foreign policy and national defense, from people like you all over our great Nation.

Today, we come to think about a particular aspect of American life. Since the days when I was a State legislator and then a Governor in Georgia, I've understood the special need to promote environmental and historical perspective and preservation. This is a place of lasting value that is also an economic boom to your whole entire region and State. I'm glad that the Federal Government has been able to join—not in a leadership role, but a supporting role—State government, the city of Spokane, and business interests like your railroads and the Land Resources Corporation, in creating something that brings enjoyment and prosperity to so many people.

Riverfront Park also shows very clearly what can be accomplished in urban redevelopment. You've transformed an area that was declining, that was far short of its great potential, into one of the Nation's most innovative and refreshing urban settings. I have proposed, as part of my own administration's new urban policy, a $150 million urban park and recreation program which can make possible, under Cecil Andrus' leadership, other parks like your own beautiful one here. And it also shows in a symbolic way the continuing relationship between energy and the environment.

Most of the Federal share that helped build this park came from our lease revenues from oil and gas production on the Outer Continental Shelf. My administration is committed to the belief that we can meet our Nation's energy needs and continue to protect and to enhance our irreplaceable natural environment. As those of you who have come from Coeur d'Alene know firsthand, we have in Cecil Andrus a Secretary of Interior from Idaho who's deeply and personally committed to that goal.

In the 15 months since I became President, my administration and the Congress have begun to tackle the most difficult problems facing our country. I've come here to listen to the people of this region and to ask your help for the programs and policies we need.

Later on today, I'll be facing for an extended period of time many of you and your fellow citizens in a direct interchange of questions and ideas, where there is no constraint on what you want to ask me or to suggest to me in how I can be a better President.

To solve the problems of our decade, we must recapture what is best in our national spirit. We must be willing to put aside regional differences. We must be willing to put aside, also, our special interests, our selfish grasping for advantage, and contribute to the general good. We must be willing to make sacrifices so that others will follow our lead. Because I am confident that our Nation is ready for that kind of challenge, and because we have no alternative except to face difficult problems, I've asked the Congress and the people to work with me in areas of greatest challenge.

On energy, we must act to conserve and to produce more, to import less, and develop alternative sources. On inflation, we must work together in a spirit of cooperation and restraint to slow the rising costs that threaten the economic security and the well-being of every American family. It's here that our greatest challenge may come. We cannot control inflation without common sacrifice and common commitment by us all.

On civil service, I need your support to help pass my reforms and to bring more efficiency and more incentive into the bloated Federal bureaucracy, which must be improved.

Here in the West, as well as elsewhere, we must improve our ability to protect the national environment while maintaining economic growth and development. This is a great challenge, but I have every confidence that we can meet it and succeed. We will never see the quality of life, the beauty of our environment deteriorate as long as I'm serving you as President in the White House.

None of this is going to be easy, and I don't pretend that any of us has all the answers. Many people say that as President of the United States, I have the most difficult job in all the world. But I have confidence that the people understand that there are no easy answers. I believe that people understand that difficult questions, too long ignored, must now be addressed.

I think people understand that there are conflicts of interest, even among the most well-meaning and dedicated and patriotic American citizens. This is part of our democratic society. But I feel an assurance, as President, that I can do a good job, to the extent that I maintain my close relationship with you and enhance the partnership that must exist in our great Nation.

I know that our reaction to these challenges will be the measure by which we will be judged by future generations.

The Congress and my administration can only do so much. We can never succeed without broad public support. We need the confidence and the understanding and the commitment of the American people. We need it in Washington, D.C., and we need it in Washington State, and I know that we can find it.

This partnership between you and me will help to realize the true greatness of our Nation.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 12:16 p.m.

Spokane, Washington

Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session at a Town Meeting. May 5, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. No one could be in a better political position than to be preceded and introduced by men like Tom Foley and Senator Warren Magnuson. I know of no one in the Congress than these two men who are more respected, more dedicated to serving their own people well, but who have also reached, because of their experience and knowledge, sound judgment and commitment, a position of national and even international renown and leadership.

I'm also glad to be here with you, the people who had enough good judgment to elect men like this to come to Washington, D.C.

I ran for President as an outsider, as an independent person, a Democrat, but one who didn't owe special interest groups anything. And when I began my own campaign, as you certainly remember, at least in retrospect, no one knew who I was, no one cared who I was. When I came here to Spokane the first time, I was a Governor of a great State, but my prospects for being President were considered to be almost nonexistent. I cast my lot with you and people like you all over the country. And I promised that I would stay in close touch with you as I made decisions about very difficult and challenging questions.

I didn't claim nor do I now claim that I know all the answers. I've had press conferences at least twice a month to let the national news media cross-examine me in an unconstrained, unrehearsed way on the most difficult issues that any human being could possibly face, domestic and international issues involving the very life of our country and our people.

And I've had experiences like this where citizens cross-examine me without so much time constraint for a full hour and a half in places like New Hampshire and Mississippi, Massachusetts, to listen to your voice, to the tone of your voice, to the thrust of your question, and then to try to respond.

Again, I don't claim to know all the answers, but I'm not afraid to face them. And I look forward to the time when people will begin to see much more clearly that we are now addressing some of the most difficult questions that our Nation has ever faced, at least in peacetime.

Almost 200 years ago, Congress voted to place our National Capital at what was then almost the exact center of the United States. But even then, Washington, D.C., seemed to be a very distant, a remote place to some parts of our Nation, like Georgia, because it took several days, many days, to go from Georgia to see the Congress or even to send a letter to Washington, D.C., and get a reply back. And I think that you all know, without my having to explain it to you, that Washington, D.C., is no longer the center of our country geographically. It's way over on one side of the Nation—some people say on the wrong side. But the sheer size of our country today would obviously amaze our Founding Fathers.

Technology, the innovation of American people, has shrunk those distances. We can now communicate directly by telephone or other means in a matter of seconds, and we can visit with one another personally after a delay of only a few hours. So the distances are less in those respects. But still Washington, D.C., is 2,500 miles from Washington State. And it can still seem distant and remote.

One of the reasons I ran for President was because I thought I could reduce that sense of distance or alienation or remoteness. This trip is part of that effort.

I've come here to the great Northwest to talk about the most pressing issues that all of us face together, and to listen to what you have to say about those issues. We have a lot to do and a lot to discuss.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES

One of the issues that is ever present on my mind is the question of inflation, which hurts every family in this country. It's perhaps the toughest domestic problem we face, and there are no easy answers to it. It's going to take a lot of time and a lot of ingenuity to bring inflation under control, and it is going to take some sacrifice, some sacrifice from all of us.

I'm going to take the leadership as President through a series of specific actions, including holding down pay increases for Federal employees—for those at the executive management level, zero increase this year. I'm going to cut down wasteful spending and make sure that we don't have any greater deficit than the one we already face.

I'm going to work for legislation to control hospital costs, which have been going up for all our people at twice the rate of other inflation, increased 15 percent last year. And I'm going to reduce unnecessary government regulations and intrusion into the lives of American people, sometimes very costly in inflation, like in the deregulation of the airline industry. But all of us need to work together in a spirit that puts the national interest above our narrow, selfish concerns.

We have made great progress in our economy—without bragging on myself, because the credit goes to you and an enlightened Congress. Remember this time last year when the prime consideration, the prime concern was unemployment? Your unemployment a year ago in this State was 3½ percent higher than it is now, and on a nationwide basis, 2 percent greater than it is now.

We've made this progress by working together, government at all levels, private industry, individual citizens. It shows that American people, if they're given a chance to work, would rather have a job. And it's making our country more productive. We need to keep that momentum going, and I hope the Congress will agree with me—I'm sure you all agree—that we need to and must cut American income taxes by at least $25 billion this year.

Another problem is making the Government work better. I'm a farmer and an engineer and a businessman, and it grieves me to see an unmanageable entity, even in government, that's supposed to take the ideals of the American people, the actions of Congress, and to carry out programs that help you, and to see a bureaucracy there that's almost completely unmanageable.

The American Government employees are good people. They're dedicated. Quite often they serve at a financial sacrifice. They've devoted their one life to trying to serve the public. But with a complicated and confused bureaucracy based around a civil service system that's outdated and outmoded, it's become impossible to reward good service, to give promotions and salary increases to those who really do an outstanding job. And it's almost impossible to discharge or to demote someone who occupies a position in the Federal Government and refuses to do their jobs. So, we have proposed to the Congress this year basic civil service reform. It must be passed. And I hope that all of you will help me to encourage the Congress to put this reform into effect.

Another very serious problem is that of energy. For all these years in our country we've not had an understandable energy policy. We've been extremely wasteful. We've grown now to import so much oil that it's hurting every person in our country. Last year we imported about half the oil we used, $45 billion worth of American money going overseas to pay for oil, when much of that is unnecessary. But still now more than a year after I presented a comprehensive energy policy to the country, the Congress still has not acted.

Tom Foley, Senator Magnuson, your own Scoop Jackson have been in the forefront of trying to get the Congress to act. But we still don't have a good policy on saving the energy that we can save, on producing more in our own country, on cutting down imports which rob us all, and enhancing other kinds of energy that ought to be produced in much greater quantities, like solar energy. These changes must be made.

Well, in the last 15 months, the short time, or long time that I've been in office, we've tried to address these and many other difficult questions—forest management, water policy, caring for the environment, and at the same time keeping employment and growth sustained.

There are no easy answers to these domestic issues. We have tried to keep a strong American military capability; at the same time, to reach our hand out to guarantee peace for ourselves, for our children, for our grandchildren—a very difficult question to resolve. There are no easy answers there, either.

I know that in the past we've made some very serious mistakes. The Vietnam war, Watergate, the CIA revelations have kind of torn the fabric of our society, because the American people were not involved in making those decisions. We were faced with mistakes for the first time after they were revealed to us. And we create, sometimes, in the minds of American people, an image that we don't know exactly what we want to do.

I don't claim to know everything about what we want to do. But we try to bring the debate out into the open and let various voices be heard, so that when I do make a final decision about SALT talks or nonproliferation, or the use of solar power, or the control of the waste of energy, or farm agriculture policy, or urban policy, I will have listened to hundreds, even thousands of voices of Americans who know better answers than I do about a specific subject and who care deeply about our country.

So, to me it's important that we do have some confusion, that we do have an open debate, that we do have disputes on occasion and even outright criticisms. I think that's good in a strong, democratic society. I don't fear it. I also don't fear addressing some very difficult questions that have been ignored too long and have now become crises in our Nation.

Well, now, in order to help me in that process, I'm glad to respond to your questions.

QUESTIONS

TAX REDUCTION AND REFORM

Q. Mr. President, my name is Corky Burns, and, Mr. President, in examining some current legislation, it seems apparent that you support measures that will strip the small businessman of some of the tax advantages in regard to insurance, welfare, and retirement plans. Since these small businessmen are the foundation of our free enterprise system, and often have everything at risk, what justification is there for such an attack on them?

THE PRESIDENT. Mr. Burns, thank you.

The overall thrust of the tax reform and tax reduction package that I've proposed would give $6 or $7 billion in decreased taxes, net, to the business community of our country; and another 18 or so billion dollars in net decreases for the private citizens of our country, many of whom are involved as employees or employers in small business.

So, the net result of all these changes would be a substantial reduction in income taxes for almost every element of our society. There are some changes that ought to be made to eliminate loopholes and special privileges that have been enjoyed in the past. Those have been carved out by people and by organizations that have a very powerful and very effective lobby existent in the past and now on Capitol Hill.

I'm a small businessman myself. I ran, before I became President and went to Washington, a farm and a farm supply center. I employed between 10 people and sometimes 50 or 60 people in the harvest season in Georgia. And I know the difficulty in dealing with the Federal Government.

Later on, within the next 12 months, we'll have at the White House a Small Business Conference. We are studying now what can be done to improve the life and the profitability of American small business. But if specific items are removed as a tax privilege from those who own small businesses, it's just to make more equitable and simpler our entire income tax structure.

The net result is for small business—you'll pay less taxes. And the overall net result is that some of the special privileges that have been enjoyed by business will now be made more equitable for the average American taxpayer.

So, I'm in favor of a dynamic community, a growing economy, a net reduction in taxes, a simpler tax system, one that's more fair.

Thank you, Mr. Burns.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES

Q. My name is George Sparks. Mr. President, this question involves priorities. When historians look back at your term in office, what major domestic accomplishment do you hope will be identified with your Presidency?

THE PRESIDENT. As I said many times during the campaign, I would like to have a government that's as honest and decent and truthful and compassionate and, I said, as filled with love as the American people. This is a statement that was scorned and sometimes made the butt of jokes by people who are cynical in our country.

I think the strength of our government has got to be derived directly from the people. I would like for the government to be efficient, effective, sensitive, open, and fair. I would like for the decisions made on the domestic and international scene to be derived from the combined wisdom and idealism of the American people.

I would like to see us, on the international scene, project accurately the tone and the ideals that were envisioned 200 years ago. I've made a major commitment to let our country be identified on a worldwide basis as the protector of basic human rights. At the same time, in our own Nation we've got to be sure that we set a good example.

I spoke yesterday to the Los Angeles County Bar Association, and I spelled out then some defects in our legal systems. In many instances, the very progress that has been made in giving black people the right to vote, to hold a job, to own a home, has been obstructed by the most prestigious members of the legal profession during those times of transition and change. I know that lawyers are concerned about their clients. But when they organize into a bar association, the responsibility of that group is to protect the interests not of clients, but of lawyers.

I know that doctors care very seriously about their patients. But when you get doctors organized into the American Medical Association and their interest is to protect the interests not of patients, but of doctors. And they've been the major obstacle to progress in our country in having a better health care system in years gone by.

So, I look upon myself as a spokesman for the client and the medical patient and the student in a classroom, the elderly person, the mentally ill person. And I think this sense that I am that person would be the greatest achievement that I could derive for myself on the domestic scene.

I also want to be sure that the conflicting interests that exist in our country because of competition—and Americans are competitive people—are resolved to a great degree.

I would like to go out of office with the people understanding what will be the future possibilities in oil production, natural gas production, coal production, imports, exports, the use of solar power, the constraints on nuclear power, proper disposition of nuclear wastes, all the varied elements of an energy question. That's never been resolved in our country before. It's never been even addressed by a President and the Congress. It's a very difficult thing, because we are one of the greatest producing nations. We are by far the greatest consuming nation of energy. And to resolve those building conflicts around me as President would be a great achievement, and to bring an awareness of the harmony that ought to exist among American people, rather than emphasizing the differences that will always exist.

The last thing I'd like to say is this: I would like to go out of office having accomplished a resurgence in idealism in our country, reaching for greatness, acknowledging our mistakes, having American people realize that the local government, the mayor, the State government, the Governor, the National Government, the Congress, and the President are basically good people; not dishonest, not thieves, not trying to steal, but dedicated to the deepest commitment that we can possess of serving others.

We've got a good country, and when we have a temporary setback on unemployment or a temporary setback on inflation, or a temporary disharmony or argument with a foreign country, or a need to address the questions of agriculture or environment, this is just a temporary, transient sort of challenge; its not a catastrophe. But quite often Americans are too much inclined to condemn their own society and their government.

We've got the best government on Earth, we've got the best nation on Earth, and I'd like to go out of office with a renewed commitment among American people to prove that not only to ourselves but to the whole world.

MIDDLE EAST PEACE NEGOTIATIONS, ARMS SALES

Q. Mr. President, thank you for this opportunity. My name is Dennis Redford. I would like to know why we are involving ourselves in the sale of arms to Sadat and Begin on the one hand, and at the same time, not only advocating peaceful settlement but taking the posture of peacemaker in an active role with their negotiations? Aren't these positions realistically, diametrically opposed? Isn't this hard to justify morally?

THE PRESIDENT. No. And I'll explain why. There have been disputes in the Middle East for 30 years, even centuries, even before the time of Christ. And I think part of the involvement of American people in shaping my own decisions and the policy of our Government are very well illustrated by the Middle Eastern question. If you think back 12 months or 15 months, we've made a great deal of progress.

Never before have Arab leaders and Jewish leaders been willing to communicate directly with one another. I think the reason that Sadat went to Jerusalem and was received by Begin and Begin went to Ismailia in Egypt and was received by Sadat is because we helped in a limited way, I admit, to convince Begin and Sadat that both of those leaders genuinely wanted peace.

There's no doubt in my mind that Sadat wants peace perhaps as much as anybody in the world, and there's no doubt in my mind that Begin wants peace just as deeply.

One surprise that struck Begin and Sadat, they both told me that—in fact, Begin just a few days ago—one surprise was they underestimated their own people. When Sadat went into the streets of Jerusalem, the expression on the faces of public officials, women, children, every citizen along the street, was one of hope and welcome, even love for an Arab leader who in the past had been involved in war and the most intense hatred against the Israelis, against the Jews.

The same experience was witnessed when the negotiators went into Cairo. They couldn't walk down the street without being surrounded by Arab Egyptians who tried to give them gifts, some of them who were there—Ezer Weizman<sup>1</sup> told me that people would come out of their jewelry stores and try to put in their hands very expensive rings and diamonds, just as a gift from the Egyptian people for trying to strive for peace.

So, the essence of what we've tried to do is to capitalize on the genuine desire of the Arabs and Israelis to find peace, and a great deal of progress has been made. The first time I talked to Sadat in the seclusion of the upstairs bedroom area of the White House, he said, "What do you want, Mr. President, me to do?"

And I said, "I want you first of all to recognize that Israel has a right to exist, to exist permanently and to exist in peace. Secondly, I want you to reach out your hand and talk directly with the leaders of Israel, not through us as an intermediary. And third, I want you to recognize that there can be genuine peace between the Egyptians and Israelis, open borders, trade, tourist exchange, student exchange, diplomatic recognition."

He said, "Mr. President, that will never happen in my lifetime." Less than a year later, Sadat adopted all those requests of mine and laid them on the table. The Israelis responded accordingly. Begin has now put forward some good ideas.

Now, it comes to the arms question. Our interest in the Mideast is not as a distant observer. It's not just as a postman to carry messages back and forth between the Israelis and the Egyptians and others. Most of the time the messages are not received well, as you know, because each side wants more than the other one is willing to offer. We're not just a disinterested person or party.

We have an intense, serious, national interest in Middle Eastern peace, first of all, because of our total commitment that will never be shaken, that Israel shall be free, protected, secure, and peaceful. That overrides everything else.

The second, though, is my realization that the best way to do that is to also have the friendship and the trust and the partnership of the moderate Arab leaders, leaders like Sadat, a peaceful man, leaders like the Saudi Arabians, who have been staunch friends and allies of ours—there's no other government that I can think of that's been more helpful to me as President than those from Saudi Arabia.

We don't want them to turn against each other. We don't want them to turn against Israel. We don't want them to turn to even other European countries or to the Soviet Union for their own security.

The Saudis, for instance, in the most controversial part of the arms package, have requested 60 F-15 airplanes to be delivered between now and 1983. It's a very modest request.

When President Ford was in office, Secretary Kissinger promised the Saudi Arabians, with the full knowledge of the Defense Department, many leaders in the Congress, "We will give you whichever you want, F-16's"—which are primarily offensive planes—"or the F-15"—which is the finest defensive fighter plane in the world.

I reaffirmed this commitment when I first became President, and again in January when I went to Saudi Arabia to meet with King Khalid and the leaders. I said, "We will make this delivery." They chose the F-15, the defensive fighter. They did not ever ask us to put bombracks or offensive weapons on the F-15.

I think it's much better for us to keep that sense in Saudi Arabia that we are their friends, they can trust us when we make a commitment or a promise on the part of the President and the Congress, it will be honored. And I believe that it's best for Israel, for us to have this good, firm, solid, mutually trustful, friendly relationship with the moderate Arab leaders.

So, I believe that this proposal that I have made to Congress is minimal. I hope and believe the Congress will honor my recommendation. It will never be in any way a derogation of Israeli superiority in the air. They'll still be superior in every sense of the word. There's no threat to them.

The Saudis do not want to station these planes close to Israel. They want to put them up near Iraq and South Yemen, where the major threat against Saudi Arabia might come.

So, the totality of it is that we will go ahead with this proposal. It's good for us, it's good for Israel, it's good for peace in the Middle East. It helps us to keep a good trade relationship with those countries involved. It reinforces the commitment of Egypt and Saudi Arabia to look to us for their future prosperity and security. And in the whole process we will keep my honor—my commitment to the American people, that year by year, completely contrary to what we've done in the past, we're going to cut down each year the quantity of arms we sell overseas. I'm committed to doing this, and I'm going to do it.

SOCIAL SECURITY SYSTEM

Q. My name is Charlotte Lebsack. Mr. President, bearing in mind that the money I am paying into social security for my retirement is being used now, today, to pay for the benefits of those individuals who paid into the program 20 to 30 years ago, I would like to know what type of benefits, if any, I can expect to receive when I retire, and who is going to pay for them?

THE PRESIDENT. An excellent question.

This is another one of those questions that I faced when I became President last year. There are three major reserve funds that have been set up since the late 1940's to meet the payment requirements of the social security system. Two of those reserve funds were facing bankruptcy—one within another year, and the other one about 3 years later.

So, I studied this question for about 6 months, with the help of many Members of Congress, and made a proposal to the Congress, a proposition that we had to bring some constraint on the over-rapid increase in benefits that, in effect, doubled the inflation rate in some respects, and at the same time provide some firm commitment to finance the social security system on a permanent basis.

Congress acted last year. They guaranteed that the social security system will not go into bankruptcy. This was necessary so that for the next 25 years, if the Congress doesn't change the law any further, benefits will be guaranteed and those reserve funds will build up very slowly but steadily in the quantity of money available and there will be no threat to the social security system in years to come.

The people don't like to pay any more in social security payments, I realize that. But the amount that will be increased for you, the average American citizen, over the next 10 years is very, very tiny. The ones who will have a substantial social security increased payment to make are those that make $20,000, $25, $30, $35, or $40,000. And in the process of paying more, they also will have a higher base on which to derive benefits once they retire. It's a good investment for them.

So, you can rest assured that the social security will be sound. We've got accurate projections on how many people will be employed and how many will be contributing to the social security system in the future. And you need not worry, if the future Presidents and future Congresses don't change the system, that when you retire, the money will be there to pay your justly deserved retirement benefits back that you put in because of your hard work.

TUITION TAX CREDITS

Q. Mr. President, I am Catherine McGourin, and my question has to do with tuition tax credits. And first I would like to ask if any of your children attended private or nondenominational schools with tuition grants from the State, and second, I would ask if you intend to hold to your promise to help parents of children in private and parochial schools obtain help?

THE PRESIDENT. Fine. I've had four children. We had three boys while I was in the Navy, and then my wife and I had a 14-year argument that I finally won. [Laughter] Amy came along later. They've all attended the public schools, except my youngest son, Jeffery, who had problems with his health and who attended a private school for 1 year. We paid the tuition there without any State help.

When I was Governor, I instituted a program to give financial assistance to students who attended the private colleges. We started off $400 per year per student. It was increased later during my term to $600 a year per student. This was constitutional in Georgia.

I don't think that tuition tax credits ought to be authorized in the United States. We have put forward an alternate proposal to help the average American family pay for college tuition and other costs in a much more effective way. The tuition tax credits, because of the design of the income tax system, help much more greatly those families with a very high income.

My own belief is that to provide tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary schools would not only be ill-advised, because it would rob away from the public schools, but also is unconstitutional.

So, I don't favor tuition tax credits. And if the Congress does pass the tuition tax credit bill, I intend to do everything I can to keep it from becoming law, including vetoing the legislation. I'm committed to the public school system at the elementary and secondary level.

Within the confines of court rulings and other determinations under the United States Constitution, however, I am in favor of credits of many kinds, not through the tax system, being given to the parochial schools and other private schools. But the tuition tax credit system and the route is the wrong action in my opinion, and I oppose it now very deeply and believe it would be a serious mistake and will do all I can to prevent tuition tax credits from being the means by which we give aid to the private colleges for tuition, for scholarships, for loans for students—I think that's a better alternative. So, tuition tax credits I oppose.

SOLAR ENERGY

Q. Mr. President, my name is Chris Salisbury.

THE PRESIDENT. Saltsburg?

Q. Salisbury. There is presently a bill in Congress with over 100 cosponsors, called the solar energy bank bill. This is designed to set up a solar energy bank with a $5 billion revolving fund to provide long-term, low-interest loans for the purchase and installation of solar energy systems in commercial and residential buildings.

Do you support this?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't support that particular legislation. I think that a $5 billion allocation this next year for solar energy would be completely excessive. I don't think there's any way that we could either finance it without destroying the American budget, nor do I think that we could administer it for the benefit of the American people.

The first step that the Congress ought to take, including those 100 Members who signed that legislation, is to get passed the comprehensive energy package that's been considered by the Congress for the last 13 months. They've been too slow acting, and we need to expedite that process. Included in that legislation, by the way, is a $2,000 tax credit for any family who wants to install solar heating equipment in their own homes.

There is also direct grants, guaranteed loans for that purpose. The day before yesterday in Golden, Colorado, I announced that we were increasing by $100 million more the amount of money that we had already requested for solar energy research and development and demonstration projects.

In some areas of solar energy, we have passed the demonstration stage. We don't need to finance the installation anymore of units to heat water in a home, or even to heat a home. We know the technology. There are a million of those units in Japan right now. There are 300,000 of those units in Israel right now. It's time for us to move from research, development, and demonstration there to marketing. And I believe the best way to improve the rate with which American families install solar heating units and air-conditioning units on their homes is to make it possible for them to get loans to buy the unit, and to give them tax credits to encourage these purchases.

The manufacturers are ready to go to work on that, and I think we have made a proposal that's adequate to the Congress. We are going to increase, however, research and development into other forms of solar energy—temperature gradients in the ocean, windmill powerplants, the research and development on photovoltaic cells, the biomass processes, by which wood products or waste products or even garbage is changed into useful energy, and so forth.

That's where the research and development ought to be in solar energy, and not a $5 billion program as you've just described that would distort the whole energy picture and I don't think is necessary. I think we'll have a strong, good, aggressive, adequate solar energy stimulus package if the Congress will simply act expeditiously on a proposal that I've just outlined to you, which has already been made to them.

HOMEOWNERSHIP

Q. Mr. President, my name is John J. Hastings. I wish to preface my question with this statement about you. I believe that you are the best President this country has known in its 201-year history.

I am interested in economics and in inflation. Will you please tell me how a young couple in the 25-year-old age bracket might secure the collateral to buy an average home in the $70,000 to $80,000 bracket here in the Spokane Valley?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, first of all, I liked the first part of your presentation better. [Laughter] I'm not the best, and when I walk around the White House and realize the quality of my predecessors, it's a very sobering experience and a very inspirational thing.

We have a lot of meetings, for instance, in what they call the State Dining Room. And looking down on that room is a very somber and a very serious portrait of Abraham Lincoln. And down in the Map Room there's a little rough-looking wooden box—and when you open it up, there are writing materials in there, and sand to blot the ink, and quill pens. That was designed and built and all carried around the country by Thomas Jefferson, as he made trips like this to the then-existing country.

We've had some great leaders and some great Presidents who faced much more difficult questions than I do today. We are in a time of peace, and it's a good opportunity for us to reexamine what we are and what we stand for and to pull ourselves back together and to strengthen our country once again. So, I don't claim by any means to be the best person who's lived there. I'm not.

The second part of your question is one that's very difficult to answer. There are times in every young person's life when you have to make a decision on whether to buy a home that is acknowledged to be very expensive, or whether you want to continue to rent a home that might be a little bit less expensive per month. And the quality of the kind of home you buy is also a decision for you to make.

I lived in 15 houses before I was able to own a home. When I moved to Plains from the Navy in 1953, I didn't have any money, and I lived in a concrete block, low-rent, government housing project. I only paid $31 a month, which is all the government determined that I could pay. And I lived in three more houses before I built my present home in Plains. So, that judgment of when to buy and when to continue to rent and how expensive the quality of a home is one that you'll have to make.

We are trying to eliminate some of the disharmonies and obstacles that exist for young men and women to own their own homes. We are increasing substantially the effort in the Housing and Urban Development program to make homes available. And since I've been in office, not because of me, but because of the inclination of the American people and Congress action, we've had a very strong homebuilding program.

Last year more than 2 million new homes were built. Last night I spent the night in Portland with a young family, Paul and Janet Olson. They were living in a home that they bought a few years ago for $15,000. It was in a dilapidated part of town, and they bought it at a sacrifice, because the area was disgraceful rather than a source of pride. But other people around them bought homes, and using government funds like the 312 program and others they refurbished their own home, and now it's really a showplace.

He's a man of moderate income. He has two small children, 5 and 3 years old, but now his home is one that Good Housekeeping or Better Homes and Gardens could go in and take photographs of as a kind of a showplace. They've done the work themselves. So, there are many options now under Federal programs.

The other thing that's happened is that yesterday, just to illustrate, I was in the Watts area, where in 1965 the whole area was destroyed. It's been rejuvenated. There's a new tone of confidence and commitment among those black people who live there—almost entirely black or Spanish-speaking as well. There's the highest proportion of homeowners in Watts now than any other black community in the Nation. And a lot of it's been brought about by new kinds of government help.

When I campaigned around the country, one of the common things I heard in the ghetto areas of our Nation's cities, was redlining, where lending institutions, banks, savings and loans would say that "In this neighborhood or on this block no loans will be made, no matter what the status of that family might be, no matter what their income might be. We're not going to make any loans in this area," which condemned that part of a city to death. And under the leadership of Bob McKinney, who now heads up the Home Loan Board, that's been prohibited. And we are trying to eliminate redlining around our country.

So, I can't tell you that we have a program in government now or in the future that would let a young couple with a very limited income buy a $70,000 home. But we are trying to do other things that would tailor government programs through guaranteed loans, renovation of old houses, rent supplements for those with very low income, public housing projects where they are needed, Section 212 programs for retired people, older people, high-rise houses or homes in downtown urban areas, like in New York, the renovation of homes that I've just described in Watts—we're trying to have a comprehensive program.

And the last thing I'd like to say is this: Under the leadership of Pat Harris, who happens to be a black woman, head of the Housing and Urban Development Department, we have a group of people who are genuine homebuilders working. They are not there to try to find some excuse not to build homes. They're there to work with knowledge of their past experience on how to rejuvenate these old areas and put people in homes that they own themselves or can afford to rent.

I haven't given you a good answer to your specific question, but that's the best answer I can give. And I believe that over a period of time you will see that the kinds of programs that we are now implementing, with the help of Congress and the enthusiastic administration of the programs that already exist and the new urban policy that's just now beginning to have life, these things collectively will correct a lot of the defects that have long existed in the desire of American people to have a home that they can call their own.

SOVIET INVOLVEMENT IN AFRICA

Q. Mr. President, my name is Steve Rothschild, and I would like to ask you, do you view the recent intervention of Russia and Cuba in Africa as a test of U.S. policy? In other words, what is U.S. policy toward Soviet intervention in Third World nations?

THE PRESIDENT. I think we are holding our own in the so-called peaceful competition with the Soviet Union, in Africa and in other parts of the world. Again, I hate to refer repeatedly to what existed in the past, but I think it's accurate to say that never before in the history of our Nation have we shown any substantial interest in the continent of Africa.

Just a few weeks ago I visited Nigeria, the greatest nation in Africa in many ways—economically, population, vigor, influence, growing influence. There are about 100 million people who live in Nigeria. It's one of the present and future leaders of black Africa. I was the first American President, by the way, in the history of our country who had ever made an official visit to a black African nation.

Two or three years ago when Secretary Kissinger wanted to go and visit Nigeria, the country would not even let him enter that country. But I was received with open arms in a tremendous outpouring of friendship and realization of mutual purpose.

We are trying to do the same thing in other parts of Africa, particularly where the black nations exist. We've got a good advantage in having a man like Andrew Young head our United Nations delegation. He's trusted by black people, not only in Africa but in the Caribbean area, in Latin America, and around the world—also in this country, of course. But just the fact that I appointed him to be our U.N. Ambassador is a demonstration to those people in tangible terms that we care about them for the first time in 200 years.

Now, the Soviets are obviously trying to use their influence in Africa and other parts of the world. In many instances when they have come into a nation that has a changing government, their major input has been weapons, and they are much more easy to buy weapons from than we are. They will supply excessive weapons to countries like Somalia and Ethiopia, in the Horn of Africa, resulting in this instance by an attack on Ethiopia by Somalia with Soviet weapons. Both countries got them from the Soviet Union.

The Soviets have gone into Ethiopia, using Cuban troops to fight against Somalia. I deplore this very much. In the strongest possible terms we have let the Soviets and the Cubans know that this is a danger to American-Soviet friendship and to the nurturing and enhancement of the principle of détente.

The Soviets know very clearly how deeply I feel about this. I've communicated directly with Brezhnev through private, sealed messages. And Cy Vance just came back from Moscow recently, having repeated to the Soviets, "Be careful how you use your military strength in Africa if you want to be a friend of the United States and maintain peace throughout the world."

So, I think that they are mistaken. There's a strong sense of nationalism in Africa. Once the Soviets are there to help with military weapons when a new government is formed, then the people of that country almost invariably want the Soviets to get out and let them run their own affairs.

I think there's an innate racism that exists toward black people within the Soviet Union, as compared to us. We know how to live with white and black people together. We respect each other. We've learned this the hard way. But there's a great deal of appreciation in Africa for this attitude on the part of the United States, as contrasted with the Soviet Union. And there's another very major factor that I mentioned yesterday morning in Denver at the Governor's Prayer Breakfast, and that is that there's a strong sense of religious commitment throughout black Africa and indeed the northern part of Africa as well, Egypt and the others. They may be Arabs, they may be Moslems, they may be Christians or others, but they worship God.

And this is a sense or a mechanism of a feeling of brotherhood and sisterhood that binds us together very strongly. They recognize that the Soviet Union is a Communist and an atheistic nation, and it's a very present concern in the minds and hearts of Africans who, on a temporary basis, will turn to the Soviets to buy weapons because we won't sell the weapons to them.

We come in later with economic aid, with trade, with friendship, with the commitment to democracy and freedom, to human rights, and I believe in the long run our system will prevail. We could compete more directly and effectively with the Soviets on a temporary basis by trying to sell our weapons to every country that calls for them. I don't think that's the right approach.

I'd rather depend on the basic commitment of American people to human rights, to religious commitment and freedom, and to a sense of equality with those people who might be brown or yellow or black, than to depend on the Soviets trying to buy friendship through the sale of destructive weapons designed to kill.

CRIMINAL JUSTICE SYSTEM

Q. Mr. President, I'm George G. Paul, I work at the Veterans Administration Hospital. On April 12, I wrote you a letter giving you five constructive suggestions: one, helping to stabilize the national economy; two, fighting poverty; three, curing illiteracy; four, bringing drug abuse to a standstill; five, other dollar savings by the Federal Government. Because of the time element, I will dwell briefly on the former, helping to stabilize the national economy.

Question: Is it possible to propose a 10-percent surcharge on all fines of misdemeanor court and felony cases? Last year Spokane, with its 180,000 population, grossed over $1 million in fines; 10 percent of that would be over $100,000, or 60 cents per capita.

Using that as a yardstick, you could say that with the national population of over 180 million, we could realize about $108 million. The end result would be a healthier nation, due to more money or less crime—either way the Nation wins. As I see it, the only opposition to this type of program would be the chronic offenders. What's your comment?

THE PRESIDENT. I wish that you would give your mailing address to one of our staff members, Stu Eizenstat, right over here, so that he can send you a copy of the speech that I made yesterday to the Los Angeles Bar Association, where I covered some of those very points that you've just reached.

One of the things that I did describe is that just legal fees paid by corporations last year amounted to $24 billion. A lot of the legislation—I mean, a lot of the litigation involved was unnecessary. And in some of those lawsuits, they've been dragging out 8, 9, 10 years. There was one lawsuit that lasted 30 years, and as you can well see, the people who were involved in a lawsuit to begin with were dead by the time the final decision was made. That's 12 times as much as our society spends on all local, State, and Federal courts.

So, bringing some quality into the entire judicial system and crime control is a very great commitment of my own administration.

Whether to finance it out of a system that you've described is something that I have not addressed, but I will take your recommendation and consider it very carefully.

We were pleased last year to see the overall crime rate drop for the first time in many years. It dropped 4 percent. Perhaps this is an omen of things to come.

One of the reasons that the crime rate did drop, in my opinion, is the much tighter control over the habit-forming drugs that were coming into our country. Under the leadership of Dr. Peter Bourne, who heads up my drug abuse program in the White House, we worked out an agreement with the new President of Mexico, López Portillo, to hold down the production and the distribution in our country of heroin derived from poppies that were being grown in the mountain areas of Mexico. López Portillo is committed to controlling this source of crime in our country as much as I am. So, we worked out with him a means to cut down the opium smuggling into the United States from Mexico by 90 percent. It means now that the opium sold on our city streets is much less pure. It's much more expensive, and just that fact alone has helped to cut down many of the violent crimes.

So, your recommendation that we use money from the court system itself to finance a better criminal justice system is a very good idea. But I would like for you to give your name and address over here so that we can give you a complete analysis of what I hope to do to cut down crime in our country and to make our criminal court system, our entire bar association more responsive to the needs of our people.

Thank you very much.

Stu Eizenstat is over there with his hand up. He can get your name and address.

TUITION TAX CREDITS

Q. Mr. President, my name is Sandra Felix, and I would like to ask you if you would elaborate on why you are opposed to tax credit for college students and specifically what you would foresee doing instead.

THE PRESIDENT. All right. I don't think there's any constitutional prohibition against tax credits at the college level. There is, in my opinion and in the opinion of the Supreme Court, and also the Attorney General, for elementary and secondary schools, because people have to pay taxes to finance those schools.

At the college level, however, I think that a much more effective way to meet the needs of the low-, middle-, and even upper-class families for helping students go to school is to expand the existing programs for grants for those who have low incomes or either a large number of children with a moderate income, loans for students who can pay back those loans after their college tuition time is over. And this concentrates the benefits for a given amount of payment from the Federal Treasury or loss in tax collections exactly among those families who need it most.

Tuition tax credits also don't take into account the problem that a middle-income family has if they have two or three children going to college at the same time. There's only one tuition tax credit for a wage earner, whereas the proposition that I've made to Congress, which is not any more costly but much more effective, would let several children in a given family derive the same benefits with grants, loans, tuition credits, and other aids.

So, for a given amount of loss to the Federal Treasury, you get much more benefit for students and much more benefit for the kind of family, the average American family that needs it most.

I have to admit that the very high income family would derive more help from tuition tax credits, but most American families would not.

I might say I don't know of a single college administrator nor a single State university system leader who favors the tuition tax credit proposal over the one that I've just described to you. Educators at all levels prefer what I've just described. It's better for the taxpayers of our country, it's better for the students involved, it's better for the colleges, it's also better for the families who have to educate those children.

ENHANCED RADIATION WEAPONS

Q. Mr. President, my name is Peter Hammer. I was just going to ask you a question about the neutron bomb.

THE PRESIDENT. Good.

Q. Are you going to scrap it altogether, or are you just maybe delaying it for a while until a better time to bring it out? My second part of that was, I'd like to know where your values are at, with property or with people, because the neutron bomb would have a greater kill value, but it wouldn't hurt the property. Are you for that?

THE PRESIDENT. Good question. Thank you.

As you may know, Peter, a decision to go ahead with the design of the neutron bomb was made before I became President. I didn't know about it until it was published in the newspaper. And at that time I began to assess whether or not we needed to go ahead to produce the neutron weapon itself.

We have a serious problem in Western Europe and Eastern Europe. The Soviet Union has built up a tremendous quantity of tank force, military force of all kinds, nuclear weapons like the SS-20, which is 30 times more destructive than any neutron weapon that we've ever considered, and which has a range of more than a thousand miles, where the range of the kind of neutron weapon we're talking about is only 15 or 20 or 25 miles.

There has never been any thought that neutron weapons, which are not bombs, but either shells or missiles, would be deployed on American soil. They're not feasible at all for use in this country or where Americans live. If ever produced, they would be deployed on the ground or in the lands of the West Germans or the Belgians or other Europeans.

Another factor to make is that if the Soviets did invade, then the lives that would be saved by a weapon with a very narrow destructive area would be West Germans, Belgians, those who live in Holland, perhaps the French, that are our friends and allies. I never had a single European country who told me that if we produced the neutron weapon that they were willing to deploy it.

West German leaders said that, "If other nations in Europe will deploy it, we will." So, that's why I terminated any consideration of the production of the neutron weapon for the time being.

If the Soviets continue to build up their own forces to a degree that increases the threat against the West Europeans, who are our NATO Allies, and we have about 300,000 American soldiers in the Western European area, who would be directly threatened, then I would consider going ahead with the neutron bomb as one of the alternatives that faced me.

I would not want to close that option completely. But there is no plan now to go ahead with the neutron weapon.

I hope that the Soviets will caution themselves and not build up their forces any further. We've also got another negotiation going on with them, Peter, with which you may or may not be familiar, called the mutual and balanced force reductions. We've just for the first time put on the table a list of all the armed forces we have in Western Europe. The Soviets did the same thing for the first time. They put on the table a list of all the armed forces they have in Eastern Europe. And once those inventories are confirmed on both sides, then the next step would be to start reducing the armed force commitment by NATO and the so-called Warsaw Pact on opposite sides of the boundaries between Eastern and Western Europe for the first time.

So, we want peace. We want to eliminate nuclear weapons altogether. We can't leave our country defenseless, and we can only go so far in putting constraints on ourselves until we are sure that the Soviets are willing to meet our constraints.

So far, the Soviets have negotiated in good faith on SALT. We hope for the first time to have a comprehensive test ban, where we eliminate completely the testing of nuclear weapons. We are still testing those right and left. So, another thing that Congress has done recently on the same subject is to pass legislation again for the first time preventing non-nuclear nations from developing explosives, but permitting them to go ahead and produce atomic power.

So, in all aspects of the use of nuclear power, my commitment, as I'm sure is yours, is to reduce the prospect of new atomic weapons on a mutual basis with the Soviets and others and start reducing the inventory of existing nuclear weapons with the ultimate goal, by the American people at least, to eliminate nuclear weapons from the Earth altogether.

NATIONAL HEALTH CARE

Q. Mr. President, my name is Kyra Coffey. And I know what I want to say, first of all, is really unprofessional and un—what am I trying to say?—not really related, but I think you're really cute. I do. [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. You're the first questioner that's made me blush. [Laughter]

Q. Okay. Now I'd like to ask my question. If you're going to reduce the government interference in the lives of the American people as you said, why then are you pushing for a national health care plan which will only increase our income tax and increase our national debt, just as it has in England and Sweden? Thank you.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you. If that was the result of a national health plan, just to increase the burden on the American people financially, I of course would never consider it. Beginning with President Truman's administration, there has been a growing interest and desire among the American people to have a more far-reaching or comprehensive health plan for our Nation.

There would be several emphases in the new plan that don't presently exist, and I'll just mention a few of them.

One is prevention of disease, and not just a commitment to treat an affliction or a disease after it occurs in the human body. Fifteen months ago the immunization program for children, for instance, had almost been completely forgotten. Now with our new CHAPS program, so-called, we are trying to test young people at an early age, 4 or 5 years old, to see what defects they do have, immunize them against prospective diseases for a change, as did occur in my childhood, perhaps in yours, and make sure that the emphasis is on prevention.

The second thing we want to do is to let Americans prepay through a routine monthly payment, for instance, for this kind of care and not just depend upon concerted and very expensive care after they become ill.

We need to get away from the commitment of medical doctors, hospital administrators, even patients, to go into a hospital for treatment when they could get adequate treatment in an out-patient clinic. As you know, many hospital insurance policies won't pay off unless you are admitted to the hospital as a patient.

Obviously, this is more convenient for the doctors perhaps. It's much more profitable for those who own or operate a hospital. You're quite often given services or treatment that you don't need, and of course it makes the expense of hospital care in our country far greater per person than any other nation on Earth, including Sweden, Canada, England, where they do have a more comprehensive health care program.

Another thing that we want to emphasize in the new proposals is the use of paramedical personnel, not just medical doctors. Of course, this care would have to be under the supervision of qualified medical doctors, psychiatrists, and others, but I think that the greater use of licensed practical nurses, registered nurses, laboratory assistants, physicians assistants, and so forth would let this examination-type care and routine treatment in out-patient clinics be much less expensive.

We've seen in recent years an unbelievable explosion in health care costs. Last year, for instance, the hospital costs went up in our country 16 percent. The inflation rate went up about 6 percent. And this has been typical of the last few years.

Our hospital costs for a given degree of treatment has doubled, has been doubling every 5 years, an unbelievable, unwarranted increase in health care costs. We now spend about $6 or $700—I'm not sure of the exact figure—for every man, woman, and child in this country for health care, and we don't nearly have the best health care in the world.

So, I think that a much more effective program can be evolved than the one now. A step in the right direction was Medicaid and Medicare. We've now got health care responsibilities scattered all over the Federal Government. I think to bring that together and have one tight, good administration would be better.

I personally want to keep open the option of the insurance portion being administered by private insurance companies. I don't want to see the Government take over this full responsibility. And I'm also committed to the proposition that individual American citizens would continue to have the right to choose their own family physician. I don't want the Federal Government telling a patient you have to go to that particular physician to get your care.

Another aspect that we are trying to move on is to cut down the cost of drugs and to cut down the cost of all kinds of treatment mechanisms that are very, very expensive. Generic drugs sometimes cost only one-fifth as much as brand-name drugs that are identical in composition, taste, and everything else, including quality.

So, you can see that we've got a very serious problem in our country on health care. But within the bounds that I've just described to you very briefly, I believe that we can evolve over a period of years to be implemented very slowly but very cautiously a comprehensive health care program that the American people would see is not any more costly, is much more effective, and would improve substantially the health of the American people.

Now, where exactly to start the first year, we've not yet decided. It might be on health care for very young people, it might be health care in the case of catastrophic illnesses, where it's far beyond the capability financially of a family. But we'll feel our way very cautiously, but I think the American people are ready for the kind of changes that I've described to you.

OIL SURPLUSES

Q. Mr. President, I'm John Bjork. Reportedly we have an oil glut here on the west coast now, supposedly because of Alaskan oil. Would you support, perhaps on a temporary basis, trading Alaskan oil to Japan and redistributing Middle East oil that would be going to Japan to other parts of our country?

THE PRESIDENT. Since the Alaskan oil began to come down to the mainland, about 1.2 million barrels a day, we've got a surplus of oil on the west coast. Five and a half million to maybe—550,000 to maybe 700,000 barrels of oil extra come into our country daily on the west coast that we are not presently using.

This situation is aggravated by the fact that most of the oil that is produced in California has a high sulfur content called sour oil and is a very low viscosity or thick oil. And the refineries in California for instance are not designed to use the California oil.

What to do about the subject is a question that we've not adequately resolved. One proposal is that there be placed into use an existing pipeline owned by the Sohio Company that presently brings natural gas from Texas, Louisiana fields into California—to change that pipeline into one that can carry oil from the southern part of California into the refineries in Texas-Louisiana-Alabama area. This would let us move that oil where it is needed.

We have now been required by law to take that surplus oil and to transport it to the gulf coast through the Panama Canal, which is a fairly expensive process and which works a financial hardship on the State of Alaska because they have to share in the transportation costs along with the oil companies.

I could not presently route that oil to Japan. The law prohibits it at this point. I believe it was the law that set up the Alaskan pipeline that said that the Alaskan oil had to be used on the mainland of our country. But this is one of the options that we are considering. I think a lot of it depends on how rapidly we can turn the Sohio line around and transport oil across the southern part of our country to the presently existing refineries.

If that should fall through as a proposition, then I think trade for some of the surplus oil on a temporary basis with Japan would be one of the options that we would consider very seriously. I just don't know yet.

Yes, sir?

Q. Mr. President, my name—

THE PRESIDENT. The Japanese want it, by the way.

MENTAL HEALTH PROGRAMS

Q. Mr. President, my name is Stephen Balburg, and I'm concerned about mental health-related issues in our country. I know that your wife is very much involved in mental health throughout the country. I'm especially concerned about possible budgetary cuts or additions within the next fiscal year. Could you comment on what the future is of mental health in regards to those concerns in the next year or two?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. Within the past week I received a report from the mental health study commission that was headed by my wife, who's honorary chairman. She was a very active chairperson, participated in public hearings all over the country, had, I think, 21 people to work with her, representing all elements of the mental health care problem in our country; had a very fine professional doctor, Dr. Tom Bryant, to help her with it.

It's a good report. It advocates a further move toward community health care centers, where mental patients of all kinds could live as well as possible within their own homes or either near their own homes, to continue to cut down the population of mental patients who are in hospitals, mental hospitals, because we know that once they are there, it is an extremely expensive thing for the taxpayers to support them, costing anywhere from $30,000 to $50,000 per patient. To take care of a patient under normal circumstances in a mental health treatment center would cost maybe one-fifth that much or even less.

In Georgia, under my wife's leadership again and with me giving her some aid as Governor, we established a large number of these community health treatment centers. They were supervised by psychiatrists or professional psychologists. But in the process we used a lot of parents or people who had, for instance, a retarded child or a child with some other mental defect. They worked under the supervision there in the center of maybe retired schoolteachers or those who quit teaching to come to work in this kind of environment. Existing social workers joined in to help, volunteers helped, and there was a revitalization of the lives of some of those patients who were quite old, who had been scorned, hidden in the closets or in the basements of homes, or dwelt all their lives, perhaps, in a mental institution.

The thrust of their study, in addition to what I've just described, is again on the prevention of mental illness of all kinds. Research and development will be greatly enhanced. The cohesion of Federal programs that presently are scattered all over the Federal Government into one central organizational structure is another recommendation.

There are in all 117 specific recommendations that have been put to me. My desire is to carry out all of them. And the best lobbyist in the United States will be there with me every day and alongside of me every night to remind me that I have a responsibility to the mentally ill people of this country. So, I think we are going to see a new day in mental health in our Nation.

One of the biggest problems that Rosalynn identified in traveling around the country was the so-called stigma that is attached to people who have mental illnesses. Now, about one out of seven American people need mental treatment. And quite often—even perhaps some of you have been reluctant to admit that those who have suffered in the past or presently suffer from mental illness are good citizens and can be good employees and can be good neighbors.

So, just the acceptance of these people into our arms and into our hearts as those who are worthy, do have a problem, in almost every instance temporary, and can be constructive and good citizens in the future if we care for them, is the main benefit that I believe we'll derive from this study and from the implementation of it.

We know that there must be a close relationship between government at all levels and the private citizenry of our country, but there also must be a close relationship between those who treat physical illnesses and mental illnesses. Quite often the two in a single person are closely interrelated. One becomes physically ill if mentally ill, and vice versa.

So, I believe that because of this study and because of my commitment to carry it out, we're going to see some very good changes made in the months ahead.

Do I have time for another question? I'll take it anyhow. Okay.

CANADA

Q. My name is Mike Huber, and, Mr. President, if Quebec secedes from Canada, would you favor U.S. Statehood for any of the remaining provinces, should they desire it?

THE PRESIDENT. I always make a practice whenever I have a townhall meeting of this kind to avoid answering at least one question—[laughter]—and I think I'll choose your question for that response.

I'll let the Canadian people decide about the cohesion of their great country, and when they make a decision, I'll abide by it.

Let me say in closing this: I've learned a lot today by being with you. I've gotten to know the feeling that you have, and I've become better able to understand the concerns that exist in your mind and the answers to questions that I've not previously made clear to you. It is very difficult for a President, in the limited availability that I have to reach your hearts and minds through the evening news or maybe by news conferences twice a month or brief statements with a fireside chat, to understand you and to let you understand me.

I think this has been a very constructive meeting. You've honored me by inviting me back to Spokane. You live in one of the most beautiful parts of the world. And I always feel better as a President when I return to the White House from a trip like this. I feel closer to you.

I realize again the innate, unchanging greatness of our country, and I am again reminded of the wisdom and judgment and common sense and the natural friendship toward one another that exists among the American people.

It's been a great occasion for me. I thank you from the bottom of my heart.

NOTE: The President spoke at 1:30 p.m. at the Spokane Convention Center.

Commemoration of the Victory at Puebla, Mexico

Statement by the President. May 5, 1978

Today, the fifth of May, is an important holiday for persons of Mexican ancestry.

This commemorates the victory at Puebla, Mexico, in 1862 against the French and symbolizes the freedom of people of Mexican heritage from the yoke of colonialism.

Mexican traditions in America predate the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth Rock. Over the years, these traditions have deeply influenced the life of this country and manifest themselves in the architecture, music, literature, language, family, and customs of America.

On this day of remembrance and celebration, I ask all Americans to join me in extending to our fellow citizens of Mexican heritage warmest greetings for a joyous and festive cinco de mayo!

Equal Employment Opportunity Enforcement

Statement Issued Following the Completion of Congressional Consideration of Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1978. May 6, 1978

In February, I submitted to the Congress a major plan to reorganize the Federal Government's equal employment opportunity enforcement activities. The plan offers a good example of how reorganization can both improve Government competence and also reduce its unnecessary burden on the American people.

The need to reorganize our equal employment programs has been long recognized by both civil rights and business groups alike. Since 1941, when President Roosevelt issued the first Executive order to forbid employment discrimination in the Federal Government, our Nation has taken historic steps to extend equal employment opportunity throughout the private, as well as the public sector.

Each new prohibition has unfortunately brought with it a further fragmentation of administrative responsibility and management. A large number of different departments and agencies have become involved, resulting in needless confusion, paperwork, duplication, and delay.

Under special reorganization authority adopted by Congress last year, the reorganization plan I submitted in February goes into effect today. It replaces a chaotic picture with a coherent and sensible structure.

It will improve enforcement of equal employment opportunities and reduce the burden of equal employment enforcement on business by consolidating the number of agencies involved in this area.

National Advisory Committee for Women

Executive Order 12057. May 8, 1978

By virtue of the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution of the United States of America, and in order to expand the membership of the National Advisory Committee for Women, Section 2 of Executive Order No. 12050 of April 4, 1978 is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Sec. 2. Membership. The President shall appoint not more than forty individuals to serve on the Committee and shall designate a chairperson or co-chairpersons from among the members."

Department of Energy

Nomination of Duane C. Sewell To Be
An Assistant Secretary. May 8, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Duane C. Sewell, of Livermore, Calif., to be Assistant Secretary of Energy for Defense Programs.

Sewell was born August 15, 1918, in Oakland, Calif. He graduated from the College of the Pacific in 1940 and did graduate work in physics at the University of California at Berkeley until his graduate education was interrupted by the war in 1941 and he began work the Manhattan Project.

Sewell returned to Berkeley after the war, and in 1950 became development coordinator for the MTA linear accelerator project involving the Berkeley Radiation Laboratory and the California Research and Development Corp. at Livermore. When the Livermore site of the Radiation Laboratory was founded in 1952, Sewell became a staff member of the director's office, later holding the title director of scientific operations.

Sewell was named associate director for support in 1959, and during the 1960's directed the efforts of more than half the laboratory's staff, those involved in scientific and engineering support. Since 1973 he has been deputy director of the Lawrence Livermore Laboratory.

Inter-American Foundation

Nomination of Four Members of the Board of Directors. May 9, 1978

The President today announced four persons whom he will nominate to be members of the Board of Directors of the Inter-American Foundation. They are:

Alberto Iburguen, of Glastonbury, Conn., for a 6-year term. Iburguen, 34, was born in Puerto Rico. He was a Peace Corps volunteer in Venezuela from 1966 to 1968, and a Peace Corps program and training officer in Colombia from 1969 to 1971. In the summer of 1972 he was acting program director for the Inter-American Foundation. In 1974 and 1975, Iburguen was director of the Puerto Rican Center for Justice. In 1975 and 1976, he was executive director and general counsel of the Connecticut State Elections Commission and lectured at the University of Connecticut Graduate School of Social Work. Since 1977 he has practiced law in Hartford.

Peter T. Jones, of San Francisco, Calif., for a 6-year term. Jones, 48, is senior vice president and general counsel of Levi Strauss and Co. He is a former vice president of Marcor-Montgomery Ward, and of the ITT Latin American Group. From 1961 to 1964, he was deputy to the Secretary of Commerce and Deputy Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Trade Policy and Financial Policy.

Arnold Nachmanoff, of Arlington, Va., for the remainder of the term expiring September 20, 1980. Nachmanoff, 41, is Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Treasury for Developing Nations. He served previously as vice president for investment management of Opportunity Funding Corporation and as associate general manager of the Cooperative Assistance Fund, both nonprofit private corporations engaged in financing economic development ventures in low-income communities throughout the United States. From 1970 to 1971, he was senior staff member for Latin America on the National Security Council staff.

Carolyn Payton, of Washington, D.C., for a 6-year term. Payton, 52, is Associate Director of ACTION. She worked for the Peace Corps from 1964 to 1970, serving as chief field selection officer for Latin America, deputy country director for the Eastern Caribbean, country director for the Eastern Caribbean, and special assistant to the Latin American regional director. From 1970 until her appointment as Associate Director of ACTION in 1977, she was director of the University Counseling Service at Howard University.

The President also announced that on confirmation by the Senate, Jones would be designated Chairman of the Commission, and that Charles Meyer, currently a member of the Commission, will be designated Vice Chairman. Meyer is senior vice president for public affairs of Sears, Roebuck Co.

World Health Assembly at Geneva

*Announcement of the Membership of the U.S. Delegation to the 31st Assembly.
May 9, 1978*

The President today announced the members of the U.S. Delegation to the 31st World Health Assembly at Geneva this month. They are:

Chief delegate:

SECRETARY OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE
JOSEPH CALIFANO

Delegates:

JULIUS B. RICHMOND, Assistant Secretary of HEW

JOHN H. BRYANT, Director-designate, Office of International Health, HEW

Alternate delegates:

ROBERT F. ANDREW, Director, Agency Directorate for Health and Drug Control, Bureau of International Organizations, State Department

LEE M. HOWARD, Director of Health Services, Agency for International Development

WILLIAM J. VANDEN HEUVEL, Representative of the U.S.A. to the European Office of the United Nations, Geneva, Switzerland.

Aldo Moro

Statement on the Death of the Former Italian Prime Minister. May 9, 1978

My sympathies and the sympathies of all Americans go out to Aldo Moro's bereaved family and nation.

His murder is a contemptible and cowardly act. His death advances no cause but that of mindless anarchy. But his life was devoted to building his nation, and his political skills were forever at the service of justice.

He stood for civilization and the rule of law, principles which will always outlive the terrorism that seeks to destroy them.

NOTE: Mr. Moro's body was recovered in central Rome following his murder by members of the Red Brigades, an Italian terrorist organization. The terrorists had abducted him on March 16.

The White House announced that the President sent personal messages of condolence to Mrs. Moro, President Giovanni Leone of Italy, and Prime Minister Giulio Andreotti.

Northern Mariana Islands

Proclamation 4568. May 9, 1978

APPLICATION OF CERTAIN LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES TO THE NORTHERN MARIANA ISLANDS

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

The Northern Mariana Islands, as part of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, are administered by the United States under a Trusteeship Agreement between the United States and the Security Council of the United Nations (61 Stat. 3301). The United States has undertaken to promote the political development of the Trust Territory toward self-government or independence and to protect the rights and fundamental freedoms of its people.

In accordance with those obligations, the United States and the Northern Mariana Islands have entered into a Covenant to Establish a Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in Political Union with the United States of America (Public Law 94-241; 90 Stat. 263). Section 1004(a) of the Covenant provides that if the President finds a provision of the Constitution or laws of the United States to be inconsistent with the Trusteeship Agreement, the application of that provision to the Northern Mariana Islands may be suspended.

Certain provisions of law restrict jury service in Federal District Courts to United States citizens. The vast majority of the inhabitants of the Northern Mariana Islands are not citizens of the United States and consequently may not participate as jurors in proceedings before the United States District Court for the Northern Mariana Islands. They may also be deprived of the right to have their cases heard before juries selected at random from a fair cross-section of their community. These results would be contrary to the obligations assumed by the United States in the Trusteeship Agreement.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, by the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including Section 1004(a) of the Covenant to Establish a Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in Political Union with the United States of America, do hereby find, declare and proclaim as follows:

Any provision of the Constitution or laws of the United States which prescribes United States citizenship as a qualification for service on a grand or petit jury in the District Court for the Northern Mariana Islands, including that provision contained in Section 1865(b)(1) of Title 28 of the United States Code, would be inconsistent with the Trusteeship Agreement if applied to a citizen of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands who is exclusively domiciled, within the meaning of Section 1005(e) of the Covenant, in the Northern Mariana Islands.

Therefore, the application to such individual of any of these provisions is suspended until the termination of the Trusteeship Agreement for the Former Japanese Mandated Islands in the Pacific (61 Stat. 3301).

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this ninth day of May, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

Commodity Futures Trading Commission

Nomination of David G. Gartner To Be a Commissioner. May 9, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate David G. Gartner, of Arlington, Va., to be a Commissioner of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission for a 5-year term. He would replace John Rainbolt, who has resigned.

Gartner was born September 27, 1935, in Des Moines, Iowa. He holds a B.A. from the State University of Iowa and a J.D. from Washington College of Law, American University. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1954 to 1956.

From 1956 to 1959, Gartner was a reporter for the Des Moines Register and Tribune. In 1959 he was assistant to Representative Steven Carter, and in 1960 and 1961, he was assistant to Representative Harold T. Johnson.

Gartner served as assistant to Senator and Vice President Hubert Humphrey from 1961 to 1969, and from 1971 until Humphrey's death earlier this year. Since then Gartner has been administrative assistant to Senator Muriel Humphrey. From 1969 to 1971, Gartner was a law clerk and private consultant.

As assistant to Senator Humphrey, Gartner played a major role in passage of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act of 1974, which established the Commission.

National Historic Preservation Week, 1978

Proclamation 4569. May 10, 1978

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

America's ability to meet the challenges of its third century with confidence and strength will depend upon an appreciation and understanding by the American people of their past.

Among our most important links with the past are the historic sites, structures, and landmarks of earlier times. Together, they form a vast legacy of cultural resources. This legacy, however, is not merely one of monuments, battlefields, and historic buildings. It includes the houses, streets, stores and factories that make up our communities—those familiar places and structures that remind us of the accomplishments, character, and dreams of our forebears.

For our own sake, and for that of future generations of Americans, we must do all that lies within our power to preserve this cultural heritage.

Now, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim the week beginning May 7, 1978, as National Historic Preservation Week. I call upon Government agencies at all levels, interested private individuals and organizations, and Americans everywhere, to mark this observance with appropriate ceremonies and activities in their communities and neighborhoods.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this tenth day of May, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

United States Ambassador to Spain

Nomination of Terence A. Todman. May 10, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Terence A. Todman, of St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to Spain. He would replace Wells Stabler, resigned.

Todman was born March 13, 1926, in St. Thomas, Virgin Islands. He received a B.A. from Inter-American University in Puerto Rico in 1951, and an M.P.A. from Syracuse University in 1952. He served in the U.S. Army from 1945 to 1949.

From 1952 to 1955, Todman was India-Ceylon-Nepal desk officer at the State Department, and from 1955 to 1957, he was a foreign affairs officer in the Bureau of International Organization Affairs there. He served as political officer in New Delhi from 1957 to 1959, and took Arabic language and area training in Beirut in 1960 and 1961.

From 1961 to 1964, Todman was political officer in Tunis. He was Deputy Chief of Mission in Lomé from 1965 to 1968, and alternate country director for East African affairs in 1968 and 1969.

Todman was Ambassador to the Republic of Chad from 1969 to 1972, and to Guinea from 1972 to 1974. From 1974 to 1977, he served as Ambassador to Costa Rica. Since 1977 he has been Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs.

United States Ambassador to the Philippines

*Nomination of Richard W. Murphy.
May 10, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate Richard W. Murphy, of Sumner, Md., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Philippines. He would replace David Newsom, who has been transferred to another post.

Murphy was born July 29, 1929, in Boston, Mass. He received a B.A. from Harvard University in 1951 and an A.B. from Cambridge University in 1953. He served in the U.S. Army from 1953 to 1955.

Murphy was consular and administrative officer in Salisbury from 1955 to 1958 and took Arabic language and area training from 1958 to 1960. He was economic officer in Aleppo from 1960 to 1963, and political officer in Jidda from 1963 to 1966. From 1966 to 1968, he was political officer in Amman.

From 1968 to 1970, Murphy was personnel placement officer, then Assistant Executive Director for personnel, in the Bureau of Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs. In 1970 and 1971, he was Country Director for the Office of Arab Peninsula Affairs. He was Ambassador to Mauritania from 1971 to 1974, and since 1974 has been Ambassador to the Syrian Arab Republic.

Distributive Education Clubs of America

Remarks on Greeting National and State Officers of the Organization. May 11, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. This is a very pleasant sight for me. Most of the time I just see the ones behind me. Sometimes it's pleasant; sometimes it's not. [Laughter]

We've had a very good first 15 or 16 months here in the White House as your President. I want to thank you for your interest in government and for your interest in the system that underlines and underlies and supports our government.

We didn't have distributive education when I was a child and a student in grammar school and high school. The only vocational program we had was in agriculture, and I was a student there. But I learned a lot about marketing and management, merchandising as a student then. I began to sell boiled peanuts when I was 5 years old. [Laughter] It was a lot of hard work, and I very carefully saved my money. And after 3 full years, 4 full years of selling boiled peanuts and not spending any of the money, I had saved up enough in 1933 to buy five bales of cotton. Cotton got down to 5 cents a pound; peanuts were only 1 cent a pound.

I bought five bales of cotton, and I kept it until it went up to 18 cents. Then I sold that as a high school student, and I bought five houses. I bought five houses for $800 total. Every month I would go around on my bicycle. Some of them were in the country, some of them were in Plains, in the metropolitan area. [Laughter] The total rent off all five houses was $16.

I learned then how important it was for me to participate in the free enterprise system. I probably could not have defined it then, but the more I've lived and the more I've learned about our great country, the more I see that what you do and the other 185,000 members of DECA do is illustrative of the crucial difference between our own system of government and our system of marketing, merchandising, as contrasted to the so-called planned economies of the Socialist and Communist nations.

You represent freedom in its finest sense—the right of an individual to make one's own decision about a lifestyle and a life commitment, a willingness to participate in building the strength of our Nation without unwarranted government intrusion or government interference in the making of decisions on a daily basis, or even more often.

And I'm very proud of what you do to contribute to our country. I hope that you will continue to expand your own interests outside of a fairly narrowly defined commitment just in the grammar school, high school, or college classroom area, even extend it.

I know in Georgia, for instance, the distributive education students have taken on a special project of exposing and helping to control shoplifting, a very strong contribution to controlling crime in our country. There might be equivalent opportunities in all the States of our Nation.

I am also aware of how good your own experience in distributive education pays off in your own life. Ninety percent of all the distributive education students go on beyond high school to a higher education. I wish this was the case with all students in our country; it's not. And so you've set an example in that respect as well and give your own present life and your own future families an opportunity that you wouldn't otherwise have, not just to make a higher income but to have a life that's more exciting, more challenging, more compatible with the finest aspects of our country.

I wish the Rose Garden was large enough to hold all 6,000 delegates—no, I don't. [Laughter] Let me say as an alternative, I hope that you will relay my best wishes to all the 6,000 delegates who are at the convention and to the other 180,000, who are back home looking to you for leadership presently and in the future.

But as President of our great country, I'm proud to welcome you to the White House, to the center of our Government. And I know that the group of Members of Congress behind me and many more like them who have joined in an additional commitment to making sure that your program is well formed, well financed, and well publicized, and that the beneficial aspects of it are enhanced, join me in congratulating you on a superb achievement in your own life already. And best wishes for an even greater life, leading to an even greater country in the years ahead.

Thank you very much.

HARRY A. APPLGATE. Mr. President, ever since Congress created attention to this instructional phase of education, we believe we have met the challenge with a very successful program. But the uniqueness of it has been our insistence on cooperation and placement with the private sector. We continue a national advisory board, which consists of representatives of some 60 major corporations in the Nation, and we continue a congressional advisory board, with some 30 Members of the Senate and the House, continuing to help guide and direct us in that effort.

It is our pleasure to be here this morning. And on behalf of the delegation and the national officers, we sincerely appreciate your interest and your show of support. It's our pleasure to be here.

I would like to introduce to you our national president, Ken Conner, who has a presentation to make.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you, Mr. Applegate.

MR. CONNER. Mr. President, on behalf of the 180,000 Distributive Education Clubs of America members across the country, we'd like to present you with this official DECA cardigan. Since you have brought the cardigan back into style lately—[laughter—we thought it would be appropriate, and we hope that you will wear it with our support.

We also appreciate the support that your administration has given us, and we hope to continue that support in the years to come.

Thank you very much.

THE PRESIDENT. This might inspire me to make another fireside chat. [Laughter]

I might say that it would be a mistake for me to lose an opportunity again to emphasize the crucial support and the staunch support in the Congress for your program. And I believe that the presence here of many of the key Members of the Congress this morning is indicative of that support. I know how much it means to me to have their experience, their background, and their strong partnership in trying to shape a greater country. And I particularly want to thank the Members of Congress for being here.

And, Ken, this is a gift that I will wear with pride and appreciation. It will be a constant reminder to me of what you all mean to me personally and what you mean to our country, now and in the future.

Thank you very much again.

You all have a good time in Washington.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:15 a.m. in the Rose Garden at the White House. Harry A. Applegate is executive director of the Distributive Education Clubs of America, and Robert Kenneth Conner is president of the organization's high school division.

Mother's Day, 1978

Proclamation 4570. May 11, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

Motherhood is a lifelong commitment.

It is a promise to share in fulfilling all the unique potential of a helpless newborn child, and to shape that person into an independent, responsible adult. For some, motherhood means guiding bright minds, strong bodies, and exquisite talents—maintaining a delicate balance between humanity and the special gifts of God. For others, motherhood means helping a weak body or an unawakened mind overcome burdens that may often seem too great to bear. For both, motherhood brings the privilege of seeing the tired world through fresh eyes and the satisfaction of knowing that one has met another's needs in a way no other could.

To the mothers of America, in recognition of their achievements in the art of raising a new generation of Americans and as an acknowledgment of all they have done to shape our national character, the Congress, by joint resolution of May 8, 1914 (38 Stat. 770; 36 U.S.C. 141), has set aside the second Sunday in May of each year as a day of special tribute.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby request that Sunday, May 14, 1978, be observed throughout our nation as Mother's Day. I ask all Americans to take this opportunity to express their personal gratitude to their own mothers and to thank all those women whose tireless devotion to their families has so enriched our nation.

I ask all public officials to display the flag of the United States on all government buildings and urge all Americans to display our flag at their homes or other suitable places on that day as a public expression of our love for the mothers of our country.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this eleventh day of May, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

Federal Statistical System

*Memorandum From the President.
May 11, 1978*

*Memorandum for the Heads of Executive
Departments and Agencies*

Subject: Review of the Federal Statistical System

I have directed my Reorganization Project staff to perform a comprehensive review of the organization of the system that collects, evaluates and disseminates statistical data for the Federal government.

This Nation has the most accurate and efficient statistical system in the world. But a number of persistent problems—including the burden placed upon respondents and the responsiveness of data to policy needs—indicate a pressing need to improve the coordination of Federal statistical activities, which are growing at an increasing rate.

The study will use to the maximum extent the work that has been done in previous efforts. During the course of the study the project staff will be seeking the advice and support—including staff assistance and other resources—of many of the agencies that are part of our statistical system. I trust you will cooperate to the fullest extent possible. In addition to Federal agencies, the project will need the advice and counsel of the Congress, State and local governments and the public.

To ensure that all affected parties are informed, I have directed that this memorandum be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

Industrial Innovation

Announcement of Establishment of an Interagency Committee. May 11, 1978

The President announced today that he has established an interagency committee to conduct a comprehensive review of issues and problems related to industrial innovation. Substantial public involvement—including industry, small business, labor, and consumers—is planned.

Innovation provides a basis for the Nation's economic growth. It is closely related to productivity and to the competitiveness of U.S. products in domestic and world markets. Efforts to enhance innovation in industry may lead to an improved economic climate in the United States.

In recent years, private sector research and development has concentrated on low-risk, short-term projects directed at improving existing products. Emphasis on the longer term research that could lead to new products and processes has decreased.

Although the development of new products or processes is primarily the responsibility of the private sector in the United States, Federal policies have a profound impact on the innovation process. In light of the central role of innovation in economic development, Federal policies on the economy, taxes, regulations, procurement, and foreign relations which affect innovation will be carefully examined in the study.

The review will be accomplished under the procedures established by the Domestic Policy Review system and is to make its recommendations within 14 months. The interagency committee will be chaired by the Secretary of Commerce. Other members include the Secretaries of Defense, Treasury, HEW, and Energy, the Attorney General, the Administrator of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, the Director of the National Science Foundation, the Director of OMB, the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, the Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, the Special Representative for Trade Negotiations, and the Science and Technology Adviser to the President.

President's Export Council

Appointment of Emile R. Bussiere and Mark Hasten as Members. May 11, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of two persons as members of the President's Export Council. They are:

EMILE R. BUSSIERE, of Manchester, N.H., an attorney and owner of a real estate company; MARK HASTEN, of Indianapolis, co-owner of an Indiana health care company providing nursing care in six communities.

The Export Council was established by Executive order in 1973 to advise the President on matters relating to export trade. It has 22 members and is part of the Commerce Department.

Appointments Secretary to the President

Appointment of Phillip J. Wise, Jr. May 11, 1978

Phil Wise, named today as Appointments Secretary to the President, moves to that position from his work as Deputy Appointments Secretary.

Wise, 27, is a native of Plains, Ga., and is a 1973 graduate of the Georgia Institute of Technology, from which he holds a B.S. in industrial management.

Wise was assistant director of the Georgia intern program from June 1973 until January 1975. The program annually designed and coordinated more than 600 internships in State government for Georgia college students.

He joined the Carter Presidential campaign in January 1975, became the campaign's Florida field coordinator in June 1975, and remained in the Florida position until the March 9, 1976, primary.

Wise subsequently was the campaign's field coordinator for the States of Wisconsin, Maryland, and New Jersey, and worked in the Pennsylvania campaign. During the general election, he was coordinator of the campaign in the Southern States.

Wise worked in the Carter-Mondale transition office, and later traveled extensively in Europe before being named Deputy Appointments Secretary in August 1977.

Deputy Appointments Secretary to the President

*Appointment of Frances M. Voorde.
May 11, 1978*

The President today announced the appointment of Fran Voorde as Deputy Appointments Secretary. She has served since January 1977, as Director of Scheduling at the White House.

Voorde, 38, was born in South Bend, Ind. She is a graduate of St. Mary's College, Notre Dame, where she received a B.A., and of George Washington University, where she received an M.A. in history and diplomatic history.

From 1961 to 1964, she worked as personal and appointments secretary to Representative J. Edward Roush, and from 1965 to 1971, she was executive secretary to Senator Birch Bayh. She served as director of scheduling and assistant political director in Bayh's 1971 Presidential campaign. She was scheduling and advance coordinator in Sargent Shriver's 1972 Vice-Presidential campaign.

Voorde was assistant chief of the Office of Records and Registration of the U.S. House of Representatives from 1972 to 1975, and from 1975 to 1976, she was a special assistant in the Office of Disclosure and Compliance of the Federal Election Commission.

In August of 1976 she served as deputy director of the office of voter registration at the Democratic National Committee. She joined the Carter campaign in September of 1976 as director of scheduling and advance.

Department of Justice

Nomination of Philip B. Heymann To Be an Assistant Attorney General. May 11, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Philip B. Heymann, of Belmont, Mass., to be an Assistant Attorney General. He would replace Benjamin Civiletti, who has been appointed Deputy Attorney General.

Heymann was born October 30, 1932, in Pittsburgh, Pa. He received a B.A. from Yale University in 1954 and an LL.B. from Harvard Law School in 1960. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1955 to 1957.

From 1961 to 1965, Heymann was a trial attorney in the Office of the Solicitor General at the Justice Department. He was at the Bureau of Security and Consular Affairs at the State Department from 1965 to 1967, serving as Deputy Administrator, then Acting Administrator.

In 1967 Heymann was Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for the Bureau of International Organizations, and from 1967 to 1969, he was executive assistant to the Under Secretary of State. During 1969 Heymann was with the Legal Aid Agency of the District of Columbia.

Since 1969 Heymann has been a professor of law at Harvard Law School. In the summers of 1973, 1974, and 1975, he was associate prosecutor and consultant to the Watergate Special Prosecution Force.

Nuclear Non-Proliferation

Executive Order 12058. May 11, 1978

FUNCTIONS RELATING TO NUCLEAR NON-PROLIFERATION

By virtue of the authority vested in me by the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 (Public Law 95-242, 92 Stat. 120, 22 U.S.C. 3201) and the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended (42 U.S.C. 2011 et seq.), and Section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code, and as President of the United States of America, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. Department of Energy. The following functions vested in the President by the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 (92 Stat. 120, 22 U.S.C. 3201), hereinafter referred to as the Act, and by the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended (42 U.S.C. 2011 et seq.), hereinafter referred to as the 1954 Act, are delegated or assigned to the Secretary of Energy:

(a) That function vested by Section 402(b) of the Act (92 Stat. 145, 42 U.S.C. 2153a).

(b) Those functions vested by Sections 131a(2)(G), 131b(1), and 131f(2) of the 1954 Act (92 Stat. 127, 42 U.S.C. 2160).

(c) That function vested by Section 131f(1)(A)(ii) of the 1954 Act to the extent it relates to the preparation of a detailed generic plan.

SEC. 2. Department of State. The Secretary of State shall be responsible for performing the following functions vested in the President:

(a) Those functions vested by Sections 104(a), 104(d), 105, 403, 404, 407, and 501 of the Act (92 Stat. 122, 123, 123, 146, 147, 148, and 148, 22 U.S.C. 3223(a), 3223(d), 3224, and 42 U.S.C. 2153b, 2153c, 2153e, and 22 U.S.C. 3261).

(b) That function vested by Section 128a(2) of the 1954 Act (92 Stat. 137, 42 U.S.C. 2157(a)(2)).

(c) That function vested by Section 601 of the Act to the extent it relates to the preparation of an annual report.

(d) The preparation of timely information and recommendations related to the President's functions vested by Sections 126, 128b, and 129 of the 1954 Act (92 Stat. 131, 137, and 138, 42 U.S.C. 2155, 2157, and 2158).

(e) That function vested by Section 131c of the 1954 Act (92 Stat. 129, 42 U.S.C. 2160(c)); except that, the Secretary shall not waive the 60-day requirement for the preparation of a Nuclear Non-Proliferation Assessment Statement for more than 60 days without the approval of the President.

SEC. 3. Department of Commerce. The Secretary of Commerce shall be responsible for performing the function vested in the President by Section 309(c) of the Act (92 Stat. 141, 42 U.S.C. 2139a).

SEC. 4. Coordination. In performing the functions assigned to them by this Order, the Secretary of Energy and the Secretary of State shall consult and coordinate their actions with each other and with the heads of other concerned agencies.

SEC. 5. General Provisions. (a) Executive Order No. 11902 of February 2, 1976, entitled "Procedures for an Export Licensing Policy as to Nuclear Materials and Equipment," is revoked.

(b) The performance of functions under either the Act or the 1954 Act shall not be delayed pending the development of procedures, even though as many as 120 days are allowed for establishing them. Except where it would be inconsistent to do so, such functions shall be carried out in accordance with procedures similar to those in effect immediately prior to the effective date of the Act.

Budget Rescission and Deferrals

Message to the Congress. May 12, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, I herewith report one proposal to rescind $30.0 million in budget authority previously provided by the Congress. In addition, I am reporting four new deferrals of budget authority totalling $55.1 million and two revisions to previously transmitted deferrals increasing the amount deferred by $0.7 million in budget authority.

The rescission proposal affects the Department of Agriculture's drought and flood assistance program. The new deferrals and revisions to existing deferrals involve programs in the Departments of Commerce, Energy, and the Interior, the Corps of Engineers, and the International Communication Agency.

The details of the rescission proposal and the deferrals are contained in the attached reports.

United Nations Trusteeship Council

Appointment of Stoney Cooks as U.S. Representative to the 45th Session. May 12, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of Stoney Cooks as Representative of the United States to the 45th Session of the Trusteeship Council of the United Nations, to be held in New York from May 15 to June 9.

Cooks, 35, is executive assistant to U.N. Ambassador Andrew Young. From 1972 to 1977, he was administrative assistant to then-Congressman Young. From 1970 to 1972, he was executive director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

National Council on Educational Research

Nomination of Five Members. May 12, 1978

The President today announced five persons whom he will nominate to be members of the National Council on Educational Research. They are:

ALONZO A. CRIM, of Atlanta, superintendent of the Atlanta public schools, adjunct professor at the University of Georgia and Atlanta University, and educational consultant;

BETSY LEVIN, of Chapel Hill, N.C., professor of law at Duke University and specialist in legal aspects of education and educational finance;

CARL H. PFORZHEIMER, JR., of Purchase, N.Y., senior partner in Carl H. Pforzheimer & Co., in New York City, and vice chancellor of the New York State Board of Regents;

CATHERINE STIMPSON, of Bellingham, Wash., a schoolteacher and member of the board of trustees of Whatcom Community College;

WILSON C. RILES, of Sacramento, Calif., superintendent of public instruction for the State of California.

Middle East Arms Sales

Letter to Members of Congress. May 12, 1978

The motion in the Senate next Monday to block all of the proposed aircraft sales to Israel, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia presents a vital test of our national purpose. In the hours before the Senate votes, it is my duty as President to draw attention to the powerful reasons supporting each of the sales and the dire consequences of rejecting them.

Our basic goal is to secure peace, stability, and harmonious relations among the nations of the Middle East. Since becoming President, I and my chief foreign policy advisers have spent more of our time and effort on this subject than any other foreign policy issue.

The number of aircraft proposed for each of the countries has been carefully considered to insure a regional balance, but the decision before the Senate transcends the particular transactions.

The choice is stark and fundamental. Shall we support and give confidence to those in the Middle East who work for moderation and peace? Or shall we turn them aside, shattering their confidence in us and serving the cause of radicalism?

It is my considered judgment that the aircraft sales to Egypt are essential to enable President Sadat to continue his efforts for peace. At great personal and political risk, President Sadat has taken an initiative which has created the best prospects for peace in the Middle East in three decades. With similar risks, he has turned away from a relationship with the Soviet Union and placed his trust in the United States.

To reject the proposed aircraft sale to Egypt would be a breach of that trust. Such a rejection would be a devastating blow to President Sadat, to the military forces of Egypt, to the people of Egypt, and to the forces of moderation in the Middle East.

Saudi Arabia has become a firm friend of the United States. As its influence dramatically expands in the world, Saudi Arabia has been not only a firm supporter of the peace process but a moderating and conciliatory force on a wide range of global issues.

It is beyond challenge that the Saudi air defense system must be modernized and augmented. The United States has an opportunity through these proposed sales to enhance its relationship with the Saudis as they take these vital steps to defend themselves against their radical neighbors armed by the Soviet Union. But I must tell you with great gravity that it is an opportunity that we will quickly lose if we do not grasp it immediately.

If the Saudis are forced to turn elsewhere to meet their defense needs, it will unquestionably impair the peace process. Moreover, the erosion of confidence will inevitably have a far broader—and adverse—impact on the wide range of issues on which we have been working in close harmony.

The aircraft sales to Israel are a reflection of our strong and unshakeable commitment to the security of Israel. The American people fully understand that our commitment to Israel's survival and security is total, unequivocal, and firmly fixed in our national policy.

The long-term interests of Israel are served by the proposed sales to Egypt and Saudi Arabia. It is in Israel's interest to encourage the forces of moderation in the Middle East, and to promote their close relationship with the United States. It would not serve Israel's interest if we were to fail to keep bi-partisan commitments, made by the prior Administration as well as by mine, to provide aircraft for the defense of Saudi Arabia. It would be against Israel's interest if moderate nations are brushed aside by the United States, opening vast possibilities for the intrusion of hostile influences.

In the end, the national interest of the United States is the issue. On the basis of the most careful and serious analysis of all factors, I am convinced that the proposed sales will enhance U.S. national objectives, contribute to our national security, and promote peace in the Middle East.

Interview With the President

*Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session
With Representatives of the Hispanic Media. May 12, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. Hi, everybody. Thank you very much.

Ordinarily, I start out my meeting with the editors from around the country by emphasizing the most important things that we are addressing at the current moment, just to illustrate what a President does, and then I'll spend all the time that we have available answering your questions.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES

The most important issue to me right now and for the next few days, by far, is the Middle East arms sales question. We've got, I think, the interest of our own Nation at stake. As you know, one of the most important issues involved in the Mideast arms sales is what will happen to our relationship with President Sadat.

He has taken a worldwide, preeminent stand in searching for peace in the Middle East, at great danger to himself politically. He's separated himself from a dependence on the Soviet Union concerning weapons sales to defend Egypt—not against Israel, in particular, but against some of his African neighbors. And I think if the Mideast arms sales proposal is rejected, it would be a terrible blow to President Sadat in his own country and to our relationships with him.

And as you know, both I and my predecessors here on a bipartisan basis have a longstanding commitment to the Saudi Arabians and to the Israelis for this relatively modest arms sales package.

The Saudis had a choice given to them by President Ford and Secretary Kissinger on what type of plane they wanted. They chose the more defensive configuration on the F-15 and the more defensive weapon, which is the F-15, compared to the F-16, primarily an offensive plane.

We consider this a very important issue. I think it's in Israel's best interest to have us be trusted and have friendship with the moderate Arab leaders. We don't want to drive them away from us, to have to turn to some other source of supply for legitimate defensive capability.

My commitment to reduce on an annual basis our total conventional arms sales will be carried out. And we've initiated this past few days, for the first time, direct bilateral negotiations with the Soviet Union, trying to bring them into harmony with us in cutting down on the total quantity of conventional weapons sold around the world.

We've got many other problems that we are addressing now. I'd say the most important domestic issue, overwhelmingly, in the minds of the American people, the Congress, and myself, is to control inflation.

We've had remarkable success, unprecedented and unanticipated success in cutting down on the unemployment rate the last 16 months. We've added a net total of 5½ million jobs since I've been in office, because of the good work of the Congress and a very good working relationship with the private sector and the natural inclination of American people of all kind to work if they have a chance to hold a job.

The unemployment rate, as you know, has dropped about 2 percent. But the first 4 months of this year, we've had disturbing reports on inflation trends which really hurt the poor and the fixed income, the retired, the lower wage level workers in our country more than anyone else.

And we are trying to get the private sector, both professional people—accountants, doctors, lawyers, others—to hold down on their own salary increases, their charges.

I met with the retail merchants of the country, the American Federation of Retail Merchants, this week. I met with the leaders of the labor movements this week, and last week met with the leaders of the business community, to try to get them to join with us not with wage and price controls, mandated, but with a voluntary commitment on their part to cut down on the rate of increase of wages and prices, other charges, below what it was the last 2 years.

In other words, '78 would be lower than the average of the last 2 years—not a difficult thing for them to do if we all work in harmony.

Each group, I think, has some concern about what everybody else is going to do. Nobody wants to make a unilateral effort at some sacrifice to them if they think the Government is going to go ahead and spend too much money or the deficit is going to grow, or labor is not going to help if they don't think business will help also. So, I think we can make some progress there.

We are trying to deal with the Federal bureaucracy, which is a difficult thing for any administrator. And I think our civil service reform proposal is a keystone to all the reorganization that I will do while I'm in office.

It also is crucial in the employment of minority American citizens and also women. As you know, we have a very low percentage of Spanish-speaking Americans who are employed by the Federal Government. We have a very low percentage of other minority groups and also women who are employed by the Federal Government.

And the major obstacle to improving this record is the ancient civil service laws that won't let a qualified person be employed. Now, for instance, if we have an opening in Houston, Texas, and a Mexican American citizen scored a hundred on the test, they might very well be 50th on the list of people to get the job because of many reasons, one of which is veterans preference.

I happen to be a veteran and there are tens of millions of Americans who are also veterans like myself. But I see no reason for a person who serves 20 years in the Navy, who retires as a commander, who has a very good retirement income guaranteed for life, to come in and bump a person off the employment list for a Federal job just because he served, to his advantage, in the Navy.

We are preserving the veterans preference for those who have served within the last 10 years. This would take care of all those who have served in the Vietnam war, and for those who are disabled.

So, I would say those three items right now are the things that are most important to me—the Mideast arms sales over this weekend and Monday morning in the Senate, the civil service reform, and dealing with the inflation problem.

I won't take any further time. And I might say I came in a little bit late because I was busy on the telephone, but I'll make the time up to you. And I would like to finish, after I've been in here 25 minutes, so that—if you don't have any objection—I can get a photograph with each one of you.

QUESTIONS

SOVIET-CUBAN INFLUENCE IN AFRICA

Q. Mr. President, what does the United States plan to do in practice to denounce and to counter the Soviet-Cuban influence in Africa, besides your warnings?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, when you say besides the warnings, that covers a lot of territory. I have let Brezhnev know directly from me to him, plus through his own Ambassador and Secretary of State Vance when he was there, that the Soviets' continuation of intrusion into Africa with military forces was a major obstacle to trust on the part of the American people that the Soviets want peace and want to have a successful détente effort.

We have aroused as much as we can the developing nations' and the non-aligned nations' leaders to intercede with the Soviets and with Cuba. I think that we've done the best we could among the African nations, particularly the black African nations, to let them know that they are capable and ought to be granted the right to settle their own disputes among themselves. We've done all we could to strengthen the Organization of African Unity and encourage the leaders therein to move aggressively to resolve the disputes that might exist among African people, among themselves, and not call on the Cubans or the Soviets from outside to take a stand.

You might get from Jody, in order to save time now, a more lengthy and definitive answer that I gave at the townhall meeting in Portland [Spokane] this week, where I went into some detail about the Soviets' normal operating procedure. If there is a dispute in a country, unfortunately, they will provide weapons much more quickly and eagerly than will we. And for a limited period of time, they are able to get some influence in that country because of that supply of weapons. But on the long-term basis, I think that our own relationship with them, with the African people, our absence of racism against black people now, our commitment to economic aid rather than military aid, would be a very significant factor.

The other thing that is important is religion. The Soviets are atheistic, and most of the leaders in Africa are deeply religious people. They may be Christian, they may be Moslem, or otherwise. But I think they have a natural distrust of atheists.

So, all those points, you know, are pertinent. But we let the Soviets know that although we want to have peace with them, we're willing to compete peacefully, we're not afraid of them, our military strength will be maintained, their intrusion into Africa is both unnecessary, unwarranted, and tends to convince the American people that the Soviets are not sincere in their commitment to détente and their search for peace.

UNDOCUMENTED ALIENS; ECONOMIC CONDITIONS IN MEXICO

Q. Mr. President, your proposals for controlling the illegal immigration have been criticized by Latino groups on several points. One of the main criticisms, however, is that the immigration package is a series of palliatives which will do little to attack the fundamental causes of that illegal immigration, that is, underdevelopment in these so-called sending countries, particularly in Latin America. Now, the question is, why does your immigration package say so little about economic development in Mexico and the rest of Latin America? And as a followup to that, what specifically will you be doing in the future to correct the apparent or at least perceived shortcomings?

THE PRESIDENT. To answer your question very briefly, the Judiciary Committees, which are responsible for legislation concerning undocumented workers, are not charged with economic development in a foreign country. The legislation specifically is not related to economic development, so you can't put it in the same legislative proposal. But we are working very hard with the Mexicans—for instance, myself with López Portillo; we've been together a couple of times. My wife has been down there to spend time with López Portillo. Secretary Vance has just recently returned; Mike Blumenthal has just come back from Mexico City.

We've had delegations formed, as a result of my meetings with López Portillo around this table, representing our Department of Commerce, our Treasury Department, Agriculture Department, State Department, to work with his Ministers on enhancing the economic prospects in Mexico for the future. We've been very supportive of Mexico, in addition, in their need for developing products to export. Petroleum products is a major example; agricultural products is another.

We've tried to reduce the obstacles at the borders for the free trade that ought to exist between our countries that would help economically. We've also tried to help Mexico qualify for and we've been supportive of Mexico's needs for long-range loans from the World Bank and the Regional Banks, the IMF.

So, we're very much aware that the permanent solution, or at least partial solution to the undocumented workers' problem is better economic conditions in Mexico. The reason that we haven't combined that facet in the undocumented workers legislation is that that goes to the Judiciary Committee, which has no responsibility for economic development.

CUBAN INVOLVEMENT IN AFRICA

Q. Mr. President, appealing to the principle of open policy in your administration, what options do we have to stop this outrageous escalation of Communist troops in Africa? Also, what options do we have to terminate this type of situation emanating from Communist Cuba?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as you know, I have let it be clear that we want better relationships with Cuba. But the unnecessary and excessive use of military force by Castro all over the African continent, to some degree, lately, in the Middle East, like in South Yemen, has indicated to me that he has not abandoned the interest that Cuba has to subvert other (government)<sup>1</sup> people through military means.

As you know, he was unsuccessful in doing so in South America, although he made a strong effort there and in Central America. And now I think he's moved his emphasis to Africa.

There is no possibility that we would see any substantial, further improvement in our relationship with Cuba as long as he's committed to this military intrusion policy in the internal affairs of African people.

There's no doubt in my mind that

Cuba is used by the Soviet Union as surrogates in several places in Africa. Castro, instead of reducing troop placements in Africa, has grossly increased the number of troops in several countries in Africa recently. Our information, which I think is accurate, is that in many instances he offers additional troops to countries that refuse them.

So, we have no diplomatic relations with Cuba, as you know, we have trade offices only. And we have let—I don't communicate directly with Castro—but we have let him know through people who go from here to Cuba and through other means about our strong opposition to his policy.

My information, also, is that the Cuban troop losses in Africa have recently been quite high. And I'm not sure that the Cuban people know how severe the loss of life is among Cuban troops that are sent to Angola, nor the ones sent to Ethiopia. But we try to influence Castro to be more peaceful in his foreign policy, to refrain from sending Cuban troops enthusiastically everywhere he can in Africa, not only through our public statements but also through nonaligned leaders and developing countries.

I think the Cuban leaders would like to have the image of being a nonaligned country, but that's obviously an absolutely ridiculous claim, because there is no other country that acts in harmony with and under the domination of the Soviets any more than the Cubans do. They're completely aligned with the Soviets, and where most of the nonaligned countries seek peace and peaceful settlements of disputes, the Cubans are at the forefront of the cutting edge of providing military forces in areas of Africa, for instance, wherever they possibly can find an opening.

So, I think in every one of these respects, Castro is acting contrary to peace-full settlements of disputes that are inevitable in Africa. And that is an obstacle to any further progress between us and Cuba as far as peace is concerned.

UNEMPLOYMENT RATE OF SPANISH-SPEAKING AMERICANS

Q. Mr. President, the unemployment rate in the United States has declined an extent, to 6 percent, and yet in the Spanish-speaking community, the Hispanic community, this has risen to 10 percent. What do you propose specifically to remedy this situation?

THE PRESIDENT. My information is a little bit different from yours. You said "has risen to 10 percent." My information is that in the last 16 months, the unemployment rate among Spanish-speaking Americans has actually dropped. It is still 10 percent, approximately. But I think it has come down since I've been in office. That is a continuing problem for us. When I talk about inflation control, I'm obviously not abandoning our permanent commitment to getting the unemployment rate down.

Among, probably, teenage Spanish-speaking Americans, it would probably be 30, 35, 40 percent. One of the results of a general lowering of unemployment rate in the country is that we can focus the existing Federal programs more and more accurately on those who are more difficult to employ or who have the hardest time getting a job.

As you know, minority citizens, young people are the last ones hired and the first ones fired. And when we have a Government program, either in the CETA programs or, say, a local works program, and a large number of all kinds of Americans are unemployed and the competition is there, quite often the minority citizen doesn't get a good chance to get a job.

However, if the unemployment rate in general is reduced, then we can focus those Government-supported programs much more accurately upon the minority citizens and young people. So, I think that this is a good prospect now for there to be a more rapid decrease in the unemployment rate among those for whom you are concerned. And the last month's figures showed a substantial improvement in the unemployment rate among Spanish-speaking citizens, black citizens, and young people, in particular.

TEMPORARY WORK PERMITS

Q. Mr. President, agricultural labor leaders in agriculture are fearful that this year you're going to allow a tremendous increase in temporary worker permits in the agricultural fields this summer, such as you did last year in Texas. And you are under tremendous pressure from growers to waive some of the requirements. What is your feeling on that? Are you going to allow temporary worker permits, either under the H-2 or bracero program or what have you?

THE PRESIDENT. We made it clear when we sent up the legislation to Congress that we don't intend to expand the H-2 program or to put in any sort of bracero program and so forth.

Those permits would be handled under existing law, basically the same policy that we have followed, administered by the Secretary of Labor. If a dispute comes up about a particular decision, as far as the legality of it is concerned, as has been the case in the past, the Secretary of Labor would turn to the Attorney General for advice. But we have no plans to expand that program.

WHITE HOUSE NEWS SUMMARY

Q. Mr. President, I happened to notice this morning that the news summary that you receive every morning did not contain any items from the Hispanic media. We asked the question as to why that was, and we were told there apparently wasn't a staffer in the White House who could cull the information from the Hispanic media. Would you feel inclined to include items from the Hispanic media in the future in the White House News Summary?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I would.

Q. I think that would be important.

THE PRESIDENT. On occasion, by the way, there are excerpts from the Spanish media. I would say in an average day, we get excerpts from 40—I'm just guessing—40 sources. You could take today's little summary as a typical one. We don't use the same newspapers every day; we don't use the same editorial sources every day.

We do use all three networks and summarize their evening news program, and we do use the lead stories from AP and UPI. That's the only thing that's included every day.

The rest of the time they come from a very wide range of sources, sometimes little tiny newspapers, sometimes Spanish—Hispanic-American newspapers, sometimes black-owned newspapers. But I think we could use more information from the Spanish-speaking community.

PRESIDENTIAL ASSISTANT FOR HISPANIC AMERICAN CONCERNS

Q. Mr. President, are you now favorably disposed or could you be favorably disposed to appointing a Presidential assistant with a staff to look after Latino concerns in this country?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I've got Joe Aragon here who's a top assistant in the White House, who is a very fine spokesman, but I'm not inclined to set up a special office in addition to what I already have, no.

Q. He says that only 5 percent of his time is directly related to Latino concerns, and Latinos have no place else to go except to Joe.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I wouldn't say that. I don't know if you all have a list of all the people in the Federal Government who are concerned with Latin American problems, but I don't have any administrators on the White House staff, zero.

These administrative decisions are made within the Immigration Service, among the Assistant Secretaries of Commerce and Labor and the Community Services Administration and HEW. Many of those people are Spanish-speaking. But I don't intend to set up an administrative office in the White House for any particular group.

Q. Why is it then that in recent—several weeks ago in the press, it was reported that Mayor Hatcher was going to come on staff to take care of black concerns?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, that's—you know I'm not responsible for everything that's reported in the press. [Laughter]

Q. That's not true?

THE PRESIDENT. No. I wouldn't bring anybody on board to take care of a particular constituency group. You know, if someone does come to work for me like Joe Aragon, who happens to speak Spanish, or Bunny Mitchell, who happens to be black, you know, if I felt they could only deal with Spanish-speaking people or black people, it would just be contrary to what I want.

I don't think that we ought to isolate a certain constituency group and have them able to go, or constrained to go, to a particular person in the White House. I think if any Spanish-speaking person in the country has a problem, you know, with the Labor Department or HEW or HUD, they ought to be free to go and ought to be encouraged to go directly to the Cabinet members involved.

I don't like to run my Governor's office in Georgia, or the White House here with administrative responsibilities in the White House. And I don't like to segment my staff to be responsible for old people or farmers or labor or business or women or blacks or Spanish-speaking people. I'd have such a fragmented administrative mechanism here that I couldn't deal with it. I'd just rather not do that.

I do like to have people who are sensitive, especially to the problems that face those constituency groups. And I think that Joe Aragon, although he does have a broad range of responsibilities and also a broad range of knowledge—he's respected by the Cabinet members—he does have a special sensitivity concerning the unique problems and needs of Spanish-speaking Americans.

But I would not want to have an entity in the White House that was confined to a responsibility just for Spanish-speaking people.

CUBAN HUMAN RIGHTS POLICIES

Q. Mr. President, when you went to Miami before the election, you went to our office of Replica Magazine. It's a weekly magazine. We discussed there about Cuba and human rights. Now Castro's in Angola, and human rights in Cuba are the same as before. What do you think about that?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, again, you know, our policy on human rights is a worldwide problem. Castro has thousands of political prisoners still in jail. I don't think he denies it.

There's some argument about exactly how many thousands are in jail. Some of those people have been in Cuban prisons for almost 20 years, and a lot of them had a sentence when originally incarcerated that was 20 years. Our hope is at least that he will release those political prisoners when their sentence expires.

We have very little, if any influence on what Castro does concerning basic human rights. Nothing would please me more than to see Castro announce today that he was going to withdraw his troops from Angola, from Mozambique, from South Yemen, from Ethiopia, that he was going to refrain from injecting Cuban troops into Rhodesia in the future, or that he was going to quit offering Cuban troops to the leaders among the frontline Presidents, that he was going to release political prisoners.

You know, nothing would please me more than for him to do that. But I can't tell you that we have any hopes that this will be the case.

As I said earlier, I don't think that our relationships with Cuba are going to improve any further unless he shows in tangible form that he's committed both to peace and to the enhancement of human rights.

I'll answer just one more question.

UNDOCUMENTED ALIENS LEGISLATION

Q. Mr. President, if the proposed alien adjustment and employment act becomes law, do you feel that such a massive program could be accomplished within a reasonable period of time? And would a special department or agency be needed to handle this particular undertaking?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I think it could be administered. I can't guarantee the complete success of it or any other effort of this kind when so many different kinds of human beings are involved.

We really want to feel our way into this program carefully. One of the reasons for the special status of those who are presently in our country illegally and who have been here for quite a while is just to understand how many of them there are and what the size of the problem is, so that we can deal with them both fairly and humanely.

Another thing to which we are totally committed is to make sure that any sort of new program of this kind does not work any hardship or deprivation of civil rights against those who are American citizens, who are here legally, and who happen to be Spanish-speaking.

This is a crucial issue for us, and I do think that the program would be adequate. I do think we can administer it well. It would be administered very cautiously, and if there was a choice between a rapid implementation on the one hand and the protection of the civil rights or human rights of all Spanish-speaking Americans on the other hand, I would be overly cautious in order to protect the civil rights of those people who happen to speak Spanish.

MR. WURFEL. Thank you, Mr. President.

LATIN AMERICAN POLICY

THE PRESIDENT. I'm looking forward this afternoon to getting my wife back. She's been down in Costa Rica for the inauguration of a new president, and she was in Guatemala this morning. I think that one of the things that I'd like to say in closing is this: We've tried to change our Latin American policy in a beneficial way. We've done it by honoring people who speak Spanish, just by a deep feeling that my wife and I have that they ought to be identified as equals.

We don't look down upon them. We're not doing them any favors. When we have a good relationship with Mexico or a good relationship with Panama or a good relationship with Costa Rica or other countries, it's a favor to Americans, to North Americans, and to the people who live in this country. And some of the things we've done have been very difficult politically.

I hope that, for instance, the ratification of the Panama Canal treaties will open up a new era of mutual trust and friendship and equality between ourselves and all the people in the Latin American countries.

I also have long had an interest in Latin America, because my wife and I just happen to have studied Spanish when we were very young. Rosalynn goes to Spanish class now 9 hours a week, and she does a lot of reading and a lot of studying at night. Each evening we read Spanish together. One night she reads; I read the next night. And so I think we have a special feeling toward our friends in Latin America. I believe that the people there reciprocate; they know that we are interested in improving relations.

And the other thing that we've tried to do is not to treat all of the people who live south of here as being the same. We deal with each country individually and respect their uniqueness and try to search out ways to let them respect us and to build up a respect for them in the minds and hearts of American people. This applies even to Cuba, where we do have some serious problems.

And we are very eager to see our relationships with the other nations in this hemisphere continue to improve. My subjective feeling is that they are improving. And there's just an outpouring of friendship expressed to me when I go to a country in Central and South America, or Caribbean—the same thing applies to my wife when she goes—quite different from what it has been in years gone by, and I want to continue it.

I'm extremely proud of the Latin heritage that's been brought to our own country. It's a benefit to American people. And our emphases on bilingual education comes from the heart. And I hope that that particular heritage or background can be preserved, because we can benefit a great deal from the extremely stable family configuration that exists among Latin American people—better by far on the average than what exists among Anglo-American families, perhaps—and the deep feelings of religious commitment are very admirable. The commitment to the work ethic is admirable.

And I think it's good for our country to have this Latin heritage become a part of our consciousness and to be recognized. We're trying to overcome discriminations that have existed in the past. I've spoken out very strongly against any police brutality, for instance, against Mexican American citizens in Texas and other places.

We've had the same thing exist in my part of the country against blacks, in years gone by. The Attorney General has interceded directly in some of those cases, to point out that there are inequities, there are mistreatments, exhibited even among official people. So, I look on your advice to me as being very valuable. And I hope when there are instances of this kind of abuse or when there are ways that I can move as President to make the lives of Spanish-speaking people more pleasant and more useful and more constructive in our country, that you all will let me know.

And I want every agency in the Federal Government to mirror the feelings that I've just described. It's a very important thing for us, for me and Rosalynn. It's a very important thing for my whole administration. And I'm eager to root out any sort of remnants of discrimination or improper separation from the rest of the citizens of our country from the very valuable Spanish-speaking citizens that are so dear to us.

Middle East Arms Sales

Statement by the President. May 14, 1978

The question before the United States Senate tomorrow is crucial to our efforts to secure a just and lasting peace in the Middle East. I have been impressed by the sincere desire of Senators I have talked with this weekend to rise above partisanship and political concerns. I believe the Senate will approve the transaction and thus allow the United States to maintain our historic commitment to the security of Israel, while enhancing our ties with moderate Arabs who also seek peace and stability in that region.

United States Circuit Judge Nominating Commission

Executive Order 12059. May 11, 1978

By virtue of the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and statutes of the United States of America, in order to clarify and amend the responsibilities of the various panels of the United States Circuit Judge Nominating Commission and to continue the Commission, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. Establishment of the Commission. There is hereby established the United States Circuit Judge Nominating Commission (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission"). The Commission shall be composed of thirteen panels, each of which shall, upon the request of the President, recommend for nomination as circuit judges persons whose character, experience, ability and commitment to equal justice under law, fully qualify them to serve in the Federal judiciary. Except as indicated below, each panel shall serve a geographic area set forth in

28 U.S.C. 41. The panels shall be as follows:

- (1) Panel for the District of Columbia Circuit;
- (2) Panel for the First Circuit;
- (3) Panel for the Second Circuit;
- (4) Panel for the Third Circuit;
- (5) Panel for the Fourth Circuit;
- (6) Panel for the Eastern Fifth Circuit, for the States of Alabama, Florida, Georgia and Mississippi;
- (7) Panel for the Western Fifth Circuit, for the States of Louisiana and Texas, and the Canal Zone;
- (8) Panel for the Sixth Circuit;
- (9) Panel for the Seventh Circuit;
- (10) Panel for the Eighth Circuit;
- (11) Panel for the Southern Ninth Circuit, for the States of Arizona, California, and Nevada;
- (12) Panel for the Northern Ninth Circuit, for the States of Alaska, Hawaii, Idaho, Montana, Oregon and Washington, and the Territory of Guam; and
- (13) Panel for the Tenth Circuit.

A panel shall be designated as, e.g., the "United States Circuit Judge Nominating Panel for the First Circuit."

SEC. 2. Membership. (a) The membership of the Commission shall consist of the combined memberships of the panels. The President may appoint a member of the Commission as its Chairman, with such duties as the President may assign.

(b) A panel shall be composed of a Chairman and such other members as the President may appoint;

(c) Each panel shall include members of both sexes and members of minority groups, and each panel shall include at least one lawyer from each State within a panel's area of responsibility.

(d) All members of the panel for the District of Columbia Circuit shall be persons residing within the District of Columbia or within twenty miles of its boundaries.

SEC. 3. Functions of Panels. (a) A panel shall begin functioning when the President or his designee notifies its Chairman that the President desires the panel's assistance in aid of his constitutional responsibility and discretion to select a nominee to fill a vacancy or vacancies on a United States Court of Appeals. Upon such notification, the panel shall:

(1) Give public notice of the vacancy or vacancies within the relevant geographic area, inviting suggestions as to potential nominees;

(2) Conduct inquiries to identify potential nominees;

(3) Conduct inquiries to identify those persons among the potential nominees who are well qualified to serve as a United States Circuit Judge; and

(4) Report to the President, within the time specified in the notification of the vacancy or vacancies, the results of its activities, including its recommendations as to the persons whom the panel considers best qualified to fill the vacancy or vacancies.

(b) The Panel for the District of Columbia Circuit shall have the additional function of recommending nominees for the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, in accordance with the standards and procedures prescribed by this order for recommending nominees for circuit judges.

SEC. 4. Standards for Selection of Proposed Nominees. (a) Before transmitting to the President the names of the persons it deems best qualified to fill an existing vacancy or vacancies, a panel shall have determined:

(1) That those persons are members in good standing of at least one state bar, or the District of Columbia bar, and members in good standing of any other bars of which they may be members;

(2) That they possess, and have reputations for, integrity and good character;

(3) That they are of sound health;

(4) That they possess, and have demonstrated, outstanding legal ability and commitment to equal justice under law; and

(5) That their demeanor, character, and personality indicate that they would exhibit judicial temperament if appointed to the position of United States Circuit Judge.

(b) In selecting persons whose names will be transmitted to the President, a panel shall consider whether the training, experience, or expertise of certain of the well qualified individuals would help to meet a perceived need of the court of appeals on which the vacancy or vacancies exist.

(c) To implement the above standards, a panel may adopt such additional criteria or guidelines as it considers appropriate for the identification of potential nominees and the selection of those best qualified to serve as United States Circuit Judges.

(d) Each panel is encouraged to make special efforts to seek out and identify well qualified women and members of minority groups as potential nominees.

SEC. 5. Ineligibility of Commission Members. No person shall be considered by a panel as a potential nominee while serving as a Commission member or for a period of one year after termination of such service.

SEC. 6. Travel Expenses and Financing.

(a) Members of the Commission shall receive no compensation from the Government of the United States for their service as members of the Commission, but may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by law (5 U.S.C. 5702 and 5703) for persons intermittently employed in the government service.

(b) All necessary expenses incurred in connection with the work of the Commission shall be paid from the appropriation for "Unanticipated Needs" in the Executive Office Appropriations Act or from such other funds as may be available.

(c) Expenditures authorized by this Section may be made only after the President has notified a panel's chairman that he desires the panel's assistance in accordance with Section 3 above, and before the termination of appointments to the panel in accordance with Section 7 below.

SEC. 7. Term of Membership. Unless extended by the President, each appointment to a panel shall terminate thirty days after submission of the panel's report to the President.

SEC. 8. Termination of Commission. The Commission shall terminate on December 31, 1978, unless sooner extended by the President.

SEC. 9. Revocations. Executive Order No. 11972 and Executive Order No. 11993 are hereby revoked.

Armed Forces Day, 1978

Proclamation 4571. May 15, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

The men and women of the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps and Coast Guard serve their country with pride and dignity. Each day we enjoy peace is a reminder of their important role.

It is with equal pride that we Americans set aside one day each year to pay tribute to these patriotic volunteers, stationed throughout the world.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States and Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States, continuing the precedent of my six immediate predecessors in this Office, do hereby proclaim the third Saturday of each May as Armed Forces Day.

I direct the Secretary of Defense on behalf of the Army, the Navy, the Air Force, and the Marine Corps, and the Secretary of Transportation on behalf of the Coast Guard, to plan for appropriate observances each year, with the Secretary of Defense responsible for soliciting the participation and cooperation of civil authorities and private citizens.

I invite the Governors of the States, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and other areas subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, to provide for the observance of Armed Forces Day within their jurisdiction each year in an appropriate manner designed to increase public understanding and appreciation of the Armed Forces of the United States.

I also invite national and local veterans, civic and other organizations to join in the observance of Armed Forces Day each year.

I call upon my fellow Americans not only to display the flag of the United States at their homes on Armed Forces Day, but also to learn about our system of defense, and about the men and women who sustain it, by attending and participating in the local observances of the day.

Proclamation 4492 of March 22, 1977, is hereby superseded.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this fifteenth day of May, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

JIMMY CARTER

Executive Schedule

Executive Order 12060. May 15, 1978

RELATING TO CERTAIN POSITIONS IN LEVELS IV AND V OF THE EXECUTIVE SCHEDULE

By virtue of the authority vested in me by Section 5317 of Title 5 of the United States Code, and as President of the United States of America, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. Section 1 of Executive Order No. 11861, as amended, placing certain positions in level IV of the Executive Schedule, is further amended by inserting in numerical sequence "(6) Assistant Attorney General, United States Attorneys and Trial Advocacy, Department of Justice." and by deleting "Counselor to the Secretary for Congressional Affairs" in subsection (10) and inserting in lieu thereof, "Deputy Under Secretary for Regional Affairs".

SEC. 2. Section 2 of Executive Order No. 11861, as amended, placing certain positions in level V of the Executive Schedule, is further amended by deleting "(13) Executive Director, Federal Personnel Management Systems Study, United States Civil Service Commission".

SEC. 3. Executive Order No. 11189 of November 23, 1964, Executive Order No. 11195 of January 30, 1965, and Executive Order No. 11995 of June 8, 1977 are revoked.

National Advisory Council on Extension and Continuing Education

Appointment of Four Members. May 15, 1978

The President has appointed four persons as members of the National Advisory Council on Extension and Continuing Education, for terms expiring June 30, 1980. They are:

ALFRED W. CLEMENT, of Bellingham, Wash., project director of the Bureau for Faculty Research at Western Washington State College;
HELMUT J. GOLATZ, of State College, Pa., department head and professor of labor studies at the Pennsylvania State University;
CRYSTAL A. KUYKENDALL, of Washington, D.C., director of urban and minority affairs for the National School Boards Association;
NOEL MYRICKS, of Columbia, Md., associate professor of family and community development at the University of Maryland and an attorney.

This Council advises the Secretary of HEW and the Commissioner of Education on matters concerning extension and continuing education.

Sir Robert Menzies

Statement on the Death of the Former Australian Prime Minister. May 15, 1978

In the death of Sir Robert Menzies, the United States has lost a firm friend and Australia a great leader.

Sir Robert's career of public service began half a century ago. He stood by the United States in three wars, and was instrumental in establishing the Australia-New Zealand-United States alliance (ANZUS).

After his retirement from public life, he continued to work at strengthening the ties of friendship that bind our countries—serving for a year as scholar-in-residence at the University of Virginia.

I join with Sir Robert's family and nation in mourning his passing.

NOTE: The White House later announced that the President asked Governor and Mrs. W. Averell Harriman to be his personal representatives at the funeral services in Melbourne on May 19.

Emergency Agricultural Assistance Bill

Statement on Signing H.R. 6782 Into Law.
May 15, 1978

I am today signing H.R. 6782, the Emergency Agricultural Act of 1978, because it will help the administration meet our goal of food and agriculture policies which are fair and equitable for farmers and which maintain our ability to compete effectively in world markets.

This is a 4-year measure that will give us added flexibility in farm programs and encourage more farmers to use the programs to achieve maximum benefit.

On March 29, we took several steps designed to help producers of wheat, feed grains, and cotton. These actions were targeted to provide economic incentive for producers to participate in the 1978 farm programs. Even though a wheat grazing and haying program was announced that day, it did not have an economic impact equal to the actions taken for cotton and feed grain producers.

The discretionary authority that the Congress has provided in this legislation allows the Secretary of Agriculture to raise income support levels in any year in which a set-aside program is in effect. Today, I am asking the Secretary to exercise this authority by increasing the income support level for 1978 crop wheat to $3.40 per bushel, up from the $3.00 provided in the Food and Agriculture Act of 1977.

As a result of this, wheat producers will be eligible for approximately $600 million in additional deficiency payments late this year, unless the market price is in excess of $3.00 a bushel during June-October.

An undesirable feature of this bill is the 48-cent-per-pound minimum upland cotton support price for the 1978-81 crops. This may create problems in future years, but we expect that market prices will remain above the 48-cent loan for the 1978 crop. I intend to propose legislation to remove this minimum price provision, but I will not propose to change the modifications in the formula used to determine the cotton loan rate.

It is also important to note that the bill raises the Commodity Credit Corporation's borrowing authority from $14.5 billion to $25 billion. The added $10.5 billion will not increase government expenditures, but will provide funds necessary for the successful operation of currently announced domestic and foreign food and agriculture programs.

I congratulate the Congress, and especially Chairmen Foley and Talmadge, for enacting this legislation so promptly after defeat by the House of Representatives of the unwise and untimely "flexible parity" bill. That bill would have added significantly to food prices and to budget expenditures, and would have undermined our attempts to form a farmer-held grain reserve to protect against future crop shortfalls.

The steady improvement in farm prices under the programs of the Food and Agriculture Act of 1977 demonstrates that it, and related statutes, are providing more effective insurance against economic risk.

Now our farmers need better insurance against the risk of natural disaster. Recently Secretary Bergland sent to the Congress our proposed farm production protection act, which will provide a nationwide, all-risk insurance program tailored to the needs of individual producers. It is my sincere hope that the Congress can move rapidly to reform the present crop insurance and disaster assistance programs.

I also strongly urge the Congress to act on legislation that the administration has forwarded to establish an international emergency wheat reserve. This bill authorizes government purchase of wheat from the marketplace to accumulate a total reserve of up to 220 million bushels. This reserve will strengthen our commitment for food aid to the less developed countries of the world. It will ensure that U.S. food aid shipments will not be curtailed when there have been substantial shortfalls in world grain production and food aid needs are most critical.

NOTE: As enacted, H.R. 6782 is Public Law 95-279, approved May 15.

Middle East Arms Sales

Statement on Senate Action Approving the Sales. May 15, 1978

I am deeply gratified by the Senate's decision today which will permit the proposed arms sales to Israel, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia. That action reaffirms our historic and unshakable commitment to the security of Israel—a commitment which will continue to have the unwavering support of this administration and the American people.

At the same time, the Senate vote strengthens our ties with moderate Arab nations who share our goal of peace and stability in the region. We also honor bipartisan pledges made by the previous administration as well as my own to help our friends in the Middle East meet their legitimate needs for self-defense.

The approval of these sales will not violate the arms limitation policy of this administration, which I announced last May. That pledge to limit arms sales will be met. If and when other nations are willing to join with us in mutual restraint on the sale of conventional weapons, even greater reductions will be possible.

In the meantime, the Senate's action makes it clear that the United States stands ready to provide needed assistance when unrestrained arms sales by other nations pose a threat to the security of our friends and allies.

With this issue resolved, the sharp debate over the proposed sales can now be put behind us. That debate has been among friends who share the same goals. All of us can now concentrate our full attention on finding a sound and just basis for permanent peace.

The United States will continue to play a responsible and active role in the search for peace in the Middle East. We will intensify our effort to help the parties narrow their differences. Our own national interest and moral values permit us to do no less.

Reception Honoring Armenian Americans

*Remarks at the White House Reception.
May 16, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. The first thing I want to say is that it is an honor for Rosalynn and me to have you here in our home, which is also your home.

In preparation for the previous meeting that I had with your group in the Roosevelt Room in the West Wing, I went back and studied some of the history of the Armenian people. And I, again, am impressed with the tremendous contribution that you've made to our own Nation, the high examples that you've set in leadership, in music, arts, in business, in politics, in education, and in your sound political judgment in choosing to be Democrats—[laughter]—also in your very early support of me when I ran for President. Yours was the first group that had confidence in me, and I will always remember it. And your help for our party and our country is something that I appreciate very much.

As one of the oldest people in the world, you have, I think, struggled with great courage and tenacity to preserve your own identity, your own customs, and, too, in a very modest way, let the world come to appreciate what you've accomplished.

I feel close to you because you were the first Christian people, first Christian nation, and because of that, your deep religious beliefs, I doubt that any other people have ever suffered more. I know that through the early years of the foundation of your people's home, you suffered a great deal. But it's generally not known in the world that in the years preceding 1916, there was a concerted effort made to eliminate all the Armenian people, probably one of the greatest tragedies that ever befell any group. And there weren't any Nuremberg trials. There weren't any high public figures who recognized how much you and your families had to suffer.

Well, I feel very deeply that I, as President, ought to make sure that this is never forgotten, not only the tragedy of your history but also the present contributions that you make and the bright future that you have.

I'm very grateful that there are about a million Armenian Americans who provide stability in a unique place in our Nation's social and political structure, and I'm very grateful to you.

I might add one other thing. You are very generous people. Some of you have become quite influential, quite affluent, and quite famous because of your superb achievements. And this is a matter of great pride to me as it is to you.

So, I just wanted to let you know that, in a few words, as President, and on behalf of the American people, I appreciate what you are.

Thank you very much.

CLEMENT CONGER. Mr. President, Mrs. Carter, as Curator of the White House, it gives me great pleasure to inform you that the Committee for the Preservation of the White House accepts with great pleasure two very important gifts of American paintings being given by the Manoogian family. They are, on the left, "Barn in Winter" by N. C. Wyeth, and on the right, "The Red Mill" by Ernest Lawson, American impressionist art. And I know that all of us realize that President and Mrs. Carter are very impressed with American impressionist artists.

I think Mr. Richard Manoogian would like to say just a word before we accept them.

MR. MANOOGIAN. Mr. President and Mrs. Carter, on behalf of the Manoogian family, I'm very pleased to present these paintings to the permanent White House collection. And I believe I speak for all the Armenians present to extend to you our appreciation and thanks for inviting us today, and we're looking forward to coming back over the next 7 years. Thank you.

MRS. CARTER. I want to thank you, too, for these paintings. One of the things that we need in the White House is a good collection of American paintings. And I really appreciate this contribution. And I want to welcome all of you here today. It's just a great pleasure for us to have you here with us.

THE PRESIDENT. One of the things that we enjoy here in the White House is having come to visit our Nation, world leaders, kings, and prime ministers, chancellors, presidents. One of our most important visitors was Chancellor Schmidt from Germany. And when he came, we wanted to be sure, as one of our chief allies in preserving world peace, that we had the best entertainment that was available in our country, and we had Lili Chookasian to sing for us that night. It was a wonderful evening. And she honored us by being here. And this afternoon it's, I know, with a warm sense of common appreciation that you and I now welcome Lili to sing for us again.

MS. CHOOKASIAN. May I say, Mr. President and Mrs. Carter, that it's indeed my pleasure. It's just unbelievable to be back here within a year. And my pianist is going to be Mr. Shahan Asranee.

The first number I'm going to sing is called "Siranitzar," which is translated "Apricot Tree." The lover is begging the apricot tree not to bear any fruit because his sweetheart has left him, and his sorrow is as deep as the deepest ocean.

NOTE: The President spoke at 4:33 p.m. at the reception held for Armenian American leaders of business, labor, educational, civic, and religious organizations in the East Room at the White House.

Visit of President Kenneth D. Kaunda of Zambia

*Remarks at the Welcoming Ceremony.
May 17, 1978*

PRESIDENT CARTER. It's a great honor for me as President of the United States to welcome to our country a great man and a friend, Kenneth Kaunda, the President of Zambia.

The last time he was here was 3 years ago. His wife, Betty, was with him. And they captured the hearts of Americans by an impromptu musical performance that was brought back to my own memory by his singing of the words of the national anthem, a few minutes ago, of his fine country.

Since that visit, in 3 years, a lot has happened. Momentous changes have occurred and are presently taking place in the southern part of Africa.

His neighbors are standing in admiration of his leadership and using the example set by this great man as a vision of what might be accomplished in the countries still in turmoil, where human rights have not been achieved, and where many black people are deprived of the right to vote, to participate in the shaping of their own government's policy, their own destiny, and are also deprived of the right of equality of opportunity and life.

President Kaunda is a deeply religious man. And the principles of his Christian beliefs have shaped his private and his public life. He's an idealist. He's a man of great integrity which has never been questioned. He's a man who has provided, among the frontline state leaders, a constant vision or perception of what might be in his neighboring state of Zimbabwe, or Rhodesia. He's a good partner for us.

I think it's accurate to say that our hopes for a future life in Rhodesia is the same as his. We want to see a community in peace. We want to see a government that is fair, where the rights of all citizens might be protected and ensured; the right to participate in government is open to all on an equal basis; that elections might be held that are open and free, and each person has one vote. We want to see a nation where majority rule can be instituted for a change.

The same thing applies to Namibia the entire southern part of Africa.

I look forward to these conferences that I will have with President Kenneth Kaunda with a great deal of anticipation and pleasure. He's a man who is a senior statesman, who understands the overall principles and the details of the complicated interrelationships that exist among the tribes of southern Africa, the unique qualities of the people of each nation, and the failures that have up until this moment been experienced in bringing freedom and a life of hope to many people in his region.

Zambia is a nation that has been close to us. And it's with a great deal of pleasure that I welcome to our country this statesman, and with a great deal of regret that we note that his wife, Betty, could not be with him on this visit.

President Kaunda, on behalf of the people of our country, we welcome you as a friend.

PRESIDENT KAUNDA. Mr. President, Madam Carter, sisters and brothers:

I welcome this opportunity of visiting the United States this year. Your words of welcome are most touching, and your thoughts about me and my country, very kind indeed. The warm and friendly reception extended to me, two of my children, and my entire delegation, is memorable. I bring friendly greetings from the people of Zambia to the people of the United States.

This is not my first visit to this great country, but being in the United States today is not the same thing, is not the same thing as being here a few years ago. There is an air of freshness which is invigorating to all those who are committed to the cause of man the world over. This new atmosphere which has brought America closer to many nations, nations which hitherto had been estranged, is the product, is the product of President Carter.

His spirit and principles have brought inspiration to many nations, particularly in the Third World and among the oppressed. He has given new hopes for improved relations and cooperation between America and Africa and the rest of the Third World.

In consequence, the opportunities for increased cooperation between the peoples of our two continents are now greater, greater than ever before. Our task is to strengthen this happy trend by removing the remaining obstacles in our way. We must consolidate our achievements in the last few months.

Since coming into office, President Carter has played host to a number of African leaders. His epoch-making visit to Africa signifies a new recognition of the importance of Africa to America, just as we have always recognized the importance of America to Africa.

We welcome this new approach to Africa's problems. Naturally, Africa expects more from a great country like America, for the challenges of the future are too serious to be ignored, too great, too great to be left to chance, too urgent, too urgent to be left to time.

Africa is growing stronger by the day. Through the development of her vast resources, Africa's contribution to peace and the well-being of mankind is growing. The people of Africa are now a decisive force in the maintenance of international peace and security.

So, Africa is no longer of interest only to multinational corporations but is also important in the maintenance of peace the world over. President Carter's Africa policy reflects a new realism on the part of the American Government in dealing with issues concerning Africa.

We in Zambia will always, Mr. President, support any efforts aimed at creating greater understanding, unity, and cooperation among various peoples of the world without regard to race, color, creed, or station in life.

We therefore look forward to a very fruitful visit, not only to Washington, D.C., but to the various States in the next few days.

Once again, Mr. President, I thank you for this memorable and touching reception. May God bless you and all the good people of your country and thank you.

Visit of President Kaunda of Zambia

Toasts at the State Dinner. May 17, 1978

PRESIDENT CARTER. President Kaunda and distinguished guests from Zambia, my own American friends who are ashamed of their President because he can't perform as well as you—[laughter]:

We are delighted to have you all here tonight to welcome to the White House a great leader.

Many of you didn't recognize the language of the prayer that was given by our guest. It was Presbyterian. [Laughter] His father was a pastor, a minister in the Church of Scotland. And I think that it's obvious to all of us that our guest has very deep feelings, not only about religion but about humanity, about freedom, about individuality, equality, democracy, self-expression, the very same characteristics of life that have made our own Nation great and have made the nation of Zambia great.

Living in this house is sometimes a sobering experience, because you look back over many years and see the leaders who have been here. We revere George Washington because he had such great courage and tenacity and confidence in his own people, that he was the father of our country. And it's a very exciting thing to know that we have, in effect, the George Washington of Zambia here with us tonight, a man who had the confidence of his people and who enjoys a relationship with the people of Zambia that's mutually respectful and filled with confidence.

I've benefited already from my correspondence with President Kaunda. I've sought his advice because I know what kind of man he is. I know the leadership that he shows in southern Africa and indeed throughout that continent and the world. He's a man whose integrity has never been challenged, never been doubted. And he's a man who in a practical way can implement his deep feelings that I've just described for the benefit of his own people.

I've had a chance to discuss with him today some of the most difficult questions that face the modern world—how to bring into being in the southern part of a troubled continent, among people who are not blessed as are those in Zambia with those freedoms and basic human rights, and how his leadership might be mirrored in me and other leaders who look to him for guidance; in letting the people of Rhodesia, Namibia, South Africa, ultimately enjoy the privileges of shaping their own governments' policies and of determining their own future through democratic processes, based on majority rule and based on the fact that each person should have a vote that's equal to the vote of any other person in that country.

This inner strength and courage is combined with a gentleness and a sensitivity that makes President Kaunda be outstanding in the minds and in the opinions of those who know him and know his good influence.

He was here in this room 3 years ago, and he made a short talk, toast, that was highly embarrassing to the Americans who were his hosts. Some criticized him for his frankness, and even accused him of being impolite. But the time that's passed since and our own experience has shown to me and my administration and my predecessors here that had we listened to him closely, and had the policies of our own government been shaped by him and his advice toward Africa, we could have avoided many serious mistakes, much delay, and expedited the achievements which we all still await and pursue with eagerness.

We are indeed fortunate to have statesmen like him come to our country to give us advice and to reinspire us with their own past achievements and with their own dreams and commitments for the future.

Our nations are tied together with a spirit not only of friendship and mutual respect but also now with a common purpose and common policies, common concerns and shared communications and mutual support.

Zambia's policy has not changed. But the policy of our own country has changed. And I think the investment that we are now placing in Africa with interest and study will pay rich dividends for our Nation in the future and for world peace and for the achievement of those who have been oppressed too long.

We have been discussing tonight some of the economic concerns that Zambia has. One of their major export items is copper. The copper prices have been severely depressed for the last 2 or 3 years. And we stand with Zambia, recognizing that their future, their economic strength is important to us and to the entire free world.

President Kaunda will be and has been meeting with the members of my Cabinet, with congressional leaders, some of you around this room. He's had long friendships with some of you. I know that everyone here, President Kaunda, shares my words and would corroborate everything that I've said about your own achievements and your own qualities.

We hope that southern Africa will take full advantage of your influence, and the people of the United States and I, as President, will certainly take full advantage of everything we can derive from you in counsel and advice and well-deserved criticism when we do forget that we in our affluence, with the historic blessings of freedom and equality for the majority of our people, must be reminded that other nations are still struggling for those attributes that all mankind desires so deeply.

So, it's with a great deal of pleasure that I say in your language, Mwaiseni Murwai [welcome to you, sir], and in another language that I happen to know, I would like to say, from the people of the United States, we would like to propose a toast to a great leader, President Kaunda, and to the fine people of Zambia for a great common future and for human rights throughout the world.

PRESIDENT KAUNDA. Mr. President, I know you've got an appointment to go to, but I shall invite my colleagues to come and join me in their short song, which, since you are also revolutionaries—you fought for your own independence—this song we sing when we are reminding ourselves about the ongoing struggle. Delegation—including the press. [Laughter]

[At this point President Kaunda and members of his cabinet sang the song. He then resumed speaking.]

Mr. President, sisters and brothers:

President Carter and myself have exchanged many letters since he assumed office on January 20, 1977. I was corresponding with a man about whom I knew little. Fortunately, the American political system affords Americanologists in the world to assess an American President even before he enters the White House.

So, even before meeting him, I had already regarded him as a man I understood and admired from the principles widely disseminated by the American news media. Today it is a pleasure to be with him in Washington to share with him the experiences, the joys, the burdens, and the challenges of this world. My discussions with him today have confirmed my impressions. He is a man endowed with penetrating simplicity and humility as well as transparent honesty reminiscent of a peasant.

As you know, honesty is such a rare commodity in a world that has become increasingly cruel, cruel against men and cruel against itself. Already President Carter has done two most important things, among others, affecting man's relations with man throughout the world. He has injected an important moral tonic into politics among nations. He has brought human rights into the full focus of international attention, thereby implementing on a world scale the principles enunciated by the Founding Fathers of the United States.

That the American people should bring to power a person like Jimmy Carter is a credit to their political system. Though it is different from ours, your two-party system, and our one-party, but still a democracy, attempt to give people of different backgrounds, men and women of humble beginnings, opportunity to lead their fellow man in shaping their destinies.

Jimmy Carter's background has greatly assisted America's approach to Africa and the Third World. Africa today is much higher on the list of American priorities. This is not a favor to Africa. It is simply the result of an honest facing of realities in the maintenance of international peace and security.

America's relations with African countries have improved. Zambia's relations with the United States have improved. Conflict of views is being replaced by concord in the solution of current crises. Where America would have rushed to be involved in supporting a wrong cause, fighting by proxy any infestation of communism, restraint has prevailed. Communications between us and the United States have been facilitated greatly by the removal of a number of obstacles that have stood in our way.

The Vietnam war is over. While the Middle East conflict remains unresolved, there is great recognition that the restoration of the rights of all people in that area, including the Palestinians, is essential for the establishment of lasting and just peace.

In southern Africa, there is greater understanding and acceptance that the interests of the United States of America will not be served by the status quo, but by a change in structural relations between white, black, and brown, in which no one race will be superior over the others.

America is playing a decisive role in the current initiatives to achieve independence for Zimbabwe and Namibia based on majority rule. President Carter and his administration have been most forthright in giving concrete expression to America's antiracist and antioppression policies.

Mr. President, we will support any genuine efforts designed to achieve peace based on freedom and justice and the enhancement of human dignity. We have never compromised our principles before, even in the face of great difficulties. We will not now do so.

We are strengthened and are resolved by the knowledge that the American Government and the many people of good will in this great country accept the principles which motivated the Founding Fathers to launch their revolution, which led to the Declaration of American Independence.

The same spirit and beliefs contained in the American Declaration of Independence motivate liberation movements. They want freedom and independence. We want mankind to be free, not only free from all forms of oppression and exploitation of man by man but also free to do what we want and when we want within the law of the land.

This brings me to the subject of human rights, which President Carter has championed since coming to office. The struggle of all the people in the world, wherever they may be, is the struggle for the enhancement of human dignity. That the President of the United States should champion the cause of human rights is a source of great inspiration to all of us.

There are those who are cynical about the importance of morality in politics. I say they are wrong. I believe that unless morality occupies a higher place in deciding the fate of our fellow man and in shaping the destiny of mankind, the consequences are bound to be catastrophic. Without moral principles guiding decisionmakers, a nuclear war which haunts all of us will be more difficult to avoid. Mankind's happy future will depend on man's respect for man, on the moral correctness of man's actions towards other men.

We who come from that part of the world called southern Africa understand that when morals are removed from man's conscience, only a beastly heart is left behind. Without morals, man is not man, but a mere imitation of God's original design.

Therefore, I can only urge you, Mr. President, I can only urge the people of these United States to continue sounding the moral drums even louder and clearer.

We may not succeed now. But let us begin to root our decisions on the moral correctness of our actions. If we should leave the decisions to those who think only in terms of military, political, economic, or technological power, man will destroy the world faster than he really wants.

Mr. President, I do hope that this visit will help us bring our two countries and our two peoples much closer together in sharing the burdens of shaping man's future. I am glad that this visit provides the opportunity to identify the best route to our common goals.

May I ask you now to join me in this toast: To the President of the United States and the principles for which he stands; to the health of Madam Carter; to the friendship and cooperation between our two peoples; to peace, freedom, and justice throughout the world. President Carter.

PRESIDENT CARTER. Thank you very much.

NOTE: President Carter spoke at 9:10 p.m. in the State Dining Room at the White House.

Dinner Honoring Senator Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia

Remarks at the Dinner Sponsored by the West Virginia State Society. May 17, 1978

I had a lot to do tonight but somebody said there might be a free fiddle concert. [Laughter] I would have been here earlier. We had President Kaunda, Kenneth Kaunda, from Zambia tonight. And we had finished our evening meal and the formal toasts, and we discovered that he's a guitar player. [Laughter] And he sang three songs for us. And then he gathered all of his cabinet around him and they sang a special song about revolution in south Africa. [Laughter] So, that made us a little tardy in arriving. If there's one audience that can understand this, it would be the people from West Virginia here. [Laughter]

In the life of a President, it's necessary to establish priorities, because the demands on one's time and one's attention are very severe. And at this moment, I'm doing the thing that I believe is the highest priority in my life as President, and that is to join with you in paying my respects to one of the finest men and one of the greatest leaders I've ever known, Senator Robert Byrd. I don't believe that anyone can appreciate that kind of legislative experience and leadership and the trust of one's fellow Senators as much as can a new President who's not been in the White House very long, who has never lived nor served in Washington before, and who has so much to learn.

I came here about 16 months ago, leaning very heavily upon Senator Byrd for advice and counsel. At the time I got here my rating in the public opinion polls was 75. And after taking his advice for 16 months—[laughter]. I asked Bob the other day to explain the dramatic shift, and he said there was a rising level of lowered expectations. [Laughter]

After the first year of that political progress, I decided to reward Senator Byrd. We had a very difficult legislative agenda in 1977. And we decided to reward him, that we would avoid the controversial issues in 1978. [Laughter] So, as soon as the Panama Canal, Mideast arms sales, labor law reform are over, I told him the agenda would be quite uncluttered from then for the rest of the year. [Laughter]

I would like to say just a few additional words. He is a man who has a very keen interest and understanding of international affairs. Our country's policies are changing. A vivid example of that was the banquet that I just left. Our interest in Africa is growing and new. It's proper and it's benevolent. It's fair. Our dedication now is to the establishment of the same principles for the people of that tortured part of the world that we espouse here with our voices and sometimes with our hearts, but had not espoused in the past with our tangible evidence of interest and courage.

Senator Byrd sees this very clearly. He's spent a lot of time with me and with Cy Vance, with Dr. Brzezinski, in private meetings, unpublicized meetings, to try to be part of a process of beneficial change throughout the world. Because of his past and present responsibilities in the Senate, he's had to understand all 50 States, the highly focused conflicts of interest and opinion, background and experience, concerns, fears, hopes, dreams, aspirations of an America that derives its strength from diversity. But it takes a statesman of superb qualities to be able to balance those potential conflicts.

Among a hundred Senators who are proud, who share with all fellow politicians some degree of ego, either for themselves personally or primarily for their people who trust them and have chosen them to lead, and the careful balancing of these forces in a democratic Senate requires the most superb judgment and sensitivity and, I would say, above all, the respect of those whom he leads.

There has to be absolute integrity, absolute truth, because any deviation from that standard would destroy the effectiveness of that leadership, and that's what he shows.

But I think in addition to his international and national interest and accomplishment, the thing that impresses me most is that he knows where his roots are.

I know when I'm in Liberia or when I'm in Germany or when I'm in South America, or traveling around in our great country, I remember Georgia and I remember Plains. And I derive a great strength from that base of trust and friendship, family, and I remember where my roots are.

And I think one of the most superb characteristics of Bob Byrd is his closeness to the people of West Virginia. You have honored him, but I think at least equally he has honored you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:25 p.m. at the Officers' Club at Bolling Air Force Base.

Recording for the Blind, Incorporated

*Remarks on Presenting the Organization's Annual Scholarship Achievement Awards.
May 18, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. This is one of those delightful occasions that warms the heart of a President or any other person who loves our Nation and who admires great achievement and great courage.

I was one of the executive officers in the Lion's International Organization. And our major project, not only in this country but in more than 100 other nations, is concerning eyesight, the conservation of eyesight, and also the ability to meet the needs of those who happen to be blind, but who have an open heart and an open mind that can see and understand the world around them.

One of the most delightful achievements in our Nation is the development of a superb library of books and other materials for those who are blind, but who have not let this physical affliction interfere with their hunger for knowledge and the development of themselves.

There are several thousand volunteers in 29 centers around the country—one in Athens, Georgia; I just learned, one in Oak Ridge, Tennessee, where I'll be going this weekend—who record the texts of books of all kinds.

In addition, the organization that produces these library facilities for blind people award scholarships each year for outstanding students who want to continue their education, who happen to be blind.

On my right are four of those students to whom I will present awards in a few moments. But I would like to congratulate them on behalf of their fellow citizens in our great country for demonstrating that there is no constraint on the achievement of a physically handicapped person. Not only have they honored me by coming, made their families proud, demonstrated the efficacy of a fine organization and its work, but they can act and do act as an inspiration to other Americans who want high achievement and who need additional courage and example to follow.

So, I want to congratulate all four of you and point out that these four future lawyers that—[laughter]—I am sure, will fill a very useful place in our society. And I look forward with great interest to having you join the ranks of those who believe in the finest aspects of the law and want to pursue justice, from the vantage point of one who knows a need for opportunity for all.

So, thank you again for coming and honoring me by your presence, and I will now give the achievement awards to each of you.

The first one is to Harry John Miller II. And, I'd like to read it first.

"The Board of Directors of Recording for the Blind, Incorporated, present this scholastic achievement award to Harry John Miller II in recognition of the extraordinary scholarship, determination, and intellectual vigor displayed in earning the degree of Bachelor of Arts from Arizona State University."

It's a great honor for me to present this to you.

MR. MILLER. Thank you very much, Mr. President. God bless you, sir.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you. The envelope contains a check. [Laughter]

The next one is to Christopher John Palano. "The Board of Directors of Recording for the Blind, Incorporated, present this scholarship achievement award to Christopher John Palano in recognition of the extraordinary scholarship, determination, and intellectual vigor displayed in earning the degree of Bachelor of Arts from Clark University."

I present this to you with my congratulations and best wishes.

MR. PALANO. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. And now Marilyn Carol Rosenthal, who, by the way, will be the first blind woman to attend the Harvard Law School.

"The Board of Directors of Recording for the Blind, Incorporated, present this scholastic achievement award to Marilyn Carol Rosenthal in recognition of the extraordinary scholarship, determination, and intellectual vigor displayed in earning the degree of Bachelor of Arts from the Douglas College of Rutgers University."

Congratulations to you.

MISS ROSENTHAL. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Good luck to you.

This next award is to John Britt DeLuca, who, I noticed, wears a Phi Beta Kappa key on his lapel. "The Board of Directors of Recording for the Blind, Incorporated, present this scholastic achievement award to John Britt DeLuca in recognition of the extraordinary scholarship, determination, and intellectual vigor displayed in earning the Bachelor of Arts degree from Duke University."

John Britt DeLuca, congratulations to you.

MR. DELUCA. Thank you very much.

PETER B. PUTNAM. Mr. President, some years ago, I remember attending an Independence Day celebration for Switzerland, and at the time, the person who spoke said this is a country with no natural resources, what it had was human resources. We've been very blessed with natural resources, but I still think our human resources are our most important asset.

And I would like to pay tribute to the volunteer readers who are the human resources to help develop these human resources, and they have been of extraordinary help to us. They're not just ordinary men and women, they are highly educated, highly skilled, highly trained.

And you mentioned our studio in Oak Ridge. We had to found that because we had to get nuclear scientists to read the kind of advanced mathematics and physics our students were studying. And they are extraordinary people.

We have an award that we give to our volunteers. And I don't know who in the world wants to wear a necktie today, but I would like you to have it. [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much. I might point out as a matter of interest that these four students on my right in their achievement of their bachelors degrees have studied and, I presume, mastered a total of 639 books, all recorded by volunteers and all included in the library of more than 35,000 volumes now available to blind people in our country.

So, I would like to congratulate all of you and express my appreciation, also, for the volunteers and others who make this wonderful program possible.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 12:23 p.m. in the Rose Garden at the White House. Peter B. Putnam is president of Recording for the Blind, Inc.

Federal Anti-Inflation Actions

Memorandum From the President.
May 18, 1978

Memorandum for the Heads of Executive Departments and Agencies

Inflation is a corrosive nation-wide problem, and yet the Federal Government's direct control over wages and prices is limited. If we are to expect labor and industry to join in voluntary restraints, then we must lead the way where we can.

I have already ordered pay raises reduced for Federal employees. To complement and balance this constraint on labor in the public sector, I am now ordering additional anti-inflation actions through the Federal Government's $81 billion annual purchases of goods and services.

Like any consumer, the Government must react to high costs and the inflationary spiral. If goods or services are priced too high, the Government must decide whether it can do without certain things, or whether it can delay purchases. Therefore, I hereby direct all Agencies to avoid or delay the purchase of those goods or services whose prices are rising rapidly. The only exceptions will be where such action (1) would seriously jeopardize our National defense, or (2) would cause serious and counterproductive unemployment problems; and suitable alternatives or substitutes are not available.

In addition, I am directing that price escalation clauses of all new or renegotiated Federal contracts reflect the principle of deceleration. This will slow the built-in spiral of inflation in several billion dollars worth of purchases.

These new procurement procedures, and others to come, will be carried out by OMB's Office of Federal Procurement Policy in cooperation with the Agencies.

Special Session of the United Nations General Assembly on Disarmament

Announcement of Vice President Mondale's
Address at the Special Session.
May 18, 1978

President Carter has asked Vice President Walter F. Mondale to address on behalf of the United States the United Nations General Assembly Special Session on Disarmament.

The Vice President will deliver the United States address on May 24, 1978, in the United Nations General Assembly.

The Special Session was convened in order to emphasize the importance of making progress in the field of arms control and to provide impetus for future arms control negotiations. It is the largest conference ever convened devoted exclusively to questions of arms control.

President Carter has stated the determination of the United States to make a positive contribution to the work of the conference. The Vice President's participation underscores the importance the United States attaches to the Special Session on Disarmament.

Small Business Conference Commission

Executive Order 12061. May 18, 1978

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution of the United States of America, and in order to create in accordance with the Federal Advisory Committee Act (5 U.S.C. App. I) an advisory committee on a White House Small Business Conference, it is hereby ordered as follows:

1-1. Establishment of Commission.

1-101. There is established a Small Business Conference Commission. The Commission shall be composed of five members.

1-102. The members of the Commission shall be appointed by the President. The President shall designate a Chairman from among the members.

1-2. Functions of the Commission.

1-201. The Commission shall recommend appropriate alternate dates for holding a White House Conference on Small Business in the Fall of 1979.

1-202. The Commission shall recommend issues to be considered by the Conference, including those relating to fostering of small business and the expansion of opportunities for entry into small business enterprises.

1-203. The Commission shall recommend candidates for delegates to the Conference. It shall seek the majority of representatives from those engaged in small business activity, but shall also include others interested in small business concerns, such as government regulators, financiers, public interest and academic representatives.

1-204. Prior to the White House Conference on Small Business, the Commission shall hold open regional and local meetings or conferences. These open meetings shall seek to identify the specific issues which should be addressed at the Conference and shall solicit candidates for Conference delegates.

1-205. The Commission shall make periodic recommendations to the President and the Administrator of the Small Business Administration, and shall offer such other advice at such times as the Administrator may request.

1-3. Administrative Provisions.

1-301. The Commission may request any Executive agency to furnish such information as may be useful in fulfilling the Commission's functions. Each such agency is authorized, to the extent permitted by law and within the limits of available funds, to furnish such information to the Commission.

1-302. Each member of the Commission who is not otherwise employed by the Federal Government shall receive no compensation from the United States by virtue of their service on the Commission, but all members may receive transportation and travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by law (5 U.S.C. 5702 and 5703).

1-303. All necessary administrative staff services, support, facilities, and expenses of the Commission shall, to the extent permitted by law, be furnished by the Small Business Administration.

1-4. General Provisions.

1-401. Notwithstanding the provisions of any other Executive order, the functions of the President under the Federal Advisory Committee Act (5 U.S.C. App. I), except that of reporting annually to the Congress, which are applicable to the Commission shall be performed by the Administrator of the Small Business Administration in accordance with guidelines and procedures established by the Administrator of General Services.

1-402. The Commission shall terminate on December 31, 1979, or 60 days after the conclusion of the White House Conference on Small Business, whichever is sooner.

Nuclear Regulatory Commission

Nomination of John F. Ahearne To Be a Member. May 18, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate John F. Ahearne, of McLean, Va., to be a member of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. Ahearne would serve the remainder of the term expiring June 30, 1978, replacing Edward Mason, resigned, and would also serve for a 5-year term expiring June 30, 1983.

Ahearne was born June 14, 1934, in New Britain, Conn. He received a B.S. in engineering physics from Cornell University in 1957, an M.S. from Cornell in 1958, and an M.A. (1963) and Ph. D. (1966) in physics from Princeton University.

From 1964 to 1969, Ahearne was an associate professor of physics at the U.S. Air Force Academy and adjunct professor of physics at the University of Colorado Extension. In 1969 and 1970, he was a staff member in the Air Defense Division of the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Systems Analysis. From 1970 to 1972, he was Director of the Tactical Air Directorate in that office.

From 1972 to 1975, Ahearne was Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for General Purpose Programs in the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Program Analysis and Evaluation). From 1975 to 1977, he was Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense in the Office of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Manpower and Reserve Affairs. Since 1977 he has been on the staff of the White House Energy Policy and Planning Office, working on the nuclear and conservation portion of the National Energy Act.

National Transportation Policy Study Commission

Appointment of William H. Tucker as a Member. May 18, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of William H. Tucker, of Boston, Mass., as a member of the National Transportation Policy Study Commission.

Tucker, 54, is an attorney in Boston. He is a former Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and has also served as vice president in charge of Penn Central's Residual Rail Asset Department.

Counsellor to the President on Aging

Announcement Issued Following a Meeting With the Ad Hoc Leadership Council of Aging Organizations. May 18, 1978

In his meeting with the Ad Hoc Leadership Council of Aging Organizations today, the President outlined the following points about his objectives in establishing the position of Counsellor to the President on Aging:

—To ensure that he will have placed before him proposed initiatives in the field of aging designed not only to meet the needs of older persons but also to make it possible for the Nation to benefit from the unique contributions that older persons can make to the strengthening of our Nation by opening up opportunities for their continued involvement in the life of our day.

—To ensure that whenever policy issues are presented to him in such areas as social security, employment, housing, health, transportation, and welfare, he will be reminded of the impact that proposed solutions will have on the lives of older persons.

—To have placed before him proposals designed to make it possible for him to make the maximum possible contribution to coordinating programs in the executive branch that have an impact on the lives of older persons.

—To have a personal representative who can present his views on issues in the field of aging to the departments and agencies of the executive branch, to the Members of Congress, and to representatives of organizations in both the public and private sectors.

The President also noted that he has designated the Counsellor as Chairman of the Federal Council on the Aging. Putting these two functions in the hands of one person will make it possible for the Counsellor to present to the President a broad consensus of views in the field of aging that are represented by the membership of the Federal Council on the Aging.

Security Assistance to Zaire

Memorandum From the President. May 18, 1978

Presidential Determination No. 78-11

Memorandum for the Secretary of State

Pursuant to the authority vested in me by Section 25 of the International Security Assistance Act of 1977, I hereby determine that:

(a) The furnishing to Zaire of not to exceed $2,500,000 in international military education and training for the fiscal year 1978 under chapter 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, the extension to and utilization by Zaire of not to exceed $17,500,000 for the fiscal year 1978 in credit under the Arms Export Control Act, and the utilization by Zaire of the uncommitted balance of credit extended to Zaire under the Arms Export Control Act in any prior fiscal year, are important to the national security interests of the United States; and

(b) Such assistance should be furnished to Zaire in the national security interests of the United States.

You are requested on my behalf to report this determination to the Congress, as required by law. You are also requested to keep the Congress fully and currently informed on the specific details of how the assistance to Zaire is utilized.

This determination shall be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

Prayer for Peace, Memorial Day, May 29, 1978

Proclamation 4572. May 19, 1978

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

We pause at this time of year to remember those who sacrificed their lives over the last two centuries to preserve America's freedoms.

We honor them today for their faith in the principles of liberty and justice which motivated our founding fathers, and must motivate us today.

The highest tribute we can pay those who fought and sometimes died for our country is to strengthen in time of peace those values for which they struggled in time of war.

Let us pray for peace, but let us also vow that, if the test of unavoidable combat should ever come again, we will meet it with courage, and devotion to our country.

Now, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate Memorial Day, May 29, 1978, as a day for all Americans to join together in prayer for lasting peace. To that end, I designate the hour beginning in each locality at 11 o'clock on the morning of that day as the appropriate time for the American people to unite in prayer.

I call upon the appropriate officials of all levels of government to fly the flag at half-staff until noon during Memorial Day on all buildings, grounds, and naval vessels throughout the United States and in all areas under its jurisdiction and control. I request the people of the United States to display the flag at half-staff from their homes and other suitable places for the same customary forenoon period.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this nineteenth day of May, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

Presidential Election in the Dominican Republic

Statement by the President. May 19, 1978

I am seriously concerned about events surrounding the election in the Dominican Republic and have been in touch with the Presidents of several neighboring countries in Latin America and with the Secretary General of the Organization of American States (OAS) concerning the election procedures. We share a common concern for the integrity of the democratic process. I retain my hope that the legally constituted electoral authorities in the Dominican Republic will be able to carry out their responsibilities without interference and that the outcome of the elections will be respected by all. We will be examining the report of the three prominent observers invited to witness the election process. The degree of our country's support for the Dominican Government will depend upon the integrity of the election process.

NOTE: The Dominican Republic National Police stopped the counting of ballots shortly after the presidential election, which was held on May 16. After the count had resumed, Antonio Guzmán was declared the winner over incumbent President Joaquín Balaguer.

United States Development Assistance Programs

Announcement of Administrative Reorganization of the Programs. May 19, 1978

The White House announced today an administrative reorganization of the Government's development assistance programs. As a first step in implementing the plan, the President met Thursday, May 18, 1978, with senior representatives of the departments and agencies who will assist Gov. John Gilligan, Administrator of the Agency for International Development, in coordinating all foreign aid programs.

The President has designated Governor Gilligan to serve as his and the Secretary of State's principal adviser on development programs and policy, and to be the executive branch's principal spokesman to the Congress on development assistance. The Administrator will have a voice in all economic decisions having a major impact on developing countries.

The President directed Governor Gilligan to prepare annually an aid policy statement. The statement will show how different types of U.S. aid to be sought from the Congress will be related to each other. It will be used, in conjunction with non-aid policies affecting the less developed countries, to advance U.S. purposes and policies. This statement will be reviewed at the Cabinet level by the Policy Review Committee of the NSC and submitted to the President for approval. Once approved by the President, this statement will constitute general guidance for all departments and agencies concerned in preparing their budget requests and managing their programs. It will also provide the basis for a comprehensive and coordinated approach to the Congress concerning all requests for funding of resource transfers to developing countries.

An expanded Development Coordinating Committee has been formed to assist the Administrator in carrying out these functions and in coordinating U.S. development assistance programs and policies. This deputy or assistant secretary-level Committee will have staff and subcommittees, as necessary, to discharge its functions. It will deal with issues of bilateral aid, multilateral aid, PL-480, aid for certain international organizations, and legislative strategy and tactics.

The President spoke at the first meeting of this Committee on May 18 about the need for close interagency coordination. He stressed his confidence in Governor Gilligan and his hope that by greatly strengthening the interagency coordination mechanism, the effectiveness of development policy and assistance can be greatly improved. These arrangements reflect some of the suggestions for enhancing aid coordination and effectiveness made in the bill introduced for this purpose by the late Senator Humphrey.

National Architectural Barrier Awareness Week

*Letter to Members of the National Association of Theater Owners.
May 19, 1978*

To the Theater Owners of America

America loves to go to the movies, but many people in our country who would like to go to the movies cannot. Even two steps at the theater entrance pose insurmountable obstacles to many handicapped people.

During National Architectural Barriers Week, all Americans are being called upon to recognize those barriers that physically and psychologically keep handicapped Americans from full participation in our society. I am calling on all Americans to do everything possible to eliminate such barriers. I commend your president's call on theater owners to improve the access to motion picture theaters for the handicapped. I urge the American business community to follow your voluntary example by creating more accessible facilities.

The National Architectural and Transportation Compliance Board here in Washington will be glad to provide information and advice on how you can make your theaters more accessible to the physically handicapped. Also, the Tax Reform Act of 1976 allows a tax deduction up to $25,000 for businesses that make facilities accessible to the handicapped. This deduction is available through 1979.

I congratulate you on your leadership and on your efforts to help build a barrier-free America.

JIMMY CARTER

NOTE: The President proclaimed the week of May 21–27, 1978, as National Architectural Barrier Awareness Week by Proclamation 4566, of April 25. The text of the proclamation is printed on page 774 of this volume.

In response to the proclamation, Marvin Goldman, president of the National Association of Theater Owners, issued an open letter to members of the association calling on them to do all that they can to eliminate physical barriers in movie theaters across the country.

Interview With the President

*Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session
With a Group of Editors and News Directors.
May 19, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. Good afternoon, everybody. Thank you very much for coming to the White House to see us. Bill [William Shipp, Atlanta Constitution], how are you doing? How are things in Atlanta?

What I'd like to do just for a very brief period of time is to outline a few of the items that are involved in my duties, both in the Congress and internationally, and then answer your questions.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES

We've lately been trying to deal satisfactorily, and within the complete bounds of the law, with the question of Zaire and the invasion of Zaire by Katanganese who came in from Angola.

We have a very limited role to play there. We are involved in providing some logistical support for removing, because of humanitarian reasons, some of the nationalists—nationals who are located in the Kolwezi area. The French and Belgians, with the support and participation of the Mobutu Zairian Government, are attempting to evacuate those nationals whose lives are endangered. We are providing support only in the noncombat zone. The nearest approach, I think, to Kolwezi by our airplanes is about 200 kilometers.

This would be a limited involvement. We've consulted very closely with the Members of Congress, and I'm sure that it will be successful.

We've also been approaching the Congress on some other foreign policy matters this year. Two major ones that have already been resolved are the Panama Canal treaties and the sale to the Middle East countries of arms.

We've also decided to ask Congress to terminate the Turkey arms embargo, which I consider to be a crucial decision for the strengthening of ties between Greece and NATO—between Turkey and NATO, between Greece and Turkey, and to help us resolve the Cyprus issue.

We will be preparing—I've spent a lot of time preparing for a NATO conference here, the last days of this month. It will be much broader in scope than previous NATO conferences. The heads of the nations will be here with me, around this very table at times, and will analyze the long-range thrust of the NATO defense agreements and resolve some issues that have arisen among us and which ordinarily are addressed through bilateral conversations between me and other NATO government heads of state.

Congress is dealing with the budget and with the energy question. We hope that we'll have an early resolution of the natural gas pricing and deregulation proposal which has been the most difficult issue of all. That will still leave the question of the crude oil equalization tax, which is to be decided by a separate committee, at least from the Senate point of view.

We have civil service reform proposals now in the House and Senate. As far as legislation goes, I consider this to be the most important issue in reorganization effort. We're trying to make the bureaucracy and the Federal Government more responsive and more manageable.

As I've said several times, it's much worse than I thought it was before I got here. [Laughter] And I think that to give very dedicated career civil servants an opportunity to do a better job and to be rewarded when they do a good job, and also to encourage those who aren't performing well to perform better, to give our managers authority among the personnel, civil service, will be a major step in the right direction. This is in the Post Office and Civil Service Committee in the House, and the Government Operations Committee in the Senate. And we are spending a lot of time getting ready for this vote, which I hope and expect to be favorable.

We've got many other issues at stake. I think in order to save time, since I came in here a little bit late, I'll answer your questions, and then address more directly those questions that are very important to you.

I might say, before I take the first question, that I have enjoyed being President.

[Laughter] It's a full-time job, I've discovered. But there are pleasant working conditions, as you can see. I don't have to ride very far to get to work. I think it's kind of brought our family together. Rosalynn has been an equal partner with me in many ways. And she's presently involved to a major degree in building up volunteer work in the improvement of the quality of life in our communities, around the country, of all sizes. She's studying Spanish and has made two or three trips to Spanish-speaking countries to the south with great effectiveness, I think.

And I've got a superb Cabinet. There's not a single member of my Cabinet that I would want to change. And my hope is all of them will stay here as long as I'm in the White House. I've got a good staff, solid.

So, I've enjoyed the job, and I never got up out of bed yet that I didn't look forward to the day. Sometimes I've been disappointed after I got up. [Laughter]

QUESTIONS

YURI ORLOV

Q. Mr. President, may we have your personal reaction to the trial of Yuri Orlov in the Soviet Union?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. The State Department, with my approval, has issued a statement on this subject. We are deeply disturbed about this action by the Soviet Union, which in my opinion subverts the spirit of the Helsinki agreement concerning human rights. Orlov was a Soviet citizen who organized a group to monitor compliance with the so-called third basket in the Helsinki agreement, which was signed not only voluntarily but with a good bit of publicity on the part of the Soviet Union.

We are concerned about the severity of the sentence, the secrecy of the trial, and the apparent abuse that Mrs. Orlov suffered during the conduct of the trial. We've expressed our concern in clear terms to the Soviet Government.

NUCLEAR POWER

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I haven't paign, you said that nuclear power should be America's last energy resort. When and why have you changed your position?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I haven't changed my position. I always made it clear when I said that, that our first emphasis ought to be on conservation. Our second emphasis ought to be on saving oil and natural gas, which are getting very rapidly depleted and the production of which in our country has been going down steadily and inexorably, I think; that we should increase our production of coal and renew an effort to encourage additional use of solar power, cut down on imports, and to the extent that all those efforts are not successful, we ought to make up the difference with atomic power.

But I always made it clear and still feel that there is a significant role to be played by nuclear power.

I was involved to some degree in evolution of peaceful nuclear power uses, and I know that in some parts of the country, like around Chicago, about 50 percent of the total power comes from nuclear plants. I'm very interested in TVA. I'm going to be down in TVA, the national headquarters, on Monday.

Six plants are being prepared for construction in the TVA program. I support this. We've tried to expedite the licensing procedure, but at the same time do all these other matters which I think would minimize the need for nuclear power.

Q. Isn't more of the research money still going into nuclear power than such things as solar and geothermal?

THE PRESIDENT. No. Compared to what the Congress has authorized previously, we've had a substantial increase in other forms of energy, as far as the budget is concerned, on research and development. I think for the first time now, we've gotten nuclear power research and development down to less than half of the energy budget.

But I think, as you probably have noticed, there's a much more fervent commitment to some very wasteful projects, like the Clinch River Breeder Reactor, in the Congress than I have. I would like to terminate the Clinch River Breeder Reactor and have tried to, and the Congress has so far overridden my objections to it.

I do think we ought to continue to keep open the option of breeder reactors. And we have a very heavy allotment of funds available for research and development in that field. But to tie down a specific design and start constructing an operating plant now when we do not need it, I think, is a very large and unnecessary waste of money.

EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

Q. Mr. President, Congress is currently struggling with the difficult issue of, if the equal rights amendment is fair, is the extension of ratification fair. What's your opinion?

THE PRESIDENT. I strongly favor the passage of the equal rights amendment—

Q. What about the extension of ratification?

THE PRESIDENT. —and I hope that it passes. If it becomes obvious that it wouldn't pass, then I would favor the extension of the law.

Q. Mr. President?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, Bill.

CUBAN AND SOVIET INVOLVEMENT IN AFRICA

Q. Is the United States responding in any way to the continued Soviet-Cuban adventures in Africa? Are we doing anything to discourage that specifically?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. I think you probably know that the Congress placed very tight constraints on the President and any initiatives that can be taken, in the aftermath of the Vietnam war and the aborted effort to move into Angola after they got their independence from the Portuguese.

I favor a lot of those constraints. The War Powers Act suits me fine, where the President cannot initiate military action without consultation with the Congress. I think this is good.

But within the bounds of the present law, which we are honoring rigidly, we are doing all we can. One of the real needs is to have more public support for foreign aid programs. I don't know of any issue that has less political support than that program itself, foreign aid in all its forms.

The Soviets and the Cubans are quite eager to provide military weapons to any group in a country where they might see a foothold there opening for them in the future for increased influence. And the Soviets are very eager to send Cuban troops, actually to be involved in the fighting. And the Cubans respond without reticence.

In order to meet that challenge, we depend upon our own voice to express our concern to the Soviets through my own public statements, through private correspondence between me and Brezhnev, through diplomatic channels, through the voices and influence of our allies around the world who want to see an absence of military action and outside interference.

We try to strengthen the Organization of African Unity and prevail upon the black leaders of Africa that the issues in that continent can be best resolved by leaders who live in Africa. We have tried, since I've been in office, I think in an innovative way, to increase our own routine involvement in Africa, not just go in there at the last stages after a crisis has occurred.

I received overwhelming welcome, for instance, in Nigeria, whereas a few years ago—3 years ago, I think—the Nigerians refused to let Secretary Kissinger come into their country. And I think whereas Kaunda, who's here now from Zambia, has been highly critical of our Government and our policies in the past, now he's very supportive and very constructive.

We are trying to honor the legitimate demand of black Africans for their own voice, on an equal basis with other citizens in the shaping of government policy and the election of their own leaders and in the determination of their own future, their own destiny.

Majority rule, one person, one vote principles that we espouse so fervently here in our country, we are trying to espouse those same rights in Africa. To the extent that we fail to do that, it opens up an avenue for enhanced intrusion by the Soviets and the Cubans on a default basis.

We are working much more closely in harmony now with European leaders. For instance, in settling the Namibia question, we have a five-person committee working under the aegis of the United Nations—ourselves, Canada, Britain, France, West Germany—who are dealing directly with the South Africans and directly with the SWAPO organization. We have combined our efforts with the British in trying to resolve the Rhodesian question fairly, with open elections, free, so that any person can participate who chooses, and where the same basic form of elections can be held as are held here and in Great Britain.

We work with others who are interested in peace in Africa. The Saudi Arabians have been very helpful in providing some nonmilitary aid when countries get in bad economic circumstances. We are trying to help nations that have a one-commodity export dependence, like the Zambians with copper, and so forth, to have a much more stable market, better reserves.

So, in every possible way, on a peaceful basis, we cooperate with nations in need so they don't have to turn to the East, to the Soviets and through their surrogates, the Cubans, for help.

We are watching with great interest and concern now the degree of Soviet involvement in the internal matter in Ethiopia concerning the Eritreans. The Cubans, for instance, claim to be a non-aligned country. It's obvious that they are not nonaligned. They are the most heavily dependent and subservient countries that the Soviet Union, which I am aware of, certainly outside the Eastern Bloc itself. And we point this out frequently when we have visitors here from, say, Romania, or from Yugoslavia. We point out that military presence of the Cubans in Africa is inimicable to peaceful progress and is an unwarranted intrusion.

So, through all these matters we try to meet that challenge on a nonmilitary basis. We have a limited ability to supply defensive weapons to those countries, under very tight constraint from laws that control my actions, and we take advantage of that. So, those are some of the things we are doing, Bill, that I think are adequate.

I might make one other point that I made in Spokane the other day, and that is that in the long run we have an advantage, because I think we have a much more natural affinity for and compatibility with the black people of Africa than do the Soviets. They know that in the long run their economic well-being, democratic principles, basic human rights can be better guaranteed through a relationship with the Western democracies than with the Eastern totalitarian countries. And in many instances those leaders in Africa are deeply religious people, and they have some reluctance about affiliating themselves with the atheistic governments of Cuba and the Soviet Union. Those are some of the distinctions that are drawn between us and them.

NATURAL GAS DEREGULATION

Q. Mr. President, I'm from an oil- and gas-producing county in Texas. I wonder what the outlook is for the energy policy and deregulation of natural gas?

THE PRESIDENT. I think at this point it looks much better than it has in months. We've seen the two committees, two conference committees, the House and Senate, being almost exactly equally divided. As you know, the Senate committee, when it began to confer, was divided 9 to 9. And the unfortunate death of one of the committee members is the only thing that relieved the tie.

We've had the House committee conferees recently divided, I think, 13 to 13. And I know we've needed 13 votes to prevail. We see a prospect of step-by-step deregulation of natural gas at a rate of the inflation plus 4 percent, to be completed in early 1985 with, I think, adequate protection for consumers. And this would round out the fourth major element among the five in our comprehensive energy package. The one remaining, as I said, would deal with oil pricing.

So, I think at this time the prospect for success in the conference committee is very good. It's the first time I've been able to say that in 13 months.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Q. Mr. President, what, if anything, has been a new development in the Dominican Republic vote?

THE PRESIDENT. There have been three very distinguished citizens there who were invited in to monitor the outcome of the election and the proper procedures used, headed by Galo Plaza, who's a former executive secretary of the OAS—Secretary General. I understand that they are now on the way back to OAS headquarters.

We have expressed, through diplomatic channels and publicly, our deep concern about the interference in the electoral process by the Dominican Republic military. We've been assured repeatedly by Balaguer, the incumbent President, that the votes would be counted and counted honestly and that he would abide by the result of the election. Our impression is that the military does not want Guzmán to be elected President. They want Balaguer to stay in office. And the military are the ones who have interfered.

If it becomes obvious to us, after we analyze the procedures used in the election, that the will of the Dominican people has been subverted by illegalities or unwarranted interference in the democratic election process, this would have a major effect on the support that we would give to the future Dominican Government, and my guess is that we would turn then, also, to the Organization of American States for a thorough investigation of what did occur there.

We are quite concerned about this—we, the Venezuelans, the Colombians, the Costa Ricans, and others—because we believe so deeply that democracy must be improved among the nations of Latin America on their own initiative. We're not trying to interfere in the internal affairs of another country. But there are four other nations who presently are committed to democratic elections in the future, who now have military governments in varying forms. And I think if we should have a demonstration in the Dominican Republic, which is a very good democracy up until now, that those principles don't prevail, it would have an adverse effect on the entire Southern Hemisphere.

So, we are deeply concerned about it. We'll do all we can without interfering directly in the internal affairs of the Dominican Republic to let our concern be felt in a beneficial way.

PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Q. Is this country about to establish full diplomatic relations with Mainland China?

THE PRESIDENT. We don't know yet. Ever since President Nixon's highly publicized visit to the People's Republic, we have lived under the so-called Shanghai Communique commitments. I have reconfirmed my approval of those agreements, which do call for a normalization of relationships with the People's Republic of China.

Dr. Brzezinski is not going to Peking to negotiate normalization. He's going there to exchange ideas, to try to build up a better relationship between ourselves and the People's Republic, to enhance trade, to search out mutual interests that we have around the globe, and to let there be a better understanding between us and the people of Mainland China.

We recognize under the Shanghai Communique that there is one China. We insist that any differences between Taiwan and the Mainland be resolved peacefully, and we don't know yet with what degree of success the move toward normalization can be expedited. We just don't know yet.

RELATIONS WITH THE CONGRESS

Q. You mentioned earlier that reforming the civil service had been more than you anticipated.

THE PRESIDENT. No, I said that the problems in the bureaucracy had been more than I anticipated.

Q. Has your education in dealing with the Congress been similar?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I've had a good relationship with the Congress. I think when this term is concluded, for instance, and an inventory is made of what achievements we've realized, there will be a recognition that my relationship with the Congress has been very good. We've had some very difficult issues that we've addressed, some highly controversial matters and some hot debates, and some failures, of course.

But, for instance, the natural gas deregulation question has been one of the most controversial ever addressed by the Congress. I think the first natural gas deregulation bill was vetoed by Harry Truman, I think, in 1950 or so. For 30, 35 years, this has been a difficult matter to resolve.

I'm not saying flatly that this one will be resolved this year. My anticipation is that it will. But I think that if you look back a year ago on what were the most controversial questions, it was whether or not I would have the authority to reorganize the Government, whether or not we could form an Energy Department, whether or not we could have success in a comprehensive energy policy evolution in our country, or whether or not we could deal with the most crucial issue then, which was unemployment.

Since then, because of the action of the Congress in concert with me and my administration, we've added a net increase of 5.5 million jobs in this country, an unprecedented achievement, and the unemployment rate has dropped 2 percent.

Now the Congress and I, because of changing economic circumstances, because of an unanticipated success in the employment field, are much more deeply concerned now with controlling inflation than we were before. The inflation rate this year has built up more rapidly.

But I have an excellent relationship with the Democratic leadership and the Republican leadership in the House and Senate. We have meetings here over in the White House, every 2 weeks at least, with a complete group of Democratic leaders in the House and Senate. This past Tuesday morning, we had the Republicans and Democrats together. And so, I have been pleasantly surprised at the relationship that I have had with the Congress.

MR. WURFEL. Thank you, sir.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you all very much. I'll answer one more question, and then I'll go.

SOIL AND WATER CONSERVATION

Q. As I understand it, you proposed to reduce the number of soil conservationists in the Nation and cut funds for certain programs. In my State of Iowa, I understand it could be possibly 50. Are you going ahead with those cuts?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know. With the Soil Conservation offices, is that what you said?

Q. Conservationists.

THE PRESIDENT. Conservationists, oh. I don't know. We are trying to evolve now, approaching a final decision on basic water policy. And as Governor of Georgia, I've seen some very serious abuses in the Soil and Water Conservation Service. I understand that in the Midwest and the West, the same conditions don't prevail.

In Georgia, for instance, the abuses that I tried to correct, I think successfully while I was in office, was the unwarranted draining of freshwater wetland areas, which is highly costly, utilizes channelization, destroys the environmental protection for wildlife and game. I won't outline all the advantages there, but primarily the result is to reward financially the landowners who bought the property, knowing that it was a wetland and who want to have it changed into productive farmland at government expense when we have an adequate supply of farmland in Georgia.

Another problem in some of our mountain regions was in the design of dam structures in some of our smaller mountain streams, where the type of discharge raised the temperature of those mountain streams 10 to 15 degrees sometimes and therefore destroyed all the wildlife below the dam which had formerly been indigenous to that area.

So, I think the establishment of a good water policy will help to resolve those questions. But specifics on how many persons would be discharged, I'm not familiar with that at all and don't know of any plans to do that.

Let me say, again, that I appreciate you being here. And I would like, if you don't mind, for you to come by and let me have a photograph made with each one of you. It would be a pleasure for me.

NOTE: The interview began at 1:10 p.m. in the Cabinet Room at the White House. Walter W. Wurfel is Deputy Press Secretary.

The transcript of the interview was released on May 20.

White House Promenade

Remarks at the Reception for Members of Congress and Their Families. May 20, 1978

While you're getting settled, let me say the napkins and tablecloths were designed by Calvin Klein, and they are yours to take with you. We want you to remember this evening, and we'll remember it, too.

First of all, let me say that for Rosalynn and for Amy and for me, this is a wonderful occasion. We have the advantage as a family, along with Chip and Caron and Jeffrey and Annette and James, to live very close to where I work, which is over here in the Oval Office.

Many Members of Congress, however, don't have that easy a time being close to your families. And we thought it would be a very appropriate thing to have a family evening. God gave us beautiful weather and an almost full Moon that's coming up at the right time, and we are very delighted to have you here.

I might say that the evening has already been memorable because of the weather and the companionship. But the most exciting part of it is still to come.

A man who has played more good music for more Americans than anyone who's ever lived is here to conduct the finest music for us tonight. The Marine Band and representatives of the bands of the Army and the Air Force are being conducted by him.

This wonderful maestro came to our country from Russia in 1922. He's fallen in love with the United States and vice versa. He has sold more than 52 million records, which means that everybody in our country only has to share one of his records with three other people. And as you know, most of the time when Andre Kostelanetz starts to play, more than four people gather around to listen to the music.

This is the first time that Maestro Andre Kostelanetz has been to the White House to perform. And I'm especially glad that it's tonight for American families who are the leaders of our Nation and who represent not only the political structure of our Government but also try to exemplify for political and other reasons a fine and a solid and an exemplary family interrelationship.

This is a good time for us. He has shown his leadership already in getting perfect harmony from three different military services, which is something that I have not always been able to achieve myself. [Laughter] And I think that when you hear the last selection, which is the 1812 Overture, it will remind you of the kind of leadership breakfast that I have with the congressional leaders every 2 weeks. [Laughter]

So, welcome to the White House, to our home, and we're glad that you brought your families to hear Maestro Andre Kostelanetz and superb musicians from our military bands.

Maestro Kostelanetz.

NOTE: The President spoke at approximately 8 p.m. on the South Grounds of the White House.

Plains, Georgia

Informal Exchange With Reporters on Arrival at Peterson Field. May 21, 1978

Q. Mr. President, is our assistance to that Zaire operation ended, or is it still in progress?

THE PRESIDENT. It's just about over.

Q. It seemed to be a pretty successful operation?

THE PRESIDENT. I think so. From what we hear, the French and the Belgians and the Zairians have been successful. And we provided what logistic support they requested. And barring some unforeseen development, I think that my authorization for help is probably over. But we don't ever know what will happen in the future.

Knoxville, Tennessee

Remarks to Employees of the Tennessee Valley Authority. May 22, 1978

Senator Baker; Senator Sasser; Governor Blanton; Members of Congress who are here—Congressmen Allen and Duncan, Ford, Gore, Jones, Marilyn Lloyd—Secretary James Schlesinger; Director of the General Services Administration and a Tennessean, Jay Solomon; Mayor Tyree; Mayor Bissell of Oak Ridge, where I'll be going later on today; Speaker Ned McWherter, an old friend of mine; former Chairman, a great man, Red Wagner; Chairman Dave Freeman, and my friends from Tennessee:

I'm glad to be here. It's always a great honor for me to visit your State. I have been taken in by you as a friend. During my early campaign for the nomination as a Democrat to run for President, Georgia gave me more votes than any other State, but Tennessee was right behind with 78 percent. I'll always remember your friendship and your confidence, and I want to come here again today to thank you from the bottom of my heart.

Today I've come also because of a special interest—to visit with literally thousands of distinguished leaders and employees in one of the great institutions of America.

In 1933, after 16 years of debate in the Congress, there was created the Tennessee Valley Authority. At that time in this region and throughout the South, including where I lived in southern Georgia, there existed a depression in our economy and also of our human spirit. Our income was extremely low. Our soil was eroding rapidly. Our forests were being excessively exploited. Rich mineral resources were lying buried and undeveloped. And our use of energy resources was still in a relatively primitive stage.

TVA began to change all that. Dams were built throughout the Tennessee Valley to control floods and to generate badly needed electricity. Forests were replanted. Conservation was encouraged. Soil erosion was controlled. And good and cheap soil fertilizers were developed and distributed throughout the Southeast.

Farmers, manufacturers were encouraged to use the rich natural resources of the Tennessee Valley and to use them wisely. The TVA program was sound and innovative, and it set a fine pattern for change which has benefited our whole Nation.

I'm very pleased to meet with you today because I have long admired the superlative work of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

TVA has changed the lives of many millions of Southerners. Those of us who grew up on farms in the rural South saw firsthand the dramatic improvements in our lives that came when electricity replaced kerosene lamps and a lot of back-breaking work which bound our lives almost exclusively to duties within a given home or within a small family farm. TVA pioneered in creating rural cooperatives that brought the benefits of electricity to farms all over the Nation and gave us a new freedom, a new interest in a much broader and a much better personal world.

I've come because I want to acknowledge the fine work that TVA has done and to pledge you my support as President of the United States and to ask for your help in the expanded role that I see for TVA in years ahead.

The TVA has a unique requirement that members of the agency's Board of Directors be people who believe in the basic purposes for which TVA was established. Through the years, TVA has been led by outstanding people who have measured up to that standard well. Chairman Wagner's illustrious 44-year career personifies TVA's success story, and I thank him from the bottom of my heart.

I'm determined to appoint people to the Board who will continue strong leadership in TVA. I know that Dave Freeman, as a veteran of this valley and a native, shares this dedication. He cut his teeth professionally as an engineer in TVA. He came back here again to practice as a lawyer, and his thinking has been in the forefront of raising our national consciousness about how to produce and to use energy wisely and well. He's going to make an outstanding Chairman. And I will soon send the names of the other Board members to the Congress for confirmation.

We've never spent more time and effort in screening out a long list of potential appointees than we have for these two selections now before me. We have devoted the same amount of time and attention to it as in the original selection of my own Cabinet.

TVA has a long history of carrying out difficult assignments. We in this country are now facing problems of energy production and conservation, that we've never faced before, and the proper use of natural resources, which TVA is uniquely suited to help solve. In fact, if the U.S. Government didn't already have a TVA, I would be fighting to create one as part of the energy program.

TVA has that rare combination of skills needed to protect and to perfect our energy systems. Its power people can work shoulder to shoulder with its experts in biology, community development, pollution control, land use, and other fields necessary to carry out energy demonstrations that will again set standards of excellence for our entire Nation.

You are building nuclear powerplants—six, I believe—as safely and economically as is humanly possible and setting a good example for the Nation by minimizing the adverse impacts from their construction on the communities in which they will be located.

You are demonstrating that a Government agency can operate efficiently and cost-effectively. In almost every phase of electric service, your operating costs for electric power compare favorably with the average costs of private power companies nationwide.

As a result, in spite of rate increases mandated by the increasing costs of oil, coal, and nuclear fuel, Tennessee still has the lowest home electric rates of any State east of the Rocky Mountains.

I know it is frustrating to you to see costs increase in spite of your best efforts. I applaud the hard line that the TVA Board has recently taken to hold down rate increases, when they reduced a recommended rate increase by nearly one-third. But I expect the TVA and all Americans to do even more. Inflation is the Nation's number one economic problem. And while I realize that TVA must pay its increasing bills for fuel and labor and materials, that is all the more reason to redouble your efforts to control inflation.

Twenty years ago, TVA helped to expose a price fixing conspiracy in order to maintain competition in the electrical equipment field. Today, TVA is challenging an international uranium cartel and helping to lead the resistance to expanding oil company domination of all our energy resources.

This administration is with you in encouraging more competition and less concentration of economic power among the producers of petroleum, coal, and uranium. Energy prices must cover all legitimate costs of production, including environmental protection, but not waste and not windfall profits at the consumers' expense.

TVA's main job is to meet the needs of your own region. But in doing so you can help the Nation by demonstrating how a variety of production sources and conservation measures can add to our energy supplies in a socially acceptable manner.

After I took office last year, I suggested that TVA serve as a national proving ground for some of the new approaches, the necessarily new approaches to energy problems being developed in our national energy program. Chairman Wagner accepted that offer enthusiastically and came back and made a list of things, in addition, which TVA can do and will do to help with this great challenge in the future. David Freeman will provide the leadership to continue that effort.

I know, as a businessman myself, as a farmer in the southeast part of our country, how important it is for the TVA programs to have a long-range, sound, predictable, substantive status. There must be a way for business leaders, farmers, and others to make plans based upon a TVA program whose thrust is maintained, not just for months or years, but for decades.

Many of TVA's energy demonstration activities are still in the early stages, but they are an impressive beginning. In home insulation, which is particularly important to the customers you serve because so many homes are heated by electricity; in solar heating, a major responsibility of yours for the future; in commuter car-pooling, to save energy of all kinds; in pricing, rates to reduce peak load use; in advancing pollution control, which is necessary and has an increasingly complex technology; and in so many other areas, TVA is showing the way for the rest of the Nation.

Every American can take pride in what you have done and what you will do in the future. When the legislation to create TVA was signed by President Roosevelt, he said the new agency should be charged with the broadest duty of planning for the proper use, conservation, and development of the natural resources of the Tennessee Valley region.

I believe that is still the central part of TVA's even broader role today. We still need more effective planning for this country's future course. And I cannot imagine a job better suited to the origins and the traditions of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

TVA has harnessed the Tennessee River for the benefit of its people. And it has built an energy system that is the finest in the Nation. Your people have prospered because of this.

Now as you move past the national average in material wealth and employment for people who live in your region, formerly quite depressed compared to the rest of the country, I want to leave you with an even greater challenge. You can provide an alternative to the congested, polluted, unstabilized super-cities of tomorrow. Your planned industrial growth can help disperse population, creating new opportunities outside the major metropolitan centers in your own rapidly growing, prosperous communities.

The people who fill your new jobs can still have access to open space, to green fields and forests and lakes and streams. And so you have the opportunity to create living and working arrangements that can be a model for the rest of our Nation.

The people of the Tennessee Valley have a chance to demonstrate that full employment can be achieved without destroying the quality of the land or destroying the Earth.

If the Tennessee Valley can demonstrate a combination of big salaries and prosperity and a clean, friendly atmosphere of southern community living in the years ahead, then you will be an example to all Americans. You're already well on the road to such success. If President Franklin Roosevelt, Senator George Norris, and the other farsighted leaders who worked to establish TVA could be here again to see its current success, they would be as pleased as I am with the new programs TVA is undertaking in the national interest.

As was the case 45 years ago, you face great opportunities for sustained and beneficial growth, designed to conserve and not to waste, destined to lift the economic prosperity and the human spirit of those you serve.

On behalf of the people of the United States of America, I thank you for what you have done.

NOTE: The President spoke at 11:10 a.m. in the auditorium of the Civic Coliseum. In his opening remarks, he referred to Mayors Randell L. Tyree of Knoxville and A. K. Bissell of Oak Ridge, Ned McWherter, speaker of the Tennessee house of representatives, and Aubrey J. Wagner, former Chairman, and S. David Freeman, Chairman of the Board of Directors, Tennessee Valley Authority.

Oak Ridge, Tennessee

*Remarks at a Roundtable Discussion With Oak Ridge National Laboratory Scientists.
May 22, 1978*

Well, the first thing I want to say is that I'm very proud to be at Oak Ridge with all of you.

When I was in the nuclear program in the early fifties, Oak Ridge was almost like Mecca for us, because this is where the basic work was done that, first of all, contributed to the freedom of the world and ended the war and, secondly, shifted very rapidly to peaceful use of nuclear power.

I have never been here before. Admiral Rickover<sup>1</sup> has told me a lot about this place, and so has my wife, who came here during the campaign. But I know that your major thrust has now shifted away from the production of nuclear power for destructive purposes and toward a broad range of peaceful and constructive uses.

You still contribute to the defense of our country, for which I'm very grateful as Commander in Chief and as President. I think that we've now reached a time in the evolution of our country when your work is going to be of increasing importance. We are now addressing questions that have not been addressed adequately, questions that have not been solved or answered in the past.

The Nation is concerned about those problems that you are trying to solve here. And I think we've just now begun to realize the diversity of them and the interrelationship among them and how important international cooperation has become.

We've got a real need under the National Energy Plan, that we are now having considered by Congress, which we hope will soon be addressed successfully, a challenge for the future which you can help to solve—the accurate inventorying of our limited resources, the proper extraction, modification, distribution, use of those resources, how to eliminate waste and get maximum benefit for our people from what God has given us in minerals and through the Sun and through our water and land supplies.

We've got, I think, a burgeoning concern about the health or environmental impact of long-term exposure to both very small quantities of radiation and to what was formerly considered to be negligible amounts of pollution in the air, in the water and the land. And your work here is contributing greatly to understanding these complex matters and to deriving answers to those questions as well.

In the future, I think the success that we will strive to achieve in the energy field is heavily on your shoulders. You've been blessed by a concentration here of superb intelligence and experience, a breadth of knowledge and unlimited vision among the scientists and those who support them.

We've got some technologies that are already well underway—the fluidized bed coal combustion—others that are not quite so far along but still have not yet been utilized fully—the gas-cooled reactor, breeder technology in all its forms, how to expedite and make more energy efficient the enrichment of uranium to determine the limits on its proper use, other radioactive materials to be used, like thorium.

Far into the future perhaps—not quite so far if you are successful—is the use of fusion power. I know that you've had great scientific achievements here in reaching perhaps the highest temperatures of anywhere else on Earth. And we still have, as you well know, three limiting factors on having a successful and sustained fusion process here on Earth, and the work here at Oak Ridge can contribute greatly to that.

We've not yet been able to solve the question of proper disposal of nuclear wastes, even though your work at Oak Ridge in the production of fissionable quality nuclear material began many decades ago. And I think the whole world still waits for a clear concept of how used nuclear fuels can be stored and preserved, perhaps for additional use in the future, without danger to our life or the quality of our existence.

We've initiated—Secretary Schlesinger, working closely with me, Secretary of State Vance, and others—an international nuclear fuel cycle study to evaluate the inventory of nuclear fuels throughout the world, how they might be mined, how they might be purified or concentrated in their fissionable qualities, how they might be burned more expeditiously and with higher efficiency, how the power from them might be distributed, how we might prevent their being converted into explosives for the destruction of humankind, and how the waste might be disposed.

These are questions of increasing interest to many nations in the world who have not yet been involved in the nuclear generation, but we and our own allies and friends, even our potential political enemies are trying to work now in harmony to answer many of these questions which address you.

And the last point that I'd like to make that is a major responsibility of yours that I recognize very clearly, is that of public education. I think there are a lot of misapprehensions about energy of all kinds, in particular, nuclear fuels.

We've tried to expedite the licensing process. It takes, quite often, 12 years or so from the time when a decision is made, a firm decision to construct a nuclear powerplant in the United States, to the time it actually begins to produce usable quantities of electricity or other power. This is excessive time required.

And the proper balancing of environmental constraints with the expeditious supply of nuclear power for our people is one that is a responsibility of yours and also of mine.

So, I recognize that you have great work ongoing here, some much too advanced for me to comprehend or to understand. But you've got my appreciation and my support.

And I hope that this visit here will not only be instructive for me but it will help to clarify some of the interrelationships that exist between you and me, and will let me, Frank Press, my Science Adviser, Dr. Schlesinger, who's head of the new Department of Energy, and you work with a greater sense of partnership, mutual commitment, and the assurance of success that we have experienced even in the past.

So, on behalf of the people of our country, I want to thank you and express my admiration for what you've already achieved and let you know that I am sure, because of the quality of your work, that your achievements will be much greater and much more beneficial in the future.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 1 p.m. in the Central Auditorium at the Oak Ridge National Laboratory Headquarters. Following his remarks, the President, Secretary of Energy James R. Schlesinger, John M. Deutch, Director of the Office of Energy Research, Department of Energy, and Frank Press, Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy, participated in the discussion with Oak Ridge scientists.

During his visit to the Oak Ridge facilities, the President viewed several displays in connection with the Laboratory's research and toured the Gaseous Diffusion Facility.

Presidential Management Improvement Awards

*Remarks on Presenting the Awards for 1977.
May 23, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. We seem to have the Rose Garden full of proud people this afternoon, and I share that pride.

One of the consistent efforts of my own administration since I've been in office has been to improve the quality of service that our Federal Government provides to the American people. Every one of us here and every one of our associates and fellow workers throughout the Government has the job we have because the American people want and expect us to serve their needs and to serve them well. We are here for that purpose and for that purpose only, from the President of the United States on down.

The American people are not happy about the level of service that they have been receiving from their Government. I find that dissatisfaction every time I travel around the country. And it comes as no surprise to me. I know that there are many dedicated people in this Government who share my belief that Government performance can and should be improved.

The most effective and fundamental improvement that we can make is to reform the civil service system, to make it truly a merit system that rewards achievement and responds to human needs. I took the first and major step toward that in March when I sent to the Congress the first part of the civil service reform proposals. I'm very pleased at the prompt attention that Congress has given to this legislation. Committees in both the House and Senate have held extensive hearings already. The Senate began its markup this week, and we expect the House to begin quite soon.

Today I'm sending to the Congress the second and the final part of the civil service reform proposals, the reorganization plan itself. It creates an Office of Personnel Management to replace our antiquated and unfair hiring practices with the same kind of modern personnel management that is routine in any efficient, private, industrial organization.

It creates an independent Merit Systems Protection Board to safeguard the legitimate rights of Federal employees and to give active assistance and support to those employees who "blow the whistle" on illegal or improper activities.

It also creates a Federal Labor Relations Authority to provide a fairer and a more efficient way of handling labor and management disputes within the Government.

Congress has 60 days now to consider this reorganization plan before it takes effect. We've worked very closely with the Congress, and I'm confident that it deserves congressional support. And I think we will look back on this afternoon as the beginning of a very significant chapter in the improvement of our Government.

We have some people here today, some very distinguished guests whose personal accomplishments serve as a reminder of how much difference one person's efforts can make, even in a system such as we have now that is sometimes not conducive to excellence.

Each of these 11 guests is a Federal employee who has made exceptional contributions toward improving governmental economy and effectiveness. I've been told that if you add up the savings to the taxpayers brought about by just these 11 people, it comes to more than $13,500,000. And I have signed congratulatory letters to more than 550 other Federal employees for outstanding contributions of a like manner.

They did it through personal imagination, through personal diligence, through personal initiative. We have some awards to present them which they truly deserve.

Let me say that the point I want to make this afternoon—and I think all of them here with me would agree—that instead of giving awards once a year on special occasions to a few of the most outstanding employees, what we need most is a civil service system that rewards good performance every day, day in and day out.

Today I want to congratulate these people who personify the spirit of quality performance that I and they are all determined to extend throughout our Government. Congratulations to all of you. You've made us very proud. You've served our Government well, and these awards are certainly deserved because of your outstanding contributions.

ALAN K. CAMPBELL. The President will make the awards individually.

First, from the Department of Interior, Dr. Joseph M. Botbol and Roger W. Bowen for development of a computer-based system that facilitates handling and analysis of mineral and energy research information and has saved the Government an estimated $1.5 million.

From the Department of the Treasury, Yolanda H. Carrillo, for suggesting a change in procedures for preparing corrections to data in the Internal Revenue Service ADP system that has resulted in an estimated $184,000 savings during its first year.

From the Department of Agriculture, Dr. Ernest L. Corley, for outstanding leadership in the reorganization within the Agricultural Research Service and in the design of an effective management planning system.

From the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, Mr. Curtis R. Helms and Mr. Thomas W. Winstead, for exceptional engineering achievement in redesigning the space shuttle external fuel tank, resulting in less cost per flight, creating payload capability and total program savings of $5.8 million.

From the Veterans Administration, Mr. Jack B. Johnson, for suggesting a change in the method of installing cash registers supplied to the hospital canteen service, which has saved the Government $100,000.

From the Department of the Navy, Mr. Thomas H. Mills, Mr. Milford Rhodes, and Mr. Winfred Hodges for suggesting a method for reclaiming fuel oil which otherwise would have been unusable that saved the Government approximately $180,000.

And finally, from the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Mr. L. David Taylor, for outstanding management and administrative initiatives which significantly improved the Department's services to the public and saved an estimated $6 million.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think you can all see what the reasons are for the broad smiles that have been up here this afternoon and for the sense of partnership that we feel in striving on a daily basis to make our Government more effective and more efficient and to provide those services which the American people deserve and which they expect of us.

I want to say that these are not persons who are exceptional in that they share high achievement and deep dedication with many hundreds of thousands of fellow governmental workers, and this inspiration to them in being honored, I'm sure, will encourage others to achieve just as high a service to the American people.

I think that one of the most impressive thoughts that have come to me since I've been in the White House is how deeply dedicated civil servants are, how they want to do an even better job, and how sometimes the bureaucratic obstacles make it very difficult for them to do so. But these 11 men and women have surmounted those obstacles and have proven themselves to be outstanding in every respect.

Thank you again very much, and congratulations from all of us.

Federal Civil Service Reorganization

Message to the Congress Transmitting
Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1978.
May 23, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

On March 2nd I sent to Congress a Civil Service Reform proposal to enable the Federal government to improve its service to the American people.

Today I am submitting another part of my comprehensive proposal to reform the Federal personnel management system through Reorganization Plan No. 2 of 1978. The plan will reorganize the Civil Service Commission and thereby create new institutions to increase the effectiveness of management and strengthen the protection of employee rights.

The Civil Service Commission has acquired inherently conflicting responsibilities: to help manage the Federal Government and to protect the rights of Federal employees. It has done neither job well. The Plan would separate the two functions.

OFFICE OF PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

The positive personnel management tasks of the government—such as training, productivity programs, examinations, and pay and benefits administration—would be the responsibility of an Office of Personnel Management. Its Director, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, would be responsible for administering Federal personnel matters except for Presidential appointments. The Director would be the government's principal representative in Federal labor relations matters.

MERIT SYSTEMS PROTECTION BOARD

The adjudication and prosecution responsibilities of the Civil Service Commission will be performed by the Merit Systems Protection Board. The Board will be headed by a bipartisan panel of three members appointed to six-year, staggered terms. This Board would be the first independent and institutionally impartial Federal agency solely for the protection of Federal employees.

The Plan will create, within the Board, a Special Counsel to investigate and prosecute political abuses and merit system violations. Under the civil service reform legislation now being considered by the Congress, the Counsel would have power to investigate and prevent reprisals against employees who report illegal acts—the so-called “whistleblowers.” The Counsel would be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

FEDERAL LABOR RELATIONS AUTHORITY

An Executive Order now vests existing labor-management relations in a part-time Federal Labor-Relations Council, comprised of three top government managers; other important functions are assigned to the Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations. This arrangement is defective because the Council members are part-time, they come exclusively from the ranks of management and their jurisdiction is fragmented.

The Plan I submit today would consolidate the central policy-making functions in labor-management relations now divided between the Council and the Assistant Secretary into one Federal Labor Relations Authority. The Authority would be composed of three full-time members appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Its General Counsel, also appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, would present unfair labor practice complaints. The Plan also provides for the continuance of the Federal Service Impasses Panel within the Authority to resolve negotiating impasses between Federal employee unions and agencies.

The cost of replacing the Civil Service Commission can be paid by our present resources. The reorganization itself would neither increase nor decrease the costs of personnel management throughout the government. But taken together with the substantive reforms I have proposed, this Plan will greatly improve the government's ability to manage programs, speed the delivery of Federal services to the public, and aid in executing other reorganizations I will propose to the Congress, by improving Federal personnel management.

Each of the provisions of this proposed reorganization would accomplish one or more of the purposes set forth in 5 U.S.C. 901(a). No functions are abolished by the Plan, but the offices referred to in 5 U.S.C. 5109(b) and 5 U.S.C. 1103(d) are abolished. The portions of the Plan providing for the appointment and pay for the head and one or more officers of the Office of Personnel Management, the Merit Systems Protection Board, the Federal Labor Relations Authority and the Federal Service Impasses Panel, are necessary to carry out the reorganization. The rates of compensation are comparable to those for similar positions within the Executive Branch.

I am confident that this Plan and the companion civil service reform legislation will both lead to more effective protection of Federal employees' legitimate rights and a more rewarding workplace. At the same time the American people will benefit from a better managed, more productive and more efficient Federal Government.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 OF 1978

Prepared by the President and transmitted to the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled, May 23, 1978, pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 9 of Title 5 of the United States Code.

PART I. OFFICE OF PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

SECTION 101. Establishment of the Office of Personnel Management and its Director and Other Matters. There is hereby established as an independent establishment in the Executive Branch, the Office of Personnel Management (the "Office"). The head of the Office shall be the Director of the Office of Personnel Management (the "Director"), who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter provided for level II of the Executive Schedule. The position referred to in 5 U.S.C. 5109(b) is hereby abolished.

SECTION 102. Transfer of Functions. Except as otherwise specified in this Plan, all functions vested by statute in the United States Civil Service Commission, or the Chairman of said Commission, or the Boards of Examiners established by 5 U.S.C. 1105 are hereby transferred to the Director of the Office of Personnel Management.

SECTION 103. Deputy Director and Associate Directors.

(a) There shall be within the Office a Deputy Director who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and who shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter provided for level III of the Executive Schedule. The Deputy Director shall perform such functions as the Director may from time to time prescribe and shall act as Director during the absence or disability of the Director or in the event of a vacancy in the Office of the Director.

(b) There shall be within the Office not more than five Associate Directors, who shall be appointed by the Director in the excepted service, shall have such titles as the Director shall from time to time determine, and shall receive compensation at the rate now or hereafter provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule.

SECTION 104. Functions of the Director. The functions of the Director shall include, but not be limited to, the following:

(a) Aiding the President, as the President may request, in preparing such rules as the President prescribes, for the administration of civilian employment now within the jurisdiction of the United States Civil Service Commission;

(b) Advising the President, as the President may request, on any matters pertaining to civilian employment now within the jurisdiction of the United States Civil Service Commission;

(c) Executing, administering and enforcing the Civil Service rules and regulations of the President and the Office and the statutes governing the same, and other activities of the Office including retirement and classification activities except to the extent such functions remain vested in the Merit Systems Protection Board pursuant to Section 202 of this Plan, or are transferred to the Special Counsel pursuant to Section 204 of this Plan;

(d) Conducting or otherwise providing for studies and research for the purpose of assuring improvements in personnel management, and recommending to the President actions to promote an efficient Civil Service and a systematic application of the merit system principles, including measures relating to the selection, promotion, transfer, performance, pay, conditions of service, tenure, and separations of employees; and

(e) Performing the training responsibilities now performed by the United States Civil Service Commission as set forth in 5 U.S.C. Chapter 41.

SECTION 105. Authority to Delegate Functions. The Director may delegate, from time to time, to the head of any agency employing persons in the competitive service, the performance of all or any part of those functions transferred under this Plan to the Director which relate to employees, or applicants for employment, of such agency.

PART II. MERIT SYSTEMS PROTECTION BOARD

SECTION 201. Merit Systems Protection Board.

(a) The United States Civil Service Commission is hereby redesignated the Merit Systems Protection Board. The Commissioners of the United States Civil Service Commission are hereby redesignated as members of the Merit Systems Protection Board (the "Board").

(b) The Chairman of the Board shall be its chief executive and administrative officer. The position of Executive Director, established by 5 U.S.C. 1103(d), is hereby abolished.

SECTION 202. Functions of the Merit Systems Protection Board and Related Matters.

(a) There shall remain with the Board the hearing, adjudication, and appeals functions of the United States Civil Service Commission specified in 5 U.S.C. 1104 (b) (4) (except hearings, adjudications and appeals with respect to examination ratings), and also found in the following statutes:

(i) 5 U.S.C. 1504-1507, 7325, 5335, 7521, 7701 and 8347(d);

(ii) 38 U.S.C. 2023

(b) There shall remain with the Board the functions vested in the United States Civil Service Commission, or its Chairman, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 1104(a)(5) and (b)(4) to enforce decisions rendered pursuant to the authorities described in Subsection (a) of this Section.

(c) Any member of the Board may request from the Director, in connection with a matter then pending before the Board for adjudication, an advisory opinion concerning interpretation of rules, regulations, or other policy directives promulgated by the Office of Personnel Management.

(d) Whenever the interpretation or application of a rule, regulation, or policy directive of the Office of Personnel Management is at issue in any hearing, adjudication, or appeal before the Board, the Board shall promptly notify the Director, and the Director shall have the right to intervene in such proceedings.

(e) The Board shall designate individuals to chair performance rating boards established pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 4305.

(f) The Chairman of the Board shall designate representatives to chair boards of review established pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 3383(b).

(g) The Board may from time to time conduct special studies relating to the Civil Service, and to other merit systems in the Executive Branch and report to the President and the Congress whether the public interest in a work force free of personnel practices prohibited by law or regulations is being adequately protected. In carrying out this function the Board shall make such inquiries as may be necessary, and, to the extent permitted by law, shall have access to personnel records or information collected by the Office of Personnel Management and may require additional reports from other agencies as needed. The Board shall make such recommendations to the President and the Congress as it deems appropriate.

(h) The Board may delegate the performance of any of its administrative functions to any officer or employee of the Board.

(i) The Board shall have the authority to prescribe such regulations as may be necessary for the performance of its functions. The Board shall not issue advisory opinions. The Board may issue rules and regulations, consistent with statutory requirements, defining its review procedures, including the time limits within which an appeal must be filed and the rights and responsibilities of the parties to an appeal. All regulations of the Board shall be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

SECTION 203. Savings Provision. The Board shall accept appeals from agency actions effected prior to the effective date of this Plan. On the effective date of Part II of this Plan, proceedings then before the Federal Employee Appeals Authority shall continue before the Board; proceedings then before the Appeals Review Board and proceedings then before the United States Civil Service Commission on appeal from decisions of the Appeals Review Board shall continue before the Board; other employee appeals before boards or other bodies pursuant to law or regulation shall continue to be processed pursuant to those laws or regulations. Nothing in this section shall affect the right of a Federal employee to judicial review under applicable law.

SECTION 204. The Special Counsel.

(a) There shall be a Special Counsel to the Board appointed for a term of four years by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall be compensated as now or hereafter provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule.

(b) There are hereby transferred to the Special Counsel all functions with respect to investigations relating to violations of 5 U.S.C. Chapter 15; 5 U.S.C. Subchapter III of Chapter 73 (Political Activities); and 5 U.S.C. 552(a)(4)(F) (public information).

(c) The Special Counsel may investigate, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 1303, allegations of personnel practices which are prohibited by law or regulation.

(d) When in the judgment of the Special Counsel, such personnel practices exist, he shall report his findings and recommendations to the Chairman of the Merit Systems Protection Board, the agency affected, and to the Office of Personnel Management, and may report such findings to the President.

(e) When in the judgment of the Special Counsel, the results of an investigation would warrant the taking of disciplinary action against an employee who is within the jurisdiction of the Board, the Special Counsel shall prepare charges against such employee and present them with supporting documentation to the Board. Evidence supporting the need for disciplinary action against a Presidential appointee shall be submitted by the Special Counsel to the President.

(f) The Special Counsel may appoint personnel necessary to assist in the performance of his functions.

(g) The Special Counsel shall have the authority to prescribe rules and regulations relating to the receipt and investigation of matters under his jurisdiction. Such regulations shall be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

(h) The Special Counsel shall not issue advisory opinions.

PART III. FEDERAL LABOR RELATIONS AUTHORITY

SECTION 301. Establishment of the Federal Labor Relations Authority.

(a) There is hereby established, as an independent establishment in the Executive Branch, the Federal Labor Relations Authority (the "Authority"). The Authority shall be composed of three members, one of whom shall be Chairman, not more than two of whom may be adherents of the same political party, and none of whom may hold another office or position in the Government of the United States except where provided by law or by the President.

(b) Members of the Authority shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The President shall designate one member to serve as Chairman of the Authority, who shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter provided for level III of the Executive Schedule. The other members shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule.

(c) The initial members of the Authority shall be appointed as follows: one member for a term of two years; one member for a term of three years; and the Chairman for a term of four years. Thereafter, each member shall be appointed for a term of four years. An individual chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed for the unexpired term of the member replaced.

(d) The Authority shall make an annual report on its activities to the President for transmittal to Congress.

SECTION 302. Establishment of the General Counsel of the Authority. There shall be a General Counsel of the Authority, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate for a term of four years, and who shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter provided for level V of the Executive Schedule. The General Counsel shall perform such duties as the Authority shall from time to time prescribe, including but not limited to the duty of determining and presenting facts required by the Authority in order to decide unfair labor practice complaints.

SECTION 303. The Federal Service Impasses Panel. The Federal Service Impasses Panel, established under Executive Order 11491, as amended, (the "Panel") shall continue, and shall be a distinct organizational entity within the Authority.

SECTION 304. Functions. Subject to the provisions of Section 306, the following functions are hereby transferred:

(a) To the Authority—

(1) The functions of the Federal Labor Relations Council pursuant to Executive Order 11491, as amended;

(2) The functions of the Civil Service Commission under Sections 4(a) and 6 (e) of Executive Order 11491, as amended;

(3) The functions of the Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations, under Executive Order 11491, as amended, except for those functions related to alleged violations of the standards of conduct for labor organizations pursuant to Section 6(a) (4) of said Executive Order; and,

(b) to the Panel—the functions and authorities of the Federal Service Impasses Panel, pursuant to Executive Order 11491, as amended.

SECTION 305. Authority Decisions. The decisions of the Authority on any matter within its jurisdiction shall be final and not subject to judicial review.

SECTION 306. Other Provisions. Unless and until modified, revised, or revoked, all policies, regulations, and procedures established, and decisions issued, under Executive Order 11491, as amended, shall remain in full force and effect. There is hereby expressly reserved to the President the power to modify the functions transferred to the Federal Labor Relations Authority and the Federal Service Impasses Panel pursuant to Section 304 of this Plan.

SECTION 307. Savings Provision. All matters which relate to the functions transferred by Section 304 of this Plan, and which are pending on the effective date of the establishment of the Authority before the Federal Labor Relations Council, the Vice Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, or the Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations shall continue before the Authority under such rules and procedures as the Authority shall prescribe. All such matters pending on the effective date of the establishment of the Authority before the Panel, shall continue before the Panel under such rules and procedures as the Panel shall prescribe.

PART IV. GENERAL PROVISIONS

SECTION 401. Incidental Transfer. So much of the personnel, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations and other funds employed, used, held, available, or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred under this Plan, as the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall determine, shall be transferred to the appropriate agency, or component at such time or times as the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall provide, except that no such unexpended balances transferred shall be used for purposes other than those for which the appropriation was originally made. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall provide for terminating the affairs of any agencies abolished herein and for such further measures and dispositions as such Director deems necessary to effectuate the purposes of this Reorganization Plan.

SECTION 402. *Interim Officers.

(a) The President may authorize any persons who, immediately prior to the effective date of this Plan, held positions in the Executive Branch of the Government, to act as Director of the Office of Personnel Management, the Deputy Director of the Office of Personnel Management, the Special Counsel, the Chairman and other members of the Federal Labor Relations Authority, the Chairman and other members of the Federal Service Impasses Panel, or the General Counsel of the Authority, until those offices are for the first time filled pursuant to the provisions of this Reorganization Plan or by recess appointment, as the case may be.

(b) The President may authorize any such person to receive the compensation attached to the Office in respect of which that person so serves, in lieu of other compensation from the United States.

SECTION 403. *Effective Date. The provisions of this Reorganization Plan shall become effective at such time or times, on or before January 1, 1979, as the President shall specify, but not sooner than the earliest time allowable under Section 906 of Title 5, United States Code.

Assistance for Refugees in Somalia and Djibouti

Memorandum From the President.
May 23, 1978

Presidential Determination No. 78-12

Memorandum for the Secretary of State

Subject: Determination pursuant to Section 2(c)(1) of the Migration and Refugee Assistance Act of 1962, as amended, (The "Act") authorizing the obligation of $750,000 of funds made available under the United States Emergency Refugee and Migration Assistance Fund

In order to meet emergent needs of refugees who are in Somalia and Djibouti as a result of hostilities in the Horn of Africa, I hereby determine, pursuant to Section 2(c)(1) of the Act, that it is important to the national interest that up to $750,000 in funds appropriated under the United States Emergency Refugee and Migration Assistance Fund be made available for assistance to such refugees. This assistance will be furnished through contributions to the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, international organizations and voluntary agencies helping these refugees.

The Secretary of State is requested to inform the appropriate committees of Congress of the Determination and the obligation of funds made under their authority.

This determination shall be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

Private Sector Initiative Program

Remarks at a White House Meeting on the Employment Program. May 23, 1978

I'll just be with you here for a few minutes, and then I'll be back with you again for supper.

This afternoon I've been having budget hearings for fiscal year 1980, and I've also been getting good news from some of the business leaders about their commitment to our effort to hold down the inflation rate.

We've had remarkable success in the last 16 months in dealing with the very severe problem that we faced at the beginning of last year on massive unemployment.

ment in our country. It was sapping away the economic strength of our Nation and, I think, was a very depressing thing for all the American people. The unemployment rate was almost 8 percent. And with the help of the private sector of our country in particular, business and labor, with the cooperation between the White House and the Congress, we initiated joint programs which have had remarkably successful achievements.

In the last 16 months we've seen a net increase of 5½ million jobs, an almost unprecedented achievement. And I think it's kind of revitalized the country's attitude toward the future.

Of course, we still have economic problems, as you well know. One is the unanticipated increase in the inflation this year, which we are trying to address as enthusiastically as we can and with the same kind of partnership that we established and which was so successful in dealing with unemployment.

And the other thing that we are working on today and tonight with you is to deal with those who have not benefited from the reduction in the unemployment rate. We still have 6 percent of the American people who don't know that we've made progress with unemployment, because they still are unemployed. And quite often they are the ones that are the most difficult to employ and to keep on a job permanently.

Part of the problem is, I would say, inadvertent discrimination. We hire young people, women, minority groups last. And when economic necessities fall on us, or when we make a routine change, they are the first ones that are discharged from their jobs.

Quite often they are the ones who need a job most because they don't have mobility and they are often illiterate and they are not part of the social structure where they can be adequately supported from their neighbors. And they don't know the opportunities that do exist just in a different part of town or over the hill in a different community where a much more qualified person could go and find a job.

We are here tonight to begin a new partnership between government and the private sector, to ease this particular difficult problem that's known as structural employment. We urgently need training and job opportunities for the large number of unskilled men and women who have been left jobless in these times of relatively high employment in our country. And where we have the greatest need for jobs is in the private sector, jobs that can lead to useful careers for people that sometimes don't even know the meaning of the word "career." And I'm asking, with every anticipation of success, that business and labor join me in this effort. This will involve unprecedented cooperation at all levels of government—the local, State, and the Federal levels of government—private business, labor, as we establish Private Industry Councils to develop local programs.

I'm happy to note that this request to establish these councils has already been approved by the full committees in the House and Senate as part of the CETA reauthorization bill.

We've also asked Congress for $400 million for fiscal year 1979, beginning October 1 of this year, to fund training programs in the private sector. As the councils, that will be established with your help, and the local CETA officials work together, along with the targeted tax credit that we've sent to Congress, the Private Industry Councils will be the tools that we need for a strong and effective attack on this persistent problem.

Within the executive branch of Government, I have asked the Vice President to chair a high-level task force to provide continuing focus and coordination for a national effort to reduce youth unemployment. This is one of the rare times that I've asked the Vice President to take a specific assignment of this kind. Ordinarily he helps me with more general subjects and is kind of an assistant President. But in this particular case, I believe that the problems of youth unemployment are bad enough to ask him to take on this special assignment.

This task force which he heads will include the Secretaries of each of the major Federal agencies with direct program responsibilities: Ray Marshall, Secretary of Labor; Joe Califano, Secretary of HEW; Juanita Kreps, who is the Secretary of Commerce; Mike Blumenthal, Secretary of the Treasury; and of course, Pat Harris, who is Secretary of HUD. Four of those Cabinet Secretaries are behind me now on the stage, and they will be working very closely with you. Joe Califano and Mike Blumenthal couldn't be here yet. They may be here later this afternoon.

And in the private sector, I've asked the National Alliance of Businessmen to provide leadership within the business community and technical assistance at the local level.

This new partnership in employment policy exemplifies our entire urban program, government and the private sector working together for the common good. But the progress will only be as successful as efforts at the local level make it. We can't manage this program effectively from Washington.

I pledge the wholehearted support of my entire administration in reaching the continuing and often moving goal of putting America back to work. And it's with a great deal of assurance that I as President put my confidence in you and understand that a major portion of the success of this effort will depend on the degree of enthusiasm that you show for this program.

Nothing that you could do could be more contributive to a better America and, at the same time, your own profits. And the people who look to you for leadership will be gratified. So it's a good partnership. I think we'll all enjoy the challenge, and I have no doubt that we'll meet that challenge successfully.

Thank you very much. I'll leave now and let you to go to work, and I will join you tonight for the celebration. Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 5:05 p.m. in the East Room at the White House to a group of business, labor, community, and government executives assembled to discuss the program.

Following the meeting, the President hosted a dinner for the participants in the State Dining Room at the White House.

Hospital Cost Containment Legislation

*Letter to Members of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.
May 23, 1978*

The most pressing problem facing this Nation is inflation. And one of its most important causes is the precipitous rise in health care costs. Over the last three years, inflation in the health care industry has been 1½ times greater than the rate of increase for all consumer prices.

The most important immediate step this Nation can take to hold down the intolerable rise in health costs is to pass legislation containing hospital costs—which constitute 40% of health costs and which have been rising about 2½ times faster than the national rate of inflation.

Last year I sent the Congress legislation that would put the brakes on out-of-control hospital costs without affecting the quality of care. That legislation is one of my top priorities today.

I urge you, as a member of the Commerce Committee of the House, to help bring spiralling health care costs back in line with the rest of the economy by passing that legislation at your forthcoming markup.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

Treaty for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America

Message to the Senate Transmitting Additional Protocol I. May 24, 1978

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith Additional Protocol I to the Treaty for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America. The Protocol was signed by me on behalf of the United States on May 26, 1977.

For the information of the Senate, I transmit also the report of the Department of State on the Protocol and a copy of the Treaty to which it pertains.

The Treaty for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America, done at Mexico City, February 14, 1967, constitutes the first successful attempt to establish a nuclear weapon-free zone in any populated area of the world. The Treaty itself is open only to States located in the zone and has been signed by all of them, with the exception of Cuba and Guyana. It has been ratified by all signatories, except Argentina, which announced in November 1977 its intention to ratify the Treaty. It is not yet in force for Brazil and Chile. At present, it is in force for twenty-two States.

The Treaty is accompanied by two Protocols. Protocol II to the Treaty, intended for signature by nuclear weapon States, was ratified by the United States on May 12, 1971. It calls on the nuclear weapon States to respect the Latin American Nuclear Free Zone, not to contribute to any violation of the Treaty, and not to use or threaten to use nuclear weapons against the Parties to the Treaty. Other nuclear weapon States that have ratified Protocol II are France, the People's Republic of China and the United Kingdom.

Protocol I, transmitted today for your advice and consent to ratification, is open to all States having international responsibility, de jure or de facto, for territories lying within the zone of application defined in the Treaty. It has been ratified by the Netherlands and the United Kingdom and obligates States adhering to it to apply pertinent provisions of the Treaty to such territories lying within the zone. The territories affected by United States adherence include Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, the Canal Zone (until entry into force of the Panama Canal Treaties), and our military base at Guantanamo.

I am convinced that it is in the best interest of the United States to ratify Protocol I. Such a step will strengthen our relations with our Latin American neighbors, further our global non-proliferation and arms control objectives and contribute to the full realization of the Latin American Nuclear Free Zone. It is my sincere hope that adherence by the United States to Protocol I will induce other countries, eligible to become Parties to the Treaty or its Protocols, to take the necessary steps so that the Treaty may enter into full force and effect for the entire zone of application.

I recommend that the Senate give early and favorable consideration to Additional Protocol I and give its advice and consent to ratification, with the same understandings and declarations attached to United States ratification of Protocol II, and with the additional understandings and declarations concerning transit and transport privileges, exercise of the freedoms of the seas and passage through territorial waters, which accompany the report of the Department of State.

National Commission on the International Year of the Child, 1979

Letter to the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate Transmitting Proposed Legislation. May 24, 1978

Dear Mr. Speaker: (Dear Mr. President:)

I am transmitting today a bill to provide for a National Commission on the International Year of the Child, 1979.

Enactment of this legislation will enable the United States to participate fully in celebrating 1979 as the International Year of the Child, which was designated by the United Nations General Assembly by approval of a resolution of its thirty-first session.

This National Commission will create within the United States a better understanding of the needs of children, both here and abroad, and will prepare a report and recommendations on national policies to meet these needs.

The powers granted to the National Commission under this Act will be in addition to those provided in Executive Order 12053.

I urge its early passage.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

Ford Portraits Unveiling Ceremony

Remarks on the Presentation to the White House of the Portraits of the Former President and First Lady. May 24, 1978

PRESIDENT CARTER. It's with a great deal of pride that I come this afternoon to welcome back to the White House one of my good friends, advisers, counselors, and helpers in the difficult decisions that I as President have to make, and which he made so well when he occupied this home and served in the Oval Office.

He's a man who came to lead our Nation in a time of crisis and strain, and he brought the capability and the attitude and knowledge and experience to heal our wounds. And the entire Nation is indebted to him. He's a man who is beloved and appreciated, and no one appreciates him more than I do.

And it's also a pleasure for me and Rosalynn to welcome his wife, Betty, who I think is perhaps the most popular person in our country, including Jerry Ford, and certainly including myself, who has earned the admiration of our Nation with her courage and complete candor. And we care for her, and I know that the people of our country will be deeply moved and appreciative to have these two portraits hanging in the President's house.

President Ford's portrait will be on this floor, and the former First Lady's portrait will be on the ground floor of the White House, where it will be viewed by thousands of people every day who will be reminded, as they look at these two beautiful portraits, of the wonderful service performed by President Jerry Ford and his wife, Betty.

You're welcome back to the White House, Jerry and Betty, and as personal friends of yours and also as the President of our country now, I want to express my friendship towards you and my deep appreciation for what you have meant to our country and what you still mean to the people of the United States.

NASH CASTRO. Mr. President, Mrs. Carter, President Ford, Mrs. Ford, distinguished guests, all:

History is a succession of random events, and 17 years is a short time as history goes. But its passing is a proper and convenient point at which to recall a noteworthy event in the history of this great house.

The White House Historical Association is now in its 17th year. It is unique in being the first nonprofit organization devoted exclusively to White House purposes. The association was founded out of a need to give impetus to the then new and exciting White House restoration program. Every First Lady since its founding has supported it enthusiastically. This, above everything, explains why it has thrived through the years and thrives today.

President Kennedy, who lived here when the association first formed, was told that such an organization could have legal standing only if the White House were declared a national monument. It came as a little surprise to us who knew that President to learn that he absolutely refused to live in a monument. [Laughter]

The wise and scholarly Clark Clifford, who has probably unscrambled more problems for more Chief Executives than any man alive, tactfully suggested legislation that satisfied both the law and the sitting President. Our association could thus be incorporated.

One of our aims is to enhance understanding, appreciation, and enjoyment of the White House. Another is to assist the White House in its continuing quest to acquire objects with a linkage to its glorious past. This the association does in concert with the White House staff, the White House family, and the Committee for the Preservation of the White House.

The source of the association's income is its four books, of which more than 5 million copies have been sold since the inception of sales on July 4, 1962.

The portraits of President Ford and Mrs. Ford, which we are presenting today for addition to the permanent White House collection, were commissioned out of grants made by the association. They join the portraits of Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Mrs. Roosevelt, Mrs. Truman, President and Mrs. Kennedy, and President and Mrs. Johnson, which have also been provided by the association.

Portraits of Presidents and First Ladies are important parts of White House continuity. They are tangible treasures of time and art describing our ongoing course of history. And so, Mr. President and Mrs. Carter, the White House Historical Association feels very privileged indeed to serve this historic house.

On behalf of our board of directors, I am enormously pleased to present to you and the Nation the official portraits of our 38th President and his lovely First Lady, President Ford and Mrs. Ford.

Thank you very much.

PRESIDENT CARTER. Mr. Castro, and to members of the White House Historical Association, let me express my appreciation to you for these beautiful gifts and my appreciation for your willingness to carry on this very fine tradition. It's always a matter of great trepidation when portraits are unveiled. Most of the publicity recently about portraits has not been nearly so favorable as we are experiencing today, with Mrs. Churchill burning the portrait of her former husband, with President Johnson having had quite a flap when his first portrait was unveiled, and lately when the distinguished Secretary of State Henry Kissinger did not either like the work of the artist who tried to portray him for his posterity.

But I think today we've got a wonderful example of superb artistry, talent, and sensitivity about the character and demeanor of the subjects chosen. And I would like to ask Everett Raymond Kinstler, who did the portrait of President Ford, who sat for this portrait out in Vail, and also for Mr. Felix de Cossio, who is a native of Cuba, originally, and who did the beautiful portrait of Mrs. Ford, to come on the stage. And then while you are here on the stage, joining us as part of the audience, President Ford will make his remarks.

PRESIDENT FORD. Mr. President and Mrs. Carter, Mr. Castro, my former friends and colleagues in the House and Senate, and other guests:

It's a great privilege for Betty and myself to be here on this occasion. May I express my deep gratitude on behalf of both of us to the President and to Mrs. Carter for their friendship, their many kindnesses, and I can say that the relationship has been one we've enjoyed and that we're most grateful to have. And I thank you very, very much, Mr. President, Mrs. Carter.

I had not seen the actual portraits until just a few minutes ago. I've seen them in the process of being painted. I've seen several photographs. I would say that in my case, considering what Ray Kinstler had to work with, he did very well.

[Laughter] I would say that Mr. de Cossio did a beautiful job, and I'm very proud of not only the portrait but what it portrays.

We are enthusiastic about both, in all honesty, and we are naturally very, very proud that our portraits will be here in the President's house and will reflect our great love and affection for this place and all that it means to the American people.

I can't thank Ray Kinstler and Mr. de Cossio sufficiently for their tolerance and understanding as they worked with us last summer and for the fine job that they did. There was never a moment in our period that we would ever not accept the fine work that has been done by both. And we thank you, Ray, and Mr. de Cossio, for the fine work that is in evidence here on this occasion.

Again, thank you, Mr. Castro, and to the White House Historical Association. And we again express our deep gratitude and appreciation to President Carter and Mrs. Carter for their friendship and many, many kindnesses. It's a pleasure to be here.

Thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 2:38 p.m. at the ceremony in the East Room at the White House. Nash Castro is vice chairman of the board of directors of the White House Historical Association.

Prior to the ceremony, President Carter and former President Ford met privately in the Oval Office.

United Service Organizations

Remarks at a White House Reception.
May 24, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. First of all, I want to welcome all of you to the White House, and I want to congratulate Bob Hope. He's getting ready to start on a second career, as you know. He'll be making commercials full-time—[laughter—]advertising yogurt. [Laughter]

Since Mr. Hope has now been proven to be 75 years old, at least we know that his claim is false that he sold Pepsodent to George Washington the first time he came to the White House. [Laughter] We all know he had wooden teeth, and he was a Lemon Pledge man. [Laughter] I'm talking about George Washington. [Laughter]

Although this is the first time that Bob Hope has been to the White House since I've been here, I figured up today that I've been in office now for 489 days. And when I spend 3 more weeks, I will have stayed as many nights in the White House as Bob Hope has. [Laughter]

I'll never forget when we first moved in. We went by the Lincoln Bedroom, and Rosalynn was really excited. We came in here to the East Room and saw the portraits of George Washington and his First Lady; I was very excited. And Amy was excited in all the other rooms, because they had signs above the doors, "Bob Hope Slept Here." [Laughter]

Amy is here; she's already invited Bob Hope to spend the night with her tonight. He'll have to climb the tree to get to his bedroom, but I'm sure he can make it. [Laughter]

I met Bob Hope when I was Governor. He came down to Atlanta for a big celebration. I was very disappointed; I think I was the only person in the Armed Forces who'd never met him while I was overseas. Every Christmas Eve we would put some cookies and a bottle of scotch under our periscope in the submarine, but he never showed up. [Laughter]

But I think it's accurate to say that the USO is as much a part of our Government, our Armed Forces, the basis for strength in our Nation, the good spirit, and a commitment to service of our country among those who have been overseas during times of war and peace, that Bob Hope is just as much a part of that as any President who's ever served, and I thank him from the bottom of my heart for that tremendous contribution.

There is no way for me to add additional plaques nor certificates nor medals to what Bob Hope has already received from my predecessors and other leaders. But as President of the United States of America, as the Commander in Chief of all our Armed Forces, and as the Chairman, the Honorary Chairman, of the USO, I want to express my thanks and the thanks of a grateful nation to a man who in war and peace, through his own brilliance, his sense of humor, his patriotism, his love and concern for men and women in the Armed Forces who were not fortunate enough to be home to be with their own loved ones, and for selfless and unselfish devotion over many years above and beyond the call of duty, and on behalf of our country, our Armed Forces, and the USO, I want to say thank you to my friend, Bob Hope.

MR. HOPE. Thank you, Mr. President, Mrs. Carter. I know we all feel the same way—there are so many in here on a pass tonight. [Laughter]

I have never seen so many people—freeloaders, in my life. [Laughter] But what a kick it is to come in here and just shake hands with the President and the First Lady. That's something, isn't it?

I appreciate all those words, and I did a congressional wives' luncheon today in honor of Mrs. Carter, and I enjoyed doing that and seeing the congressional wives. And I told them that I visited Washington every once in a while, not so much lately, but I used to come here quite often—[laughter]—not for political favors, I just wanted to try to get into Wilbur Mills' carpool. [Laughter] And I did other things.

But I want to say I appreciate this very much. You know, you realize, you think this is a soft job. When you stand in line like that and greet this many people and shake hands with these alleged friends—[laughter]—some of them squeeze a little hard, I want to tell you. I mean, you've got to appreciate the fact that the President and Mrs. Carter take time to do this. This is not an election year, you know. [Laughter]

It's wonderful, and we appreciate it very much. And I want to apologize for some of the things I've said on television—right now, let me see—[laughter]—no, when I said that Mr. Carter was a very religious man, because every time I ate a peanut, I feel immortal—[laughter]—I'm sorry about that.

I just want to thank all of you for coming. I want to thank the President and Mrs. Carter for loaning us our house. [Laughter] God knows we paid for it. [Laughter] I would have mailed this speech in, but I couldn't afford it. [Laughter] The price went up to 15 cents. It was supposed to go up in '63, but the Postmaster General just got the letter. [Laughter]

Thank you very much.

THE PRESIDENT. Bob was embarrassed to say this, but he wanted me to point out again to you how deeply honored he is to have you here. And he says that you're the best friends he has in the world. He doesn't get a chance to see you very often, and he would like for all of you to wait in the room until he's outside. He'd like to shake hands with you again as you leave. [Laughter]

NOTE: The President spoke at 5:58 p.m. in the East Room at the White House. Entertainer Bob Hope, who has traditionally led Christmas programs for U.S. servicemen overseas under USO sponsorship, was guest of honor at the event.

Natural Gas Legislation

Statement on the Agreement of the Congressional Conferees. May 24, 1978

I am pleased and gratified that the congressional energy conferees, after 6 months of arduous work, have reached final agreement on natural gas legislation.

A solution to the natural gas issue has eluded Presidents and Congresses for more than a quarter of a century. I congratulate the conferees for their fine work.

This historic agreement represents a long-overdue step toward the creation of a truly national market for natural gas, as well as a crucial breakthrough toward enactment of the long-delayed national energy legislation.

Our objective, when we sent the national energy act to Congress on April 20, 1977, was to protect the Nation's consumers and the economy from the sudden imposition of the substantially higher natural gas prices that would result from immediate deregulation. We also sought to provide producers with higher incentives to stimulate natural gas production. Those objectives have been met by the legislation the conferees have agreed upon today.

The compromise, according to best available estimates, will cost American consumers no more than they would pay if today's inadequate regulatory system were to be maintained. Moreover, if the compromise is accepted by the full Congress, new supplies of natural gas, formerly available only in the intrastate market, will flow to gas-starved interstate systems at reasonable prices. These new supplies will replace billions of dollars worth of more expensive fuels, including imported oil.

This agreement represents a major step forward toward finalization of the national energy legislation. I urge the Congress to start moving toward final passage of the first four bills and once again to begin in earnest on the crude oil equalization tax and the remaining provisions of the tax bill. I am encouraged over the prospects for the COET, because I think there is a growing realization of the need for us to stop subsidizing oil imports and of the fact that COET is the best option for achieving that goal.

President's Commission on Personnel Interchange

*Appointment of Seven Members.
May 25, 1978*

The President today announced the appointment of seven persons as members of the President's Commission on Personnel Interchange for 2-year terms. They are:

- NEIL L. CUNNINGHAM, vice president, marketing and public affairs, of the First American National Bank in Nashville, Tenn.;
- THOMAS W. DEWAELE, of Kailua, Oahu, Hawaii, president of small retail and wholesale luggage and sporting goods businesses;
- PATRICIA J. KNOX, director of the Department of Public Information for the city of Detroit;
- RICHARD E. PESQUEIRA, president of the University of Southern Colorado in Pueblo, Colo.;
- J. J. SIMMONS III, of Muskogee, Okla., vice president and assistant to the chairman of the board of Amerada Hess Corp. in New York;
- JULE M. SUGARMAN, Vice Chairman of the Civil Service Commission;
- PHILIP F. ZEIDMAN, a Washington attorney and former General Counsel of the Small Business Administration.

The President's Commission on Personnel Interchange was established in 1967 to develop an executive interchange program between the Federal Government and private industry. Each year, a small number of Federal employees take positions in the private sector, and a small number of industry executives are placed in Government positions. The Commission directs and monitors each year's exchange program.

Presidential Scholars

*Remarks at the Presentation Ceremony of the 1978 Presidential Scholars Medallions.
May 25, 1978*

WILLIAM L. PRESSLY. I welcome you to this lovely occasion here in the Rose Garden of the White House. It is the President's own program for the recognition of excellence. It was created by an Executive order by President Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964. It honors a group of the Nation's most intellectually distinguished and accomplished high school seniors. The purpose that President Johnson stated is still valid, to recognize the most precious resource of the United States, the brainpower of our youth.

To encourage the pursuit of intellectual attainment among all of our youth, we select 121 scholars each year: two from each of the States, a boy and a girl, two from the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and two from parents who are American citizens living abroad, and then we have 15 at large. So, we have a total of 121.

Today it is 15 years old, and we are honoring President Johnson for having established the program and are delighted to have members of his family here today. You need to know that there are now nearly 1,700 Presidential Scholars, and we have invited many of them back. A study is being made today of the accomplishments of those who were the first Presidential Scholars, the first 5 years, and this soon will be in book form.

President Carter and I were both born in small towns in Georgia. Obviously, I arrived a generation ahead of him. But during those years in a small town in Georgia, there wasn't much change. I think the similarity in our backgrounds has given me an insight into the real Jimmy Carter.

I see him first as a man of conviction. He has clearly stated the framework of his faith within which he constructs his life. Knowing his conviction, we can be sure he is a man of integrity and tremendous strength of character.

He is the kind of man who is going to do what he conceives to be right, no matter what the personal sacrifice. I've seen in the press, references to his stubbornness, but I call it determination stemming from conviction.

Out of his framework of conviction comes a warm compassion. He has an unshakable belief in the worth of the individual man. This is not an objective concept with him; it originates in a deep and sincere love for his fellow man.

You have heard him defend human rights, human rights in every nation. You will hear him do so again. The idea is a part of his innermost being.

It is his love for people that has made it possible for him to keep the common touch, though he holds the Nation's highest office. His conviction and his compassion lead to commitment. All his life he has been committed to excellence. We see it in the brilliance of his intellectual achievement. We see it in his enthusiasm for his Presidential Scholars program. We see it in his true devotion to great music and art. We see it in the prodigious effort and inspiration he has given and is giving to improve education and government on the State level, and now on the national level. He is a man committed to the enhancement of the quality of every human being.

Young women and young men, ladies and gentlemen, the President of the United States.

THE PRESIDENT. I think I'll hire Dr. Pressly full-time to introduce me to different groups. You can see the advantage in having a fellow Georgian precede you on the program.

This is a delightful occasion for me, as President, and a very great gratifying one. I've looked over the list of those who have achieved awards as Presidential Scholars from all 50 States, the Trust Territories, chosen on the basis of competitive merit and nothing else. This 117-person group has been chosen, in effect, in competition with 2 million other young American students. And you've been honored because of your own achievements academically and your own capabilities. For the first time this year, we've recognized excellence in music and the arts in addition to academic excellence itself, which I think is good.

I've noticed that you don't come from families with any particular economic status. Many of you, more than half, come from working families where your parents, one or both, work in an employee status. You've overcome, sometimes, handicaps because of the status of your family, socially and otherwise. And on many occasions, it's been a matter of great courage on your part. One of your group, I notice, has parents who are missionaries in Zambia. One of you, I noticed, 5 years ago was living in Korea and couldn't speak any English at all.

I think there's one unique characteristic of this group that's interesting, and that is that 90 percent of you live in stable homes, where your mother and father have stayed together and have strengthened the ties of the marriage vows, and your homes are not divided.

I just feel very deeply that you've honored me by coming, and you've honored our Nation by showing your superb achievements already at the young and early stage of your life. But you're also lucky, and you shouldn't take this recognition of achievement as an end in itself. You're fortunate because you had an access to books and to a good education program. You're fortunate that you had a President 15 years ago who believed very deeply in education himself. He didn't go naturally from high school directly into college. He had to work. He got his education, to a major degree, because of his own ability to earn an academic scholarship. He came to the White House by a torturous and difficult route. But when he got here as a former teacher himself, he knew the advantage of a good educational system.

I came to Washington for the first time as an official in 1965. I was in the State senate. And the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 was being considered. John Gardner was the Secretary of HEW. President Johnson was the leader of our Nation. And he established this program as an additional executive decision to honor young people who had achieved a notable degree of merit in academic work.

It's a great pleasure for me to welcome you here to the White House, the center of our Government, and to let you know that I not only congratulate you on your achievement so far, but I expect great things from you in the future. You've been blessed with superior intelligence and opportunity not only because the Nation in which you happen to live provides freedom to express yourselves as individuals, but you've also been honored by your fellow Americans. And I hope you will accept this honor today as an additional instigation to achieve even more in the future and to recognize those who are not so fortunate as you, who haven't been blessed with a good educational opportunity or a sound, stable family life or a freedom to explore new dimensions of one's mind and one's heart.

Today I would like to make a special award to the family of the President who's responsible for this occasion, President Lyndon Johnson. He was a man with extreme patriotism to our country. He was a man who recognized with an open heart the defects that existed in it. He believed in equality of opportunity, in human rights in its finest form, and in the fact that our future rests on the shoulders of young people like you.

We invited Lady Bird Johnson to be here with us today. She couldn't come. My wife will be with her tomorrow in Texas. But we have been honored by having Lieutenant Governor Chuck Robb [of Virginia] and his wife, Lynda, who will come forward now and receive a plaque in recognition of the tremendous contribution in this program and in many other hundreds of ways that President Lyndon Johnson made to our country as a public servant in many ways. And I thank them for being here. I think you notice that they are providing an opportunity for a future Presidential honors award, and I'm thankful for it.

This is a plaque which you can see, I think, clearly, a picture of the White House where President Johnson lived. "Presented by President Jimmy Carter in honor of the contributions to education by President Lyndon Baines Johnson on the 15th anniversary of the Presidential Scholars Program. The White House, May 25, 1978."

LYNDA JOHNSON ROBB. I know my father would be very proud of all of you. The thing he was the most proud of was the young people of this country and the education, the opportunities that they had and what he expected from all of us. I know he'd be very happy to be honored today in the ceremony such as this. I don't expect to come back here 15 years later, again, 15 years from now as a parent of one of these Presidential Scholars, but I feel like a child of the program in many other ways, having been here when it was born 15 years ago.

Thank you so much.

NOTE: The ceremony began at 11:05 a.m. in the Rose Garden at the White House. Mr. Pressly is Chairman of the Commission on Presidential Scholars.

Following the President's remarks, Joseph A. Califano, Secretary, and Mary Berry, Assistant Secretary for Education, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, presented the medallions to the high school students selected as Presidential Scholars for 1978. For a list of the students, see page 764 of this volume.

Federal Trade Commission

Nomination of Robert Pitofsky To Be a Member. May 25, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Robert Pitofsky, of Chevy Chase, Md., to be a member of the Federal Trade Commission. He would replace Calvin J. Collier, resigned.

Pitofsky was born December 27, 1929, in Paterson, N.J. He received a B.A. from New York University in 1951 and an LL.B. from Columbia Law School in 1954.

In 1956 and 1957, Pitofsky was an attorney with the Justice Department, and from 1957 to 1963, he practiced law in New York City. From 1963 to 1970, he was a professor of law at New York University School of Law.

From 1970 to 1973, Pitofsky was Director of the Bureau of Consumer Protection of the Federal Trade Commission. Since 1973 he has been a professor of law at Georgetown University Law Center, and a counsel to the Washington firm of Arnold & Porter.

Pitofsky is chairman of the board of directors of Georgetown University Law Center's Institute for Public Interest Representation. He served as commission counsel to the American Bar Association Commission to Study the FTC. He is the author of numerous articles on consumer protection and trade regulation law.

Federal Mine Safety and Health Review Commission

Nomination of Three Members. May 25, 1978

The President today announced the nomination of three persons to be members of the Federal Mine Safety and Health Review Commission. They are:

Frank F. Jestrab, of Williston, N. Dak., for a 6-year term. Jestrab, 64, is an attorney in Williston. He serves on the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, and represents the Governor of North Dakota on the Interstate Oil Compact Commission.

A. E. Lawson, of Pittsburgh, Pa., for a 6-year term. Lawson, 48, is assistant general counsel of the United Steelworkers of America. He has handled a broad range of litigation before trial and appellate courts as well as administrative tribunals such as the Occupational Safety and Health Review Commission.

Marian P. Nease, of Sumner, Md., for a 4-year term. Nease, 38, is special counsel to the United Mine Workers Health and Retirement Funds.

The Commission was created by the Federal Mine Enforcement Safety and Health Amendments Act of 1977 to serve as an independent agency to adjudicate disputes under the act.

THE PRESIDENT'S NEWS CONFERENCE OF MAY 25, 1978

Held in Chicago, Illinois

THE PRESIDENT. It's always good for me to visit Chicago, one of our most beautiful cities and, perhaps, the best managed large city in our country or perhaps the world. This afternoon I have a brief statement to make, and then I'll be glad to answer any questions that you might have.

U.S. FOREIGN ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

Our action to help rescue those who have been threatened in Zaire has virtually come to an end. Our transport aircraft, having completed their mission, will be returning to their bases within the next few days. I know that I speak for all Americans in expressing my abhorrence and distress over the violence and the killing that resulted from the Katangan invasion from Angola into Zaire. As great as the human tragedy was, it could have been much worse for the European nationals and for the Zairians, and the consequences much more severe for that country, if we had not joined in with our allies in a common effort.

Our action in Zaire was an appropriate and measured response to the situation. In this endeavor, we demonstrated both our ability to cooperate with our allies and our willingness to consult fully with the Congress before taking any actions. I imposed strict limits on the scope of our involvement, and they were rigorously observed. I'm gratified that we had the full support of congressional leaders before and during the rescue efforts in Zaire.

The Government of Angola must bear a heavy responsibility for the deadly attack which was launched from its territory, and it's a burden and a responsibility shared by Cuba. We believe that Cuba had known of the Katangan plans to invade and obviously did nothing to restrain them from crossing the border. We also know that the Cubans have played a key role in training and equipping the Katangans who attacked.

Our action to support the rescue efforts in Zaire was taken pursuant to present law and under my constitutional powers and duties as Commander in Chief. However, the tragedy in Zaire as well as other recent developments has caused me to reflect on the ability of our Government, without becoming involved in combat, to act promptly and decisively to help countries whose security is threatened by external forces.

Our military and economic assistance programs are one of the most important means of assisting our friends. Some of the legislation governing these foreign aid programs has the effect of placing very narrow limits on where and when they can be used. Some of these limitations, though they were enacted many years ago and under special circumstances, continue to be entirely appropriate and advisable today. Others may be outmoded. For that reason, I have concluded that we should review the full range of legislation which now governs the operation of these programs. I've asked the Secretary of State to conduct this review and to consult with Congress constantly in preparing the study for me. We want to take a careful look at whether our legislation and procedures are fully responsive to the challenges that we face today.

I will meet with the congressional leadership myself in the near future, so that we can reach a joint decision on the appropriate steps to be taken.

As for the Clark amendment, which prohibits action in regard to Angola, I have no present intention of seeking its modification, nor that of any other special piece of legislation. Any proposal for modifications will await our review of all restrictions and consultations with the appropriate committees of the Congress.

In the meantime, the existing provisions of law will, of course, be faithfully observed by me. But also in the meantime, we must resist further restrictions being attached to legislation now before the Congress.

As we consider new legislation, it is vital that we recognize our need to be able to adapt to rapidly changing circumstances. The foreign assistance legislation now pending in Congress contains several proposed restrictions on Presidential authority in economic and military aid programs. While I am prepared to report to Congress and to remain fully accountable to the American people, I will oppose further restrictions. I do so not necessarily because I intend to exercise my authority in the areas in question, but to preserve Presidential capacity to act in the national interests at a time of rapidly changing circumstances.

I believe that the congressional leadership and the American people will support this position.

Thank you very much.

I'd like to now call on Melody McDowell for the first question.

QUESTIONS

HUMPHREY-HAWKINS BILL

Q. Melody McDowell, Chicago Defender. Critics of the Humphrey-Hawkins bill maintain that those who would stand to benefit would largely be going from one form of welfare to another, because the jobs that are being sold out are not those that would allow for marketable skills. Along those lines, what kinds of programs have you or do you plan to institute which would allow those who are impoverished to receive not only a job but also to gain marketable, career-oriented skills, particularly among black youth where the unemployment rate is disproportionately higher than any other group?

THE PRESIDENT. The Humphrey-Hawkins bill does not include specific programs designed to reduce unemployment. The Humphrey-Hawkins bill devises a system by which the President, the Congress, State and local governments, the private sector, can work together with a common goal of reduced unemployment over a period of years.

This legislation puts a constraint on me, as President, when I put forward a proposal to Congress, when I put forward a budget, for instance, to explain to the Congress how it will be impacted by and how it will help the unemployment rate in the country.

In the last 16 months, since I've been in office, we've seen a dramatic reduction in the unemployment rate. We've added a net increase of 5½ million jobs; the unemployment rate has dropped from about 8 percent down to 6 percent on a nationwide basis. We still have a very high unemployment rate, however, as Melody pointed out, among young people, minority groups, and, in some areas, women. We have sharply focused Federal programs to put people back to work. And the National Alliance of Businessmen, the labor organizations, and others are also helping us, for instance, with veterans, with minority groups, and with young people.

Sixteen months ago, one of the highest unemployed groups in the country were Vietnam veterans. They now have a lower unemployment rate, because of these specially focused programs, than the average American who are in their age group.

And as we've put the general populace back to work, we can focus much more narrowly now on those who are the so-called hardcore unemployed, that is, the last ones hired and the first ones to be fired.

So, the Humphrey-Hawkins bill has nothing in it that would put excessive constraints on the American public or government. It gives us a framework by which we can plan together to continue to bring down an unemployment rate that has been improved but which is still too high.

SOVIET POLICIES AND SALT

Q. Mr. President, Frank Cormier, Associated Press. Former President Ford suggested today there should be an interrelationship between progress on the SALT and Soviet willingness to show restraint in Africa. Do you agree with this position?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I read President Ford's statement that he made today, and I think that his analysis is that we ought not necessarily to let Soviet action in other areas interfere with the progress of SALT. But he pointed out, and I agree, that unless the Soviets do honor the constraints on basic human rights, unless they also honor constraints on their involvement in places like Africa, that it will have a strong adverse effect on our country and make it much more difficult to sell to the American people and to have ratification in Congress of a SALT agreement if it should be negotiated between me and Brezhnev and those who work under us.

So, I never have favored the establishment by me or Brezhnev of a linkage between the two, saying that if the Soviets and the Cubans stay in Ethiopia, for instance, we would cancel the SALT talks. I think that the SALT agreement is so important for our country, for the safety of the entire world, that we ought not to let any impediment come between us and the reaching of a successful agreement. But there is no doubt that if the Soviets continue to abuse human rights, to punish people who are monitoring the Soviets' compliance with the Helsinki agreement, which they signed on their own free will, and unless they show some constraints on their own involvement in Africa and on their sending Cuban troops to be involved in Africa, it will make it much more difficult to conclude a SALT agreement and to have it ratified once it is written.

Q. Mr. President, Wes Pippert, UPI.

THE PRESIDENT. I'll get you next, Wes. Let me get—

ILLINOIS MILITARY INSTALLATIONS

Q. Mr. President, Dick Kay, WMAQ-TV. One of the Democratic candidates you are here in Chicago to campaign for, Alex Seith, says Illinois will be crucial to you for reelection in 1980, that your popularity is on the wane here, and that one thing hurting it is the possibility of closing at least three bases in Illinois—Fort Sheridan, Great Lakes Naval Station, and Chanute Air Force Base. I wonder, sir, if you are going to have any private conversations with local Democratic officials to heat up the relationship, so to speak, and if you have any comment on the possibility of those bases staying open?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I have to say that I flew from Washington to Chicago on Air Force One with several members of the Illinois delegation, I think almost all the Democrats. They very quickly brought up this subject and discussed it thoroughly with me. And I have already had a chance to discuss this with Mayor Bilandic on the way in from the airport and with Adlai Stevenson, the Senator, who was with us also.

There's no doubt that if, say, these three major bases were closed under my administration, it would be a severe political blow to me. I think it's accurate to point out, though, that we'll make the decision in the final analysis not on the basis of political considerations, but on the basis of what's best for the national defense of our country now and, prospectively, in the future. The fact that these bases are on a potential list to be assessed has no significance at all.

For instance, if we have three major Marine recruit training facilities in our Nation and the Defense Department decides that we only need two of them and will close one, they put all three on the list to be assessed, so that after their assessment is complete, they will present to me and to the Congress proposals for the closing down of a base or changing its character. But before that is done, there will be 9 or 10 months of very careful analysis, plus a very careful study being done, which will continue for a long period of time, about the economic consequences to that area and to the country if it is closed down.

So, you've got the military assessment of need, a very long list—very few of the bases will actually be closed in the final analysis, not more than a third or so—and the economic consequences if a base is closed. So, I recognize the political consequences. But even then, I'll have to make a final judgment, and so will the Congress, on the basis of what's best for our country, not how much a local community might react adversely if a decision is made against them.

PRESIDENT'S RELATIONSHIP WITH ILLINOIS DEMOCRATS

Q. Sir, will you have any private discussions to warm up the political relationship with the Cook County organization?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I've already begun those discussions. I was met by many of the candidates for office at the airport. All the Members of the House of Representatives are running for reelection, as you know. I met with them today. I've already met and ridden in and been up in my hotel room with Mayor Bilandic, who also happens to be here. Obviously, one of the reasons that I came here to Chicago is not only to meet and address the legislature tomorrow morning, which will be a bipartisan effort, but to help the Cook County Democrats and the Illinois Democrats win in the fall.

And my heart's in it. There is no difference of opinion between me and the Democratic candidates or leaders here about what should be done by the Illinois people in the elections this fall.

U.S. FOREIGN ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

Q. Mr. President, a question about Africa again. Can you be more specific in the kinds of changes you would seek in this review? For instance, how do you feel that your hands are tied in extending aid to these nations in Africa? And further, under what conditions would you want to be able to extend aid, lethal or nonlethal, to such groups as the opposition forces in Angola?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I have no intention of getting involved in the conflict in Angola. This is not my intention at all. But the Congress has had an increasing inclination recently, beginning long before I came in office, to impose one-House vetoes and to put very tight constraints on what countries we could give any aid to and prohibit even World Bank loans for countries, say, that produced competitive crops in the United States. For instance, last year the Congress attempted to impose a prohibition against any loans by the World Bank against a country that produced sugar products because it competed with sugar produced in our own country, or to prevent any aid being given to a country that produced tung (palm)<sup>1</sup> oil because it competed with soybean oil grown in our own country.

That means that we are prohibited from giving much needed friendship, mutual support, building up a trade relationship, giving aid when it's necessary to countries that might desperately desire our help, but be forced, because of an absence of it, to turn to the Soviet Union or to turn to Eastern bloc countries to help them sustain themselves.

There's a borderline region where I think the President ought to exert leadership and authority, keeping the Congress and the American people informed about countries that are not democracies, that might be socialistic in nature, but who don't want to be dominated by the Soviet Union or the Eastern bloc countries.

Some of them are already very good friends of ours. For instance, we are prohibited, except in the special circumstances, from giving any aid to Zambia. President Kaunda was here this past week. He's a very fine African leader whose friendship we want. Tanzania is another one. President Nyerere is one of our good friends now. He wasn't 3 or 4 years ago. Another one that would be an even more borderline case would be Mozambique, with Machel being the President.

I think that many of these African leaders are very strongly nationalistic in their attitude. They don't want to be dominated by us or anyone else. But if we are prevented from giving them any aid of a peaceful nature, even food, then they've got to turn somewhere else. And it ties my hands too much. It might be that when the Congress passes an amendment like this on a foreign aid bill that the reasons are sound, but then times change. Maybe after a year or 2 years, when that provision is still on the law books, there might be different leaders or different political circumstances there. I can't act to deal with the changing circumstance.

I might say that this problem was raised not by me with the Congress but by congressional leaders with me. And I'm not going to advocate any changes in present law until we have thoroughly discussed it with the congressional leaders in both Houses, both Democrats and Republicans. But I am opposing any tightly restraining amendments that are now being proposed by the Congress on the foreign aid legislation that we are considering this year.

BARGE CANAL FEES

Q. Mr. President, if Congress sends you a public works bill with fees on waterway users at the level set by the Senate recently, will you veto that bill, as Secretary Adams said you would? And if so, sir, what alternative solutions would you propose for problems of Alton Lock and Dam 26?

THE PRESIDENT. I would veto the Senate-passed bill, yes. We asked the Congress to impose water user fees so that we might get back a part of the cost of operating locks, dams, other very expensive waterway facilities, and, also, to get back part of the cost of the original capital investment.

In my opinion, at the present time, the barge traffic has a major advantage over other forms of transportation. Also, these facilities, when they are modified or built anew, cost very great sums of money. And I believe that it's proper for the Congress to pass a law that would let very modest user fees be imposed so that those who do use those facilities that are built by the taxpayers all over the country at least partially share in the cost of them. This is the case with other forms of transportation. I think it ought to be the case with water user fees as well.

U.S. FOREIGN ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

Q. Mr. President, I suppose most of these restrictions that were written into the law were written with the idea of keeping the United States from becoming bogged down in another Vietnam. And I wonder, sir, do you see a comparison in the choices you now face and the choices that were faced by President Kennedy and President Johnson back in those early days when we began to get in just a little ways and then more and more came on?

What differences are there in this situation than what they faced?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't think there's any comparison at all. In my opinion, if President Johnson, President Nixon, President Eisenhower, Kennedy were in office now, having experienced the Vietnam war, they would be very cautious and very careful not to become involved again militarily, and I have that deep feeling myself. We are talking here about the kinds of amendments that I described to Wes Pippert a few minutes ago, an amendment that says we cannot either give any aid or even vote in the World Bank Board of Directors for a loan to a foreign country, just because their form of government might be different from ours or because they've had some past or even present human rights violations or even because they produce competitive crops that might be competing with crops grown in the United States.

And there's a trend in Congress that is building up that puts too much constraint on a President to deal with rapidly changing circumstances. We do not want to send military forces into Africa to meet the challenge of Soviet and Cuban intrusion. The Soviets and Cubans are eager to give either military aid, and even the Soviets send Cuban troops into a country to fight.

We don't want to do that at all, but if we can't even give a shipment of wheat or give a sound commercial loan or vote for a loan by the World Bank to that same people or that same country, it means that I can't compete at all, even peacefully, with the Soviet or Cuban military action in those countries. That's what concerns me very deeply.

I might say that it's not just my concern. I had a long conversation yesterday with President Ford. He, I think, perhaps is at least as deeply concerned as I am, and the congressional leaders share this same concern.

INFLATION

Q. Mr. President, when you were in Illinois campaigning, you said in Springfield and other places that if you were elected, we could depend on your doing something about inflation. And now we hear we're going to get a 9.3 for April and maybe the same for May. I wonder, sir, if you cannot control it, what political consequences will be to you and, secondly, would you consider taking a $20,000-a-year pay cut as suggested as a symbol for the Nation by Arthur Burns?<sup>2</sup>

THE PRESIDENT. I don't remember Mr. Burns volunteering to take a pay cut when I was in Government. [Laughter] We have imposed zero increase on all executive pay in the Federal Government in the executive branch. The Congress is now considering imposing the same zero increase in high-level pay for Members of Congress and members of the judiciary as well. I think that's well-advised.

It's obvious to me, looking back historically, that a year ago or 16 months ago, the primary concern in our country was unemployment. But my goal has been, as President, to bring down both unemployment and inflation. Last year we experienced about a 6-percent inflation rate—6, 6½ percent. Now our projections for this year are that it might be 6½ or 7 percent. I think the 9 percent that you referred to is a temporary aberration brought about primarily by high food costs because of bad weather.

We are doing everything we can now to cut down the rate of inflation, short of wage and price controls, which I do not ever intend to impose, barring a national calamity. And we've gotten good support so far from some of the major business leaders and the labor leaders, as well. General Motors, for instance, A.T. & T. have already publicly announced that they are going to hold down the price of their products and also put tight constraints on executive salaries and other salaries over which they have control.

The worst economic problem, the worst domestic problem that we have now is inflation. And I had a meeting this morning with my Cabinet officers to tell them that the 1980 fiscal year budget, which I'm now considering in its early state, will be very tight, with severe cutbacks than what we had anticipated recommending to the Congress next January.

I'm perfectly willing to meet any special interest group, no matter how benevolent, and hold my own in spite of the political consequences. And that includes business, it includes labor, it includes education, it includes transportation, it includes farmers, it includes all those groups who are very sincere and very good Americans, but who have to recognize that this year, at least, and perhaps next year as well, we have got to constrain inflation.

And I'm willing to take the political heat to do it, because it's very difficult for any one of those groups to agree to join in a common effort. But I think if we can get a spirit of deep concern, which I feel, and a common willingness to sacrifice, then I can meet my commitments to the American people and hold down inflation.

As you know, the Government does play a major role. It sets a tone and it controls the depth of the deficit, and it orients where spending programs are implemented and how much taxes are collected. We've already cut back our tax proposal, which will result in a decrease in the deficit for next year of about $10 billion below what we proposed in January.

So, I'm determined to fight inflation. I can't do it by myself. It's going to take all Americans to help, but I recognize that I have the leadership role.

COMMUNISM AND AFRICA

Q. Mr. President, Walt Rodgers, with AP. It was just about a year ago at Notre Dame University you told Americans it was time to end their inordinate concern and alarm with communism. You seem to have fallen into that same preoccupation in Africa. My question is, what is America's vested interest in Africa, and why is it so important that we oppose the Soviets and Cubans on that continent?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I have no fear of communism and no inordinate concern about communism. I'm not preoccupied with the Soviet Union. I don't fear them. I see the inherent strength of the United States economically and politically and militarily, and I'm determined, as President, to maintain that strength, which is, in almost every respect, superior to that of the Soviet Union.

We are concerned that the Soviets don't impose upon themselves the same constraints that we do. They have no reticence about becoming involved militarily in internal affairs in Africa.

I think the Organization of African Unity, the United Nations, the OAS in this hemisphere, and other similar regional and worldwide organizations can handle those disputes either within a country or across international boundaries without military forces being sent there. And that's the subject of my concern. And I feel that one of my responsibilities and one of the authorities that I have is to raise public awareness of it.

I think that Cuba, for instance, claiming to be a nonaligned country, is probably one of the most intensely aligned countries in the world. It's a joke to call Cuba nonaligned. They have military alliances with the Soviet Union, they act at the Soviet Union's direction, they are economically dependent upon the Soviet Union, they act as a surrogate for the Soviet Union.

And so, I think it's important for me as President, not being preoccupied or fearful, to let the world know what the circumstances are, because I think it's contrary to the hope that we all have for peace.

Q. But what's our vested interest in Africa?

THE PRESIDENT. We have a major vested interest in Africa. Our trade relationships are there. It's a tremendous developing continent. It goes all the way from ancient and highly developed civilizations, as you well know, in Egypt, in the northern part of Africa, through a burgeoning black population in the southern part of Africa.

In the past, we've not had an adequate interest there. And almost by default, because we came in late or because we were not involved in a friendly, normal trade relationship where mutual trust and mutual friendships existed, we saw those countries turning to Marxist countries or Eastern countries for their support and their friendship. I think they would rather have a balanced relationship between us and the Soviets. I think in many instances they would rather have a democratic friend than to have a totalitarian friend. And I want to make sure they have that option.

VIEWS ON THE PRESIDENCY

Q. Basil Talbott of the Chicago Sun Times. Recent polls have shown your popularity dropping. I guess the Harris poll released this week showed that either Senator Kennedy or former President Ford could beat you if the election were held today. And there are some reports that your aides have urged you to get out around the Nation and try to bolster that image. I wonder if your trips to places like this—is that one of the purposes for this trip? And if it is, does that mean that you're a candidate for reelection? And whether you are or not, are you concerned about these polls?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I'm not a candidate for reelection. That's a question that I'll decide much later.

I've never been particularly excited about very good polls, and I've never been particularly concerned about very poor polls. They go up and down, as you well know. And quite often, polls vary among themselves at a particular time.

We've tried to address the crucial issues of our Nation without being fearful about political consequences. In some cases, they are long overdue in being addressed. Reorganization of government, welfare reform, energy policy, the Turkey arms embargo, which is now coming up, Mideast arms sales, the Panama Canal treaties—these things are not easy to do. And I could very well make every decision that I have confronting me on the basis of how it would affect me in the polls. I don't think that's the best leadership attitude for me to have. But I am concerned about it. I wish my popularity in the country was much higher.

And obviously, one of my duties as President is to get out among the people throughout the country, because I learn in the process. And in having these regional press conferences like this, talking to your legislature tomorrow, meeting with Democratic people tonight, and so forth, which I've done periodically ever since I've been in office, even when my opinion poll results were very high, I think it helps me to understand our country better.

So, I'd say it's a combination of hoping the people will understand and therefore like what I do, or at least sympathize with me and, in the process, let me learn more about the country.

MR. CORMIER. Thank you, Mr. President.

Chicago, Illinois

Remarks at the 1978 Cook County Democratic Dinner. May 25, 1978

[The fundraising dinner was held in several rooms at the Conrad Hilton Hotel. Following his arrival at the hotel, the President attended a reception in the Imperial Suite for head table guests and then spoke to the group assembled in the Williford Room. He then proceeded to the Waldorf Room, and his remarks follow:]

President Dunne, Mayor Bilandic, Cook County Democratic friends:

It's an honor for me to be here with you tonight, a group of 7,000 Cook County Democrats who have come to reaffirm the principles in which you believe and which have been the basis on which the strength of the Cook County Democratic organization has been built.

Throughout our Nation, in the rural precincts of southwest Georgia where I live, in Hawaii, in California, throughout the country, there is a feeling of confidence in the loyalty and the effectiveness of perhaps the greatest Democratic organization in our country, the one here in Cook County.

I'm very proud to be part of you, to come into this family group, because there's a close-knit nature in Cook County which surprises the press, surprises the Republicans on election day, is brought about because of the fact that you've worked together like a family.

The last time I was here, I was nervous and frightened, but I was in the presence of a great man who was a personal friend of mine, Mayor Daley. And tonight, I am in the presence of a personal friend of mine, a great man, the successor of Mayor Dick Daley, Mike Bilandic.

I think one of the most crucial things in our country these days is for us to remember who gives us Democratic Party members and leaders strength, why we've been the majority party in this country for the last 50 years, how you've been able to choose both Democratic Party members and candidates for local office, State office, and those who went to Washington from your State year after year, election after election—it's because when people are chosen in a position of leadership in Cook County, you demand from them two things: One is a closeness to you, and the second one is superb, constant service, so that the average person who might be poor, who might be illiterate, who might be very old or very young, feels that each one has an access into the heart of government.

That is what you demonstrate on a weekly basis, because you have access to your aldermen, you have access to your committee men and women, perhaps more than any other people in our country. And that closeness is what binds our party together. It reminds us where we get our strength, and it pays off on election day.

I have every confidence that this November it's going to be a great celebration and all of you are going to take part in it because of a Democratic victory again.

Thank you very much for letting me be with you.

[The President spoke at 7:14 p.m. Following his remarks, he spoke to dinner guests in three other rooms at the hotel, and then addressed the guests in the Grand Ballroom as follows:]

I was just passing through the neighborhood. I thought I would stop by and see you tonight.

I met George and Mike out on the street, and they said, "Why don't you come on inside? We've got a room full of dedicated, closely knit, hard-working, successful Democrats assembled." And I wonder if I came to the right place. Did I? [Applause]

For 2 years, in 1975 and 1976, I traveled around our great country in every State. At the beginning of my campaign, no one knew who I was. I was often timid and afraid and lonesome. But every time I came into Chicago, I not only saw the beauty of your city and how well it was managed but I also felt a warmth and a friendship extended to me which I shall never forget.

In 1976, I came here to attend this same annual Cook County Democratic fundraising banquet. My escort that night was a longtime friend, a quiet man, a modest man, a dedicated man who was compassionate, someone who was a good administrator, a good Democrat, a good political leader, Mayor Richard Daley.

And tonight I come back as the first President to visit with you in, I think, more than 9 years, escorted by a quiet man, a modest man, a man filled with sensitivity and compassion, a man who is trusted, a man who's a good administrator, a man who's a good Democrat, a man who is a great political leader, my longtime friend, Mike Bilandic.

It's no accident that you have elected these two great leaders to guide Chicago through difficult times. It's no accident that your city government has a reputation of being the best in the country, because there is something special about the Democratic Party in Cook County.

George and Mike and I were discussing it briefly before we began to go around to the different rooms. And there are two things that are special about you. The first one is that there is a closeness that exists between the average citizen, who may be very poor, who may be even illiterate, who may be black, who may just be learning to speak English, who may be very young or very old, who has a timid voice, who's still close, in Cook County at least, to the highest elected officials in government. And the reason for it is the Cook County Democratic organizational structure.

Now, you might, having lived here all your lives, not see what you have that most other Americans don't have, because here a timid voice with a doubt or a fear or a concern or a need or a hope or a dream can be heard. But in many parts of our country that's not the case. And when your committeeman or your alderman or others, every Monday night, or one night in the week, is there in the precinct, in a block, accessible, and you can take your problems to him and say, "I'm out of a job," or I need this or that, you have access directly to the mayor and even higher officials in Washington.

So, the closeness that exists because of this organizational structure is something of which you should be very proud. And the other one is the essence of the Democratic Party everywhere. We know who put us in office. We don't forget. And to the extent that we remember that and provide, to the best we can, service, to that extent we deserve to stay in office.

Well, this is a special honor for me, to come and meet with this group, hundreds of people in this room, a part of a much larger group tonight, a family of 7,000 representing tens of thousands of others who can't be here with us. Your successes in the past have been notable. You are admired by people all over the country. And this tight-knit organization is one that I hope you will not only cherish but even strengthen. And although you have made a contribution tonight just by being here and you might be committed that in November you'll go to the polls and vote, and maybe take your own family, I hope that you'll recognize 1978 is going to be a very difficult year in Illinois for Democrats, because at the highest levels of government Democrats are the challengers, and it's hard to upset an incumbent.

So, I hope that this year, remembering your past successes and your past history, each one of you will become a very enthusiastic, unselfish campaign manager and to try to spread your influence as wide as you can to be successful in this tough election period. And I believe that if you will, that this coming November, on election night, you and I together will again be celebrating a tremendous Democratic victory in Illinois and also in Cook County.

Thank you for letting me be part of it. God bless all of you. Thank you.

[The President spoke at 8:02 p.m. and then proceeded to the International Ballroom for the major portion of the program. His remarks follow:]

Mayor Bilandic, Senator Stevenson, Chairman Dunne, Mrs. Daley, distinguished friends of mine, and loyal Democrats of Cook County and of Illinois:

I was here 2 years ago, but not as President. It's been a long time since a Democratic President came to address the Cook County Democratic fundraising banquet, but I predict that for the next 15 or 20 years, you'll have that opportunity.

I'm always glad to come back here. I don't know what to think of a chairman who would tell a joke about President's kinfolks. [Laughter] We've never learned how to spell very good on the farm. I think I know how to spell the chairman's name, though. D-o-n-e. [Laughter]

As the mayor and others have pointed out, my administration, my family, have been very close to Chicago since I've been in office. You've got a beautiful city, a superb administration here, the envy of the Nation. Beautiful architecture, which has already been pointed out, great buildings that have meant a lot to my predecessors in the White House, the Merchandise Mart and the Kennedy—[laughter].

When I came to Chicago in the early stages of my campaign, I didn't have much to do, so I went around and looked at some of the buildings designed by Frank Lloyd Wright. My mother Lillian's favorite is the Sears Building, because we grew up with the Sears catalog. My brother Billy prefers Playboy Towers. [Laughter]

But I would like for you all to know that you're not the only progressive community in the Nation; Plains is making a lot of progress. We've got running water and electricity now. When you plug in the electric razor, the streetlights go out, but it's still a good city. [Laughter]

I was down there this past weekend at the wedding of my brother Billy's daughter. It was a tremendous celebration out in the country, and the only problem was when Billy got up to offer a toast to the bride with several hundred people watching, the pull tab wouldn't work. [Laughter]

I was impressed, as were you, with the quality of your Democratic slate of candidates. Alex Seith has been a friend of mine for a long time. He's a hard worker. He's going from door to door. He's listening to the people of Illinois. He's got a tough campaign on his hands. With your help, his tremendous experience in international affairs and his knowledge of your State, growing every day, will make it possible for him to come to Washington and to join me and the other members of the Illinois Delegation.

Mike Bilandic, a fresh and exciting young man, who needs your help, not just tonight with a contribution to the Democratic Party, but a dedication to make sure that these men and women who run as Democrats are not disappointed on Election Day. And every one of you are to commit yourselves in a difficult election year, in some cases challenging incumbents who are difficult to dislodge, but you are to become, in effect, individual campaign managers and use your own influence, your own time, your own effort for the next few months until November, getting your family and your neighbors, the folks with whom you work, to go out and help them be successful in November. No matter how hard they work, no matter how exciting they are, they can't win unless there's a sustained commitment to them by all of you 7,000 tonight and all the others who look to you with envy and with admiration for your own leadership positions.

These men know the State of Illinois. They know the people. Mike Bakalis knows the name of the capital is Springfield. His opponent thinks it's "Springboard," I think. [Laughter]

I wouldn't want to go any further without complimenting and thanking the superb congressional delegation, who have really helped me in every possible way. Adlai Stevenson has been staunch; I'll mention him later on in my talk. Danny Rostenkowski has been not only helpful in his leadership position in the Congress, but he gives me good advice and counsel in foreign affairs as well. He suggested one of his closest friends as my Polish interpreter when I made my foreign trip. And, Danny, I hope you'll give your brother-in-law my regards when you see him. [Laughter]

I was able to go around to the different rooms to meet with the groups, and there was one point that I made to all of them, and that is that you have a unique political organization here in Cook County. You may not recognize what you have, you may not appreciate what you have. For 2 years I campaigned around this country in every State, at the beginning, very lonely, a little bit frightened of the enormity of my own campaign effort, but every time I came to Chicago, I could see something special. And I would just like to point it out to you tonight.

The basis for our democratic political system is the worth of the individual, but quite often those who need government services most are the ones who have a very weak voice. They are the ones who are poor. They are ones who are weak, themselves, who are insecure. Quite often they might be black, or they may not speak English very well. They may be even illiterate. They may be very young or very old.

In most parts of our country they would have no way to reach out with that weak voice, expressing fear or concern or doubt or a hope or a dream and reach the core of government. But here in Cook County, they can do it.

And the connecting link is the Democratic Party and its structure, because they know that every Monday night or Thursday night on a regular schedule that the alderman or the committeeman, committeewoman will be sitting there waiting to listen to that weak voice and that that committeeman, that alderman has direct access to the top political leaders of this county.

I wish it was that way all over the country. It's not. But I hope you will preserve it and appreciate it and cherish it, because it's the kind of interrelationship between politics and government on which our Nation was founded, and it's the source of its present strength.

There's nothing like a quiet evening in Chicago with a few friends, Democratic friends especially. I know that God must love Cook County Democrats, because he made so many of you, and I am glad he did.

As I've looked into your faces tonight, I remember the 1972 Republican slogan. Do you remember "Bring us together"? Well, the Republicans have really brought us Democrats together. And I've learned from my own experience in Cook County and my own experience in the rest of the Nation that the best Democratic organization in the United States is yours.

You are following the advice that former Governor Adlai Stevenson gave us all when he said, "If you want to live like a Republican, you've got to vote Democratic." And that's what you put into practice, and that's why you're here tonight.

The last time I was here to speak to many of you was in 1976. My host and my escort was a quiet man, a modest man, a dedicated, humane, and compassionate man, a natural leader, a good administrator, loyal, unselfish, good Democrat, great political figure, Mayor Richard Daley.

I wish he could be here tonight. But as I went to visit the groups assembled here 2 years later, my escort was a quiet man, a modest man, a compassionate, dedicated man, good administrator, loyal, good Democrat, good political leader, Mike Bilandic.

He's given me some news tonight that I am going to use and share with Danny Rostenkowski and with Adlai Stevenson. He said when the board of aldermen meet in Chicago, he can predict that the vote's going to be 47 to 3. [Laughter] And that's the kind of organization, Danny, that I'm counting on in the House. But Democrats are independents. We're individuals. We share problems, we share successes, we're not afraid to deal with difficult issues. And I think this is the essence of our strength.

As a candidate in 1976, I drew strength from the support of Richard Daley and many of you, and I know that the candidates that you have supported and sent to Springfield and to Washington cannot be excelled anywhere in America. It was Jake Garvey and the Cook County Democrats who put together the great ticket of Paul Douglass, Adlai Stevenson in 1948, and who sent Tom Dewey back to New York and sent Harry Truman to the White House again.

And it was Dick Daley and the Cook County Democrats again who helped our Nation and Illinois by working to send another Adlai Stevenson to Washington in 1970.

This year, it'll be George Dunne and Jack Touhy, Mike Bilandic and the rest of the Cook County Democrats and State Democrats who will send Alex Seith to Washington and Mike Bakalis to the Governor's mansion in Springfield. You've done it before and I know you can do it again.

Now, I know that the Republicans can outspend us. They just about always have more money to spend in an election year than Democrats, but they can't outwork us. They can't outwork the Democrats in the Southside, in Bridgeport, Evanston, Cicero, Oak Park, or any of the other towns and neighborhoods around Cook County. And the Republican Party, although they have had some victories, of course, has never been able to earn the deep and penetrating and abiding loyalties of the people of this country.

The men and women who remember the great Presidents of this century, Democrats—Woodrow Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt, Harry Truman, John Kennedy, Lyndon Johnson—they remember the promises the Democrats made and the promises that we have worked to keep, men and women in your tradition have gone to the polls again and again to send Democratic candidates to Washington and to Springfield.

Because of loyal Democrats committed to principles and ideals that bind us together, we've been the majority party in the United States for nearly 50 years. We've set the political agenda for our Nation. We've provided the leadership, the reforms, the great social and economic advances. We have brought prosperity and jobs. We've provided the new ideas, the new faces, the progressive changes, and now we are leading the way on the new challenge of our own era, making our government lean and efficient, so that it can do the job that the people want it to do.

We have brought into our political system people who were formerly excluded, working families, women, young people, immigrants, minorities, and we've provided dignity and hope for all of them.

Franklin Roosevelt said it well in 1932, and I quote from him: "These unhappy times call for the building of plans, from the bottom up, and not from the top down, that put their faith once more in the forgotten man at the bottom of the economic pyramid."

Now, compare that with the Republican Party. Its answer to just about every serious question and problem in this country has been one word—"no." Before I got elected with your help, the Republican administration even said no to putting people back to work. But we Democrats are saying yes to better education, yes to decent health care, yes to a real effort to stop inflation with mutual sacrifice, yes to tax reduction and tax reform, yes to solving our energy crisis, yes to reorganization and efficiency in government, and yes to human rights in our own country and throughout the world.

Well, in 1976, because of these differences, the Nation said no to the Republicans, and we will tell them, the Republicans, the same thing again in November, in Cook County, in Illinois, and in every other State in the Nation.

With the help of Adlai Stevenson, Danny Rostenkowski, and many others, all the Illinois Democratic Delegation, we've already begun to tackle our most serious problems, some of them almost insoluble, some of them long ignored because they are politically difficult. They are not popular, but we've had success already.

We've added 5.5 million net new jobs to our economy since January of last year. This is a record that's never before been equaled in the history of our country, and we are still expanding jobs for Americans.

Last month alone, we created more than a half million more jobs, and we are making sure, as the mayor pointed out, that Cook County gets its fair share of those jobs. And the reason for it is because you are willing to do your part.

The mayor was very gracious in saying that we were financing from Washington Chicago's plan for development. As a matter of fact, we committed yesterday to provide $7 million—later on this year, perhaps $12 million more. But when Juanita Kreps, the Secretary of Commerce, came to talk to Mayor Bilandic and she said, "What are you going to do? What are your local lending institutions going to do to finance this program?" he said, "Our banks will put up $250 million." And she looked quizzical, so he presented it to her in writing.

And that sort of partnership between the Federal, State, and local government, Democrats working together with private industry, private labor, will be responsible over the next 3 years for an additional 17,000 industrial jobs.

We are also facing up to inflation, the most difficult single domestic issue that I have on my shoulder and that you have on your shoulder. We are not addressing inflation by keeping people out of work. We are not imposing mandatory price and wage controls. But by a voluntary partnership to pull down the wage-price spiral, we've frozen salaries for Federal executives to make sure that the Government sets an example of restraint.

We are bringing the huge Federal bureaucracy under control. We are reorganizing it. We are cutting redtape. We are eliminating useless regulations.

In 1 day OSHA eliminated 1,100 regulations, a bright day. We've even begun to write the necessary regulations in English for a change that farmers and our kinfolks from Plains, Georgia, can understand. And I've even asked the authors of the regulations now to sign them, and I hope they will be proud of what they produce.

We are close to a national energy plan that our country has needed for decades, a goal for which Adlai Stevenson and your whole congressional delegation have worked so hard, to begin cutting down on our extraordinary dependence on foreign oil.

We are now importing about $45 billion worth of oil from overseas. That money comes out of your pocket and mine. It robs us of job opportunities and growth and a better living standard. We are importing now almost half of the total oil we use. But we are on the verge now of having a good energy policy for a change.

We've devised, as the mayor mentioned, a national urban policy to create a new partnership between all levels of government and the private sector, to put new life back into our great cities—and particularly those who haven't done quite as well as Chicago, but there's plenty there to help Chicago, too.

And when we evolved this program we did not do it in the isolation of a backroom in the Oval Office of the White House. We consulted with Mayor Bilandic and other mayors around the country. We worked with the Members of Congress. We worked with Governors, State legislators, county officials to make sure that when we came out with a program it was sound, and we didn't add very much money to the Federal budget to carry it out. We primarily are now ensuring that partnership lets us get more benefit, more service from all the ongoing programs and for the few new ones that we are adding. We are revitalizing housing programs, job training, public transportation, environmental protection, civil rights protection, the Peace Corps. Under all this I'm completely dedicated to binding American families back together.

We ended the Republican cutbacks in aid to education. And I noticed from what Mike said, you've got the same philosophy in the State Capitol, to cut back education. We tried to change that. In fact, we've increased aid to education more than ever before in history, and we put the emphasis back on the efficient use of funds for basic learning skills.

We are keeping a strong defense and breathing new life into our vital military alliances like NATO. Our strength militarily, economically, politically, the harmony between the Congress and the White House, is preserving peace. We've gone for the past year and a half without having one single American soldier shed blood in any foreign war.

And I'm determined to sustain this record and create world peace. We've made progress in the movement toward peace in the Middle East, but not in any way at the expense of our special relationship with Israel or at any risk to Israel's security. As I have said many times, we will never waver from our deep friendship and partnership with Israel and our total commitment to its peace and security.

We are working to stop nuclear proliferation and to remove the threat of human destruction by atomic weapons. And I'm proud to say we've put our national prestige on the line for human rights in every corner of the world. Whether a country is behind the Iron Curtain or not, we will no longer be silent as a nation about oppression and injustice. We are saying, "Give your people freedom to worship, to express themselves, to shape their own destiny, to vote, to live in peace, and to live in freedom." And as long as I'm President, we will never back down on our struggle for human rights around the world.

Well, we've done all this in less than a year and a half. And it's just the beginning. We are going to reform our health care system to guarantee decent health care at minimum cost for American citizens.

We are going to reform our welfare system, to cut waste and to help break the tragic cycle of poverty once and for all.

We are working to cut taxes and to reform our tax system, to make it simple and fair. We are going to make sure that every tax dollar is spent wisely. We are going to wring out the waste from our system by taking a close hard look at every program that spends the taxpayers' money.

In short, we are putting aside the neglect of 8 long years, and we are getting back to work. We've started again on the unfinished agenda that Democrats set for ourselves nearly five decades ago during the Hoover Depression, and our steady progress will continue.

That still means a lot of hard work ahead, electing Democratic Senators and Members of Congress, and Governors and State officials and State legislators, mayors, county officials, aldermen who care about people, who represent the deep traditions of this party.

We're the oldest political party in the world, 186 years old, formed and led in the early years by Thomas Jefferson and other great Americans. But we didn't come this far by letting the system work by itself. It takes people of all colors, all backgrounds and ages, from all walks of life, to keep the Democratic Party fresh and active, to work not just at election time but every day. That's why we've been so successful and will be again this year in Cook County and in Illinois.

So, I call on you tonight to keep working for this great Nation and this great party of ours. Give it your support generously. It's an investment in your own future. Keep it alive and vital. Keep it open and responsive and caring about others. And above all, remember where we get our strength. Remember our Democratic Party history and keep it serving the people.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:08 p.m. Dinner guests included George W. Dunne, president, Cook County Board of Commissioners, and Cook County Democratic chairman, Jack Touhy, Illinois Democratic Party chairman, and Alex Seith, Democratic candidate for the U.S. Senate.

Following the dinner, the President went to the home of James and Mary Eleanor Wall in Elmhurst, Ill., a suburb of Chicago, where he spent the night.

Springfield, Illinois

*Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session
With Members of the State Legislature.
May 26, 1978*

Governor Thompson, Senator Stevenson, President Hynes, Speaker Redmond, Mr. Chief Justice, other distinguished leaders of the great State of Illinois:

It's an honor for me to be here with you in this historic place from whence has come so many profound statements and deliberations in the history of our country and from which came perhaps the greatest leader who's ever lived in the President's house.

I'm very grateful, too, for the political wisdom concentrated here, as well as the governmental wisdom. When I began to plan my own campaign, I talked to present Speaker Redmond. He told me how to win an election, easily and quickly. [Laughter]

And I know that appearances here have proven to be very good in future Presidential elections. I think the last President who spoke here, according to the news media, was Herbert Hoover—[laughter]—who came here in 1931, just before his election, or campaign against Franklin Roosevelt.

This morning I have prepared a speech text which has been distributed, or will be, to you. I prepared it myself, and I think perhaps you might want to read it over.

But I thought in order to have a more constructive session for me that I would make a very few impromptu remarks and then spend what time we have together answering your questions. And just to be sure we are completely fair, I'll ask the speaker to recognize you for questions a little bit later on.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES

I've been a member of a State legislature. My first elective office was to the Georgia State senate, where I served two terms. And I came to realize then the extreme importance of State government, the difficulties of public service, the courage required to make decisions on controversial issues, because almost every issue that comes here is difficult to resolve. If a matter is easy, it's solved in a family's home, or perhaps in a neighborhood or city hall or county courthouse. If it's much more difficult, it comes to your desk and eventually comes to the attention of the Congress of the United States and the President.

I know the pressures that come on members of government to try to deal fairly with their own constituents and still look at statewide problems and needs, and even those at the national and international scene. We've dealt, in the last 16 months in Washington, with these kinds of issues.

Tax reform sounds easy, but it is extremely difficult to hammer out with competing interest groups, focusing their attention on every Member of the Congress, a means by which we can reduce taxes on the American people, which are presently too high, and have a tax system that is simple and fair.

The welfare system is condemned from almost every vantage point, but it's almost impossible to hammer out a welfare system that gives needy people an adequate income to preserve their human dignity and at the same time can be a constant inducement for those who are able to work to go to work.

Our country is the greatest consumer of energy on Earth, and we are also one of the greatest producers of energy. The Congress has been debating energy problems, natural gas pricing, deregulation for 30 years, and the focusing of pressures on the Members of Congress in trying to give our country a vision of what we can and must do to cut down on extraordinary energy imports is almost an impossible task. But they are making good progress.

In the last 16 months, we have done well in cutting down the unemployment rate, which was the crucial domestic issue in January of 1977. We've added a net increase, with your help, of 5½ million jobs in our country, and the unemployment rate has been dropped from 8 percent to 6 percent. But we are now faced with a much more tenacious and difficult problem of dealing with inflation. And I'm determined, as President, to do all I can in spite of the adverse political consequences, and I believe the Congress will join in with me in standing up against the pressures from very benevolent groups, people whom we care about, farmers—I'm one of them—older people, veterans, those interested in space, those interested in better roads. But there's a limit to what we can do at the Federal Government level in financing these programs, but it is very difficult to stand up against those pressures and have a sound, businesslike administration of a complicated government.

We are faced at the national level with additional responsibilities on defense, how to keep our Nation strong, the strongest on Earth, to provide for the rapidly changing technology that gives the unforeseen challenges in the future. And you have to anticipate those and correlate research, development, demonstration programs, construction programs, to give us adequate weapons; at the same time seek for a reduction in those weapons and to kind of work with other countries in varying forms of success to get them to join in, in removing the threat of complete nuclear annihilation.

It's not easy to negotiate with the Russians on a SALT agreement, which is crucial to our country, and at the same time not let that be prevented by the unwarranted Soviet intrusion with their Cuban surrogates into Africa.

The Congress has dealt historically and courageously with the question of a Panama Canal Treaty, not a popular thing in the United States, but one, I think, that's absolutely important to our proper dealing with small countries around the world who look upon us to demonstrate that we believe in equality, that we believe in fairness, that we believe in human rights—a very difficult vote.

We've had another one recently on the Mideast arms sales, almost impossible to resolve to the satisfaction of the American people. It took a lot of courage to make those decisions, how to move toward peace in the Middle East, retain our total commitment to the security of Israel, at the same time not sever our relationship with the moderate Arab countries who also want peace so that they would have to turn to the Soviet Union or other Eastern bloc countries for their friendship and military needs—difficult questions. I recognize how hard it is to be a good State legislator, Governor, or Member of Congress.

This afternoon, I go back from here to West Virginia. I'll be talking about a subject that's important to Illinois—coal. And to study the technical aspects of the evolution of coal's use in the future, to correlate it with environmental protection, liquefaction, gasification, its competition with other energy sources is very, very complicated, and it's important for me to understand that subject, just as it is for you here in Illinois, a great coal-producing State.

Later tonight, I'll be meeting with President Giscard d'Estaing from France. Tomorrow morning I'm tentatively scheduled to meet with Foreign Minister Gromyko of the Soviet Union. I'll be getting tonight, late, a report from Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski, who's just come back from days of negotiation and communication with the leaders of the People's Republic of China.

So, I'm not saying these things to deplore the responsibility that I have to share with you, but to indicate to you that quite often the difficulties of public service are not adequately understood by the American people. And the best way to let them understand it is to keep an open mind and an open heart and an open door and to reach out for them for advice and counsel, because I believe that all these subjects can be best resolved successfully to the extent that the American people, the people of Illinois are involved in the deliberative process, that the debates are open. But when you make a decision in isolation, you have a tendency to create a Watergate or Vietnam war or a CIA embarrassment. But the American people are basically decent, basically honest, basically have great common sense, and to the extent that they are involved in a process, we can avoid the potential pitfalls of making an improper decision.

The eyes of the Nation now are focused on the men and women in this chamber. Illinois has a great tradition of insisting upon equality of opportunity. Lincoln conducted his debates in this very place. Illinois was the first State that voted to ratify the constitutional amendment giving women a right to vote. You have written into your own constitution equal rights for women.

Thirty-five other States have now ratified the equal rights amendment, and what you do here in this chamber in the next few weeks might very well determine whether women do have those equal rights guaranteed in the United States Constitution or whether they don't. And I know the focusing of political pressures on you is not easy to make that decision, and quite often you might fear, "I can't be reelected, or I can't please the more vocal groups in my district if I vote what I know my conscience says is right."

So, you share with me that kind of decision that is never easy. You and I share a partnership, because almost everything that we decide in Washington in giving American people fairness, equality, and opportunity to enjoy the privileges of citizenship are administered by you.

And we've tried to evolve programs recently, recognizing that partnership. A new urban policy was hammered out with members of your legislature, county officials, your Governor, obviously your congressional delegation.

Well, I'm very proud to be here, to share with you this morning some of my thoughts about the responsibilities of public service, the difficulties of it, but the gratification of knowing that we are helping to shape the character of our Nation and we are trying to make sure that Illinois represents, in its government, the finest possible aspects of our people, that we are trying to inspire them to reach for greatness, to honor ideals and principles, in spite, sometime, of the political consequences.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I would like for your joint session to ask me any question that you might have concerning national or international affairs. I'll do the best I can to answer the questions. If I don't know, one of those difficult political decisions is to admit that I don't know the answer. But I'll let the speaker recognize you, and I'll try to keep my answers brief.

SPEAKER REDMOND. Representative McPike, like the President, a graduate of the United States Naval Academy.

QUESTIONS

LABOR LAW REFORM

REPRESENTATIVE PIKE. Thank you, Mr. President. Roy Sandquist and I, as graduates of the Naval Academy, share your feelings on the equal rights amendment. But on another important subject, Illinois, as a northern, industrial State, in the past 10 years has lost many manufacturing jobs to the South. To a large degree we feel that this is due to nonunion wages that are prevalent in the Sunbelt. We therefore feel that passage of the labor law reform bill now in Congress is very important. Could you comment on its importance and on its chance of passage?

THE PRESIDENT. As you know, I'm from the South, and have been a Governor. And I would say that I spent 25 percent of my time, as do other Southeastern Governors, in recruiting investments in our State, not only from the rest of the Nation, including Illinois, but also from foreign countries, Japan, Germany, and others, and trying to sell Georgia products overseas. It is a major responsibility of a Southern Governor.

We have now narrowed, however, wage differentials between the South, which used to be very low-wage regions, compared to the rest of the country. The year that I went out of office as Governor, the difference was only 11 percent, because as the major nationwide companies have moved into Georgia, South Carolina, other Southeastern States, they cannot afford to pay their own employees a different wage scale in Georgia than they do in Illinois. Locally grown, nonunionized companies, of course, have attempted and have sometimes succeeded in not meeting that competition, and have very low wage rates. I favor the labor law reform legislation. I think it is a very modest bill. I read every provision of it before I would send it to the Congress with my approval.

I am a very conservative Southern businessman by heritage, and I think that the National Labor Relations Act, which was a major step forward when it was passed, has been the basis for harmony, for higher productivity, for less conflict between business and labor for a long time.

There are a few defects in the law that ought to be corrected—unnecessary delay, deprivation of employee rights—and although I think it might contribute, as you said, to a more stable labor base throughout the country and eliminate some advantages that the South does have in that respect, I still favor the legislation. And as you know, the House passed it overwhelmingly. There's a majority in the Senate for it already. The question is whether or not 60 votes can be obtained for cloture to stop the filibuster. My prediction is that the law will be passed.

SPEAKER REDMOND. Representative MacDonald.

SOCIAL SECURITY SYSTEM

REPRESENTATIVE MACDONALD. Thank you, Mr. President. We are honored by your visit here in Illinois today, and we hope you enjoy it.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, it's my honor.

REPRESENTATIVE MACDONALD. As you know, Mr. President, inflation is the enemy of all of us as elected officials, and I was wondering how you felt the increase in the social security tax affected your long-range fight on inflation?

THE PRESIDENT. There's no doubt that the passage of a social security tax will contribute to inflation to some degree. I think, though, that the compensating tax reduction which we are proposing now—originally $25 billion, now lowered to $19 or $20 billion—would much more than compensate for any increase in social security taxes. Also, as you well know, the average working family in our country will not have their social security payments increased because of the recent legislation.

That legislation was absolutely mandatory. Two of the three reserve funds for the social security system were faced with immediate bankruptcy. One of them would have gone bankrupt next year, the other one 3 years later. So, the Congress had to increase income going into those reserve funds to keep the social security system sound for all of us.

The primary increase in social security payments will fall on those who are in an income bracket $20, $30, $40,000, up, the higher range of the working families of our country. But I think one thing that has been forgotten is that as they pay higher social security taxes in the future and there are modest increases, they will also get higher benefits if there should be a death or if they live until retirement. So, there a compensation is made.

So, although it does contribute slightly to inflation, there is no alternative to it. The only alternative being considered by Congress is whether to finance the social security system from general funds, and the Congress feels—certainly the Senate feels much more strongly—that the social security system should stand on its own and should not be financed by general funds.

So, I think that I've explained it as best I can. I was in favor of the bill, am glad the Congress is not going to undo it. We have set up, or are setting up, a long-term analysis of the social security system that will be ready for me and the Congress perhaps within a year. But this legislation now passed, moderate increases for the higher income families, will keep the social security system sound for the next 25 years. It's a good investment.

SPEAKER REDMOND. Representative Berman. I just want to show the senate that we really are fair in the house. Senator Berman.

SENATOR BERMAN. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. President, welcome to Springfield. We're honored to have you here.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you.

U.S. RELATIONS WITH ISRAEL

SENATOR BERMAN. My question relates to the concerns of the Jewish community in relation to the State of Israel. Many of us who have Jewish constituents and are Jewish in this body have great apprehension that there's been a deviation from the classic position of the United States of a special relationship and a total commitment to the security of Israel. We have heard of this apprehension from our own constituents, and I appreciate your office has indicated that an aide would be willing to meet with the Jewish legislators after your meeting, but I don't think that's necessary because I think this is much more meaningful, and I appreciate this opportunity.

I think the Jewish community is going to be looking for deeds, but I would ask you this morning to please comment on what type of message we can bring back to these people that are fearful of this deviation, to reassure them of the total commitment of your administration to the security of Israel.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you, sir. This is one of those difficult questions that I mentioned earlier.

The special relationship between the United States and Israel still stands. Our total commitment to Israel's security and our hope for peace is still preeminent among all the other considerations that our Nation has in the Middle East.

I have spent more time on the Middle Eastern question since I've been in the White House than any other subject, not just in analysis within our own group and with the Members of the Congress, who are deeply interested about what our country's position ought to be, but having long, detailed, sometimes private conversations with all the leaders of nations participating in the potential or existing negotiations in the Middle East.

Israel has dominant air capability in the Middle East, and that dominance will even increase as a result of the recent approved arms sales.

I don't know anyone in the world that I am more convinced wants peace than Anwar Sadat. When I met with him for the first time early last year, he said to me, "Mr. President, what is it that I can do to break the deadlock that has existed for years and years between us and Israel?" I said, "First of all, you can negotiate directly with the leaders of Israel, not through us as intermediaries." He said, "I don't believe that's possible, Mr. President."

I said, "You can break down the barriers that have existed between Egyptians and Israelis and the hatred that evolves from constant radio broadcasts and propaganda efforts." He said, "I believe I can do that."

I said, "You can put forward a proposal where in the future the borders between Israel and Egypt will be open for trade, tourism, student exchange, cultural exchange, even diplomatic recognition." And he said, "That will never come in my lifetime."

That was about a year ago. And there has been a dramatic change since then. Most of it took place, as you know, during the November–December era, when Begin received Sadat with open arms, and vice versa. And both those leaders have told me they were shocked at the warmth of the reception of Israeli negotiators when they arrived in Egypt, and of Sadat and his negotiators when they arrived in Jerusalem. I think this proves that the people in Egypt and Israel genuinely want peace.

Since then I've met with both leaders extensively, and I'm convinced that if we sever our relationship with the moderate Arab nations, with Egypt—by far the dominant nation as far as the Arab world goes—with the Saudi Arabians—who are not part of the negotiating process, but who have a very good moderating influence—with King Hussein, and just isolate ourselves with a bilateral relationship with Israel, it would almost prevent any further, future progress on peace.

So, our commitment is to continue, in spite of constant discouragement, in spite of political costs, to move toward a resolution of the issue.

I think when Sadat went to Jerusalem, that Begin responded with a very good proposal, which was a step in the right direction, a basis for good negotiations—how to withdraw from the Sinai, how to have some negotiations about home rule, so-called, for the West Bank, Gaza Strip area.

We are not trying to impose a settlement, but we'll still have active negotiations going on, getting a message from the Israelis, delivering it to the Egyptians—they're always disappointed—getting a message from Sadat, delivering it back to the Israelis—they're always disappointed. We're kind of an unappreciated postman going back and forth between leaders who tried to open a door at the end of last year and have now seen the door closed again.

I believe that the confidence that Egypt now has that we are concerned about their security, not against Israel—the F-5E's are no match for the Israeli Air Force—but against their other neighbors, who are on the continent of Africa, I think, is a very sound insurance policy that in the future Sadat will trust me enough and trust our Nation enough to continue to negotiate in good faith, even when the Syrians, the Iraqis, the Libyans, and others are castigating him for keeping the peace doors open.

And I believe that Israel can rest assured that there will never be any deviation in our own country, of our total commitment to giving them adequate provisions to defend themselves.

Prime Minister Begin, I think, shares what I've just said to you, and I don't believe that Sadat would disagree with a word of it. But there need be no concern among the Israeli people nor among Jews in this country that our Nation has changed or turned away from Israel. It was a difficult vote, but I think it was an honoring of past commitments. And if we had violated our Nation's word of honor to provide that modest amount of military capability to those two Arab countries, I think we would have driven them away from us permanently and driven permanently away any prospect for peace in the Middle East, which we pray for and which I'm determined to pursue until the last day I'm in the White House.

I believe we still have a good chance for success.

SPEAKER REDMOND. Senator Glass.

LABOR LAW REFORM

SENATOR GLASS. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. President, lest you leave Illinois with the feeling that all members of the chamber share the views of my esteemed colleague on the other side of the aisle regarding the labor reform act, let me assure you that only is not true, but I and, I think, a number of others feel it would be one of the most dangerous and disastrous pieces of legislation for our free enterprise system as it exists today. And I don't intend to belabor the point, because you have stated your position on the bill, but I would like to be specific about it.

There is a provision in the bill that would require blacklisting of businesses who have violated the terms of the act. And as I understand it, that would prohibit the Federal Government from engaging with those firms in signing contracts with them.

I wondered if you would approve that provision and, if so, why?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, there are several provisions in the bill that concern the Members of the Senate. I do favor the bill as it was passed by the House, which includes that particular aspect. I would not describe it in exactly the same words you used. But there is some need for a threat of punishment to any person in this country who violates a law, and if a business violates the laws of the United States, there has to be some threat of consequence adverse to that business. It might be imprisonment in the penitentiary, it might be a very heavy fine, or it might be the threat of losing Government business until they do come into compliance.

There's a debate about how long an election might be delayed, whether it'll be 30 days, 45 days, or 60 days. There's a concern among many people, also, about the right of labor, if business campaigns against a labor organization, that that labor organization has a right to access to that property. That bothers a lot of Americans. But my guess is that when the Senate gets through debating the bill—and it's a fairly narrow vote, nobody knows the outcome of it yet—that some of the things of concern to you might very well be changed.

But I know the controversy involved in this bill. I think if the bill had been radical in nature, there would not have been mounted a more strong attack on it. In my opinion as a businessman myself, coming from a very conservative region of our country, it is a very modest and moderate piece of legislation. But there's room for disagreement, which you pointed out very well.

SPEAKER REDMOND. Representative Ray Yourell.

URBAN UNEMPLOYMENT

REPRESENTATIVE YOURELL. Mr. President, the urban areas have become decadent in many ways; some are almost bankrupt, and minority employment is about 30 percent or better in some areas. Considering these areas as man-made disasters, has your administration made any plans, let's say, perhaps to consider them man-made disaster areas and thereby capable of receiving help. Or perhaps you have taken the Humphrey-Hawkins plan under consideration, or perhaps you have a plan of your own.

Do you have a comment?

THE PRESIDENT. I'll be glad to. Of course, one of the most severe problems in the ghetto areas have been deterioration of the quality of life, not just housing, transportation, law enforcement, health care, education, but also a matter that struck to the heart of those regions, and that was the unemployment question.

I think the Congress has made notable progress in the last 16 months. The programs have been administered well, too. And as I said earlier, we've cut down the unemployment rate substantially, and we've increased employment opportunities, a net of 5½ million jobs, which has never been achieved before in the history of our country. Those programs are still ongoing. Since we've now cut down the general unemployment rate among those easier to employ, now I think the special programs, the public works programs, the CETA jobs, and so forth, can be more narrowly focused upon those who are difficult to employ.

We've also marshaled the support of the National Alliance of Businessmen. Sixteen months ago the highest unemployment rate among white and black young people was Vietnam veterans. We had a special program called HIRE, where the business community volunteered to hire Vietnam veterans. We have now cut that unemployment rate down among that particular group so that it is actually lower than the average of their age group throughout the country.

I had a meeting at the White House this past week, this week, with about 150 top business and labor leaders, and they volunteered now to add 100,000 more jobs, employing those that are most hard-core at the time of unemployment, those that are the last to be hired and the first to be fired. So unemployment, we've made very good progress.

We've hammered out now for the first time in the history of our country again a comprehensive urban policy. We didn't do it in an isolated room or from an ivory-tower prospective in the White House. We've worked closely with the Members of Congress, including Gus Hawkins and others. We worked closely with Governors, mayors, county officials all over the Nation, and I think it's gotten almost unanimous rave reviews.

We didn't add all that much money in total budget expenditures. It's a very modest financed program, but it brings into cohesion for the first time the interrelationship among the different departments and agencies of Government. And its thrust is, under Pat Harris, better houses, under the Transportation Department, better and more focused transportation systems. And it forms a partnership between State and local government and the Federal Government.

I think it will be very constructive in the future. It really preserves and enhances our system of federalism. I'm quite aware that when we had this general progress, when the GNP goes up 6 percent last year, when business profits are at all-time high, when, lately, the stock market has gone up, when the unemployment rate goes down, that there are pockets of unemployment among young people, black people, women, that are still extremely high. And this preys on my mind constantly, and the Congress is very much aware of it.

So, we have made some progress in the short time I've been in the White House. But I intend to obviously make more progress. And there I think we can mutually support one another, because the State legislators, the Governors, and others can do a great deal to point out to us defects in how we administer those laws and make sure that jobs actually go to the people that deserve them and want them, and the housing programs actually serve those who are most in need, and so forth.

Transportation, education, all are very important. We've added more education dollars to the Federal contribution than ever before in history, even under Lyndon Johnson, but, you know, we don't administer the elementary and secondary schools. That's got to be done at the State level and the local level, and that's the way it ought to be. So, we'll do our part. I'm sure you'll do your part to make us bring about some resolution of these longstanding, chronic sufferings in our country that are unwarranted, primarily because of past discriminations and present lack of knowledge or callousness about those who are less fortunate than all of us assembled here.

Let me say this in closing: I've enjoyed this very much, and I think you might want to read over the speech that I had written earlier. It gives some additional points that I touched on briefly this morning. It's helpful to me to understand what questions are of concern to you.

Illinois is our great agriculture-producing State. I'll be meeting with Senator Bruce and a few others immediately after this meeting. They've gotten a group of farmers to give me questions about exports. We had our best export year in history last year, even with depressed prices. We're determined to have an even greater agricultural export year this year. And we are working very hard to make sure that we do have a sound program that affects not only the country but you.

Now, I recognize that quite often when I make a nationwide decision that we leave gaps because of special local differences or aberrations from the average. We have to make, in Washington, the laws apply to the average. And that's where the State legislators come in. Because to the extent that you understand the thrust of a Federal program, you can either take full advantage of that if it's adequate and invest your money and your efforts somewhere else, or if you have a special need that can't be recognized by a nationwide law, then you can fill in the gaps and meet the needs of your own people.

But to get back to my original premise, the insurance that we have that we make those decisions properly is to stay close to the people who put us in office. And this is one of the elements I think that's been missing too much in our political structure in the last few years, because there's been a building up of distrust against government, and a chasm has opened between government and people. And that can be resolved only by you and me.

We live in the greatest nation on Earth, and I hope that with your help, the Congress help, and the help of all American people, in the years ahead we can make it even greater than it is.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:16 a.m. in the house chamber at the State Capitol Building. Prior to his remarks, the President met with William A. Redmond, speaker of the house, Thomas C. Hynes, president of the senate, Daniel P. Ward, chief justice of the supreme court, and other Illinois State officials in the speaker's office at the State Capitol.

Springfield, Illinois

Remarks at a Fundraising Breakfast for Michael Bakalis. May 26, 1978

Senator Stevenson, Governor Shapiro, my longtime friend and classmate, Governor Dan Walker, Secretary Dixon, future Senator Alex Seith, future Governor Michael Bakalis:

I've enjoyed my visit to Illinois. I've been excited and exhilarated by the friendship and the warmth of the welcome here, by the determination and the spirit that exists within the Democratic Party.

I have been concerned about some things, though. The problems that I face in Washington seem to be much more acute when you leave there and come out among people.

The price of food concerns me. You could have bought the same breakfast yesterday morning for $2 or $3. [Laughter] But perhaps this is good for Mike. I understand that in Illinois the Governor has to get used to lobster, cognac. [Laughter]

Mike pointed out the trials and tribulations and also the excitement of running for a major public office and dealing with political questions as an underdog. I know how that is. I have to deal with the Congress every day. [Laughter] But I do know that there is a need in this State for a man who fills the unique standards of leadership.

I've gotten to know Mike Bakalis since I first came in Illinois to campaign. Mike had a campaign breakfast for me here in Springfield the first time I visited your capital. And I've studied the issues in Illinois. And I've tried to think about what the people of this State would want if they were choosing a perfect Governor.

First, I think there would be some requirement of compatibility between the Governor on one hand, local officials, schoolteachers, colleges, county Democratic Party officials who are loyal, congressional delegations, the President, to make sure that we get the best out of our system of federalism, with which God has blessed us; a man who can work in harmony, not in a disputatious or combative way, because the people don't like to see division and sharp disagreements among public officials who serve them. It might make the headlines and the press might be intrigued with it, but what the people want, who are not particularly interested in politics but just want their services to be filled, is someone who can bridge a gap and not create a gap.

I think Mike Bakalis is that kind of a person. I would say in this day and age in our country there is a real concern about distrust of government by people. How can we have good service, at the same time be treated fairly, have our children lead a better life, even than the one we have, not have our government run uncontrolled and waste our taxpayers' money? These are questions difficult to resolve.

And if I were seeking for a perfect Governor of Illinois, I would want a man whose background and experience could guarantee that that is his qualification and his attitude.

There's not a more self-sacrificial commitment that I know than a bright young person who volunteers, when he begins his life, to be an elementary school teacher and to teach high school and later to be responsible for the educational system of a great State. It's a thankless job. And particularly during the years when Mike Bakalis filled this responsibility, because that was in a transition phase when quite often mayors and Governors, Members of Congress were reluctant to accommodate social change and to deal with the difficult question of caring for children—some of whom were black, some of whom were white—but to educate us, were on the cutting edge of making changes that have benefited us all, it took not just dedication and unselfishness and knowledge and high training but it took a sensitivity and a compassion that this man has exemplified.

I think it's important, too, that there be a close relationship between a public servant and people who still have to work for a living. A lot of us have been blessed by God with high achievement and a sound and secure economic status and a predictable job opportunity that we don't have to worry about every day, and we are socially prominent and we are politically influential. If our children get in trouble with the law, the chances are that we can go to the judge and in a completely proper way say, "Judge, I have a good family and my boy has made a mistake. And I hope that you will let him not go to prison. It would destroy his life; let us be responsible for him."

The chances are the judge would do right and say okay. But someone who does not enjoy our standards, who might be very poor or illiterate or from a divided family, or the father unemployed or black or who can't speak English well, the same judge, with the same open heart and the same dedication to justice, might say I don't think we can trust this young person who's made a mistake to go back into that family home.

So, I think that a public servant has got to know from experience how to deal not only with students in the classroom but with their families back home and say, "How can we correct the defects that exist in our great country and give those dependent people who want to share our blessings an opportunity to do so, not with a government handout, but with a chance to work, to have some self-respect, to feel like they are equal in a country that's dedicated to equality of opportunity?" And that sensitivity exists in Mike Bakalis.

Government is designed to serve those who need help most and the humaneness of government is not incompatible with a tough, competent, businesslike, managerial approach. You can't deliver services adequately from a limited supply of tax income if the government is disorganized or wasteful and if you don't have the judgment and the sound practical experience behind you to make priority judgments and to work harmoniously with your fellow public servants.

Well, Mike has had that kind of background and experience. He's done a superb job in his present position. No one doubts it. Everybody agrees. There are some Republicans who think he ought to stay there because he has done such a good job. But I think that combination of understanding the need and the thrust and the legitimate function of government on the one hand, and tough, competent business management on the other, is rare. But he happens to have it.

And, finally, I would like to have a man that has a background that kind of gives him a picture, even from his infant years, of what this country is, the diversity of people. Now this is not a melting pot, as I said many times during my campaign, it's more like a mosaic. You've got different people that retain their identity and their heritage and their pride, but still fit in together to create the strength of our country. And as Mike himself just mentioned, his parents came here from a foreign country, from Greece, a man who had no assured job—Mike's father—he drove a truck, couldn't speak English well, of course, later saved up money because of hard work and care, and the love and support of his family, bought a little short-order restaurant.

But he had two boys that he cared for and loved—George became a lawyer, a very expensive process, and Mike got his doctorate in education.

And it was the kind of family structure that I think is needed in our country—a solid, unshakable, family inter-relationship that is the foundation of what America is. Because the boys didn't sit back and say, "Daddy, you put me through college." They joined in and did their share and then some, and it was a mutuality about that thrust and purpose in those young men's lives that's part of the American dream.

And there's no doubt in my mind that Mike can understand the special problems of Spanish American people who still can't speak English very well, or the very poor, or the black, or the very young or the very old, or the European families who have come here recently, who make up our country. He can understand that, not because he goes and studies it or asks some college professor to let him read a book, but because he's part of it.

So, you've got the kind of leader here who has those qualifications, and I would say the last and most important thing as far as a political campaign is concerned is not letting down one's supporters. I would hate to invest $500 in the campaign of somebody if I didn't think they were going to do more than their share. Well, you don't have to worry about that. You've seen Mike in the past, in his two previous campaigns against almost hopeless odds, win.

And that ability to plan a campaign against hopeless odds is a very good preview of the way someone serves as a school superintendent or a comptroller or a Governor, because if he can put together that, it shows that you can work with other people in the same common goal. But I think the campaign being successful also shows that he can relate to the person on the street when he reaches out a hand and says, "I'm Mike Bakalis, I'm running for Governor." I think that there's got to be a kind of an interrelationship there and a mutual trust. There's a foundation for a success, and I know that you know that Mike Bakalis will never sit back and say, "Let my friends do it." He'll be working longer hours than any of you or any of his staff, and he'll be studying the sensitivities of Illinois people and the needs of this State more than perhaps any of you.

So, in closing I would like to say this: I'm thankful to you for your generosity in coming here this morning to help out a good man. But there's more to it than that. This is not going to be an easy campaign.

I know how difficult it is to run against an incumbent. President Ford was my opponent. And in spite of the early polls when Ford and Ronald Reagan were still fighting each other and each one of their supporters didn't want to pledge to support the other, I saw that to run against a good, sound person who has the aura of the office is very difficult. But I've got confidence in Mike that he can win. But it's not going to be possible for him to do so if you come here this morning, say "I've done all I can, I've given a good contribution, let Mike handle the rest."

Every one of you ought to be thinking now about how you can go back to your own community and become the core of a rapidly spreading campaign organization, kind of a personal campaign manager. It's important to Illinois. You know how I feel about this brilliant young man who's kind of one of the shining new stars on the political horizon, who has all the qualifications that I've just described. I wouldn't say them if I didn't really think they were true.

I don't think anyone in here would disagree with what I've said about him. Even his political opponents could not possibly disagree with what I've said. He would be a credit to Illinois, and a credit to the United States of America.

I hope that you and I can help him get elected.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:25 a.m. in the Lincoln Room at the Holiday Inn East. In his opening remarks he referred to former Illinois Governors Samuel H. Shapiro and Dan Walker, and the secretary of state of Illinois, Alan J. Dixon.

Charleston, West Virginia

Remarks at a Fundraising Reception for Senator Jennings Randolph. May 26, 1978

Senator Jennings Randolph, Governor and Mrs. Rockefeller, Congressman John Slack and Rahall, distinguished members of the Jennings Randolph fan club, of which I am a member:

It's very good to be back in your great State. I'm following in this beautiful place one of my favorite performers, Willie Nelson, who's perhaps the greatest country music player in the country, with the possible exception of the majority leader of the Senate. [Laughter] And Willie Nelson represents, in a strange way, the same thing that Jennings Randolph does. He sings about average American people, hopes and dreams and fears and discouragements, concerns, questions. He sings about being homesick, and he sings about young people who go away and who want to have an opportunity to go back where they came from and find a good job and a sound life. He sings about veterans who have been in Vietnam and who came back to a strange world where they were not adequately appreciated. He sings about people who are handicapped in different ways—people who are poor, people who are not well educated, people who don't have a strong, loud, demanding voice, and who don't belong to any organization that's powerful. He sings about the greatness of our country, and particularly about the working people of the United States.

And those are exactly the same people who love and who are served so well by Jennings Randolph. There's something special about this man. This meeting or rally was not even planned until about 10 days ago. But the fact that you have come here from all over this great State, traveling hundreds of miles to pay your respects to a leader, is indicative of how much you care about him. The former majority leader of the U.S. Senate, Mike Mansfield, said recently that Jennings Randolph had touched the lives of more Americans than any other United States Senator who has ever served.

Senator Randolph's career has been long and distinguished, but there's another remarkable thing about him, and that is he does not dwell in the past. And I want to relate to you just a couple of his accomplishments, which I believe demonstrate his proven devotion to duty, his tenacity when he faces obstacles in the way of his doing a good service for you and the other American people, and his vision of the future.

In the depths of the Depression, which I remember very well, and which all of you remember too who are old enough, Jennings Randolph sat down with a map of the United States of America, and he drew lines north and south and east and west. He called his product, way back then, the transcontinental super highway system. And then he began to hold congressional hearings.

It took 20 years for other Members of Congress and the Presidents to realize how badly our Nation needs a better road system to take our goods to market and let our people be bound together as visitors, as friends, and as part of one great national family.

We now have the Interstate Highway System. And I drove in a few minutes ago from the airport, and I realized that every one of the Interstate Highway System roads built in West Virginia and in Georgia, 90 percent of the cost was authorized by Jennings Randolph's committee, and the original concept and idea was originated in the mind of this great man.

But he's a modest man. He's not the kind who would go around this State saying, "I built you this road." He doesn't try to claim credit for his great work. But it would be a serious mistake for those who live in this State and who are going to make a decision this fall to forget what he's done for you and for us in Georgia and throughout the Nation. And this is the kind of quiet service that ought to constantly be recognized.

Another example—and I wish I had time to go through a whole list, but I just picked out two or three. In 1942 Jennings Randolph introduced a proposed amendment to the Constitution to extend the right to vote to young Americans 18 years old. They were old enough to fight and to give their lives for our country, but for most Americans, even enlightened Members of the House and Senate, who were Democrats even, they were not old enough to vote. But Jennings Randolph, being a man whose heart is young and who can see the value of the future, said, "I think these young people ought to have a right of citizenship."

His amendment was not adopted that year, but as is his nature, Jennings Randolph did not give up. He introduced this proposal 11 different times, and each time picked up a little more support because of his persistence and the depths of his belief in young people.

And in 1970, the Congress finally passed and then the States ratified the 26th amendment to the great Constitution of the United States. And it's a credit to him, of course, but it's also a credit to West Virginia that this document, which shapes our lives now and in the future, was modified for one of the few times in history by the man who has served this State so well. And again, he's a modest man. He doesn't go around bragging about his accomplishments, but that quiet, good, solid service, based on visions of the future years but also based in how close he is to you and to your children, is what has made him so effective.

Well, finally, let me just recall for you that in 1959, Jennings Randolph introduced a bill to create a national commission on fuels and energy. I wish it had passed when he introduced it. [Laughter] But this was a measure specifically requiring that our Congress and the President back then develop a national energy plan. And when he introduced this legislation almost 20 years ago, his words were clear and prophetic, and I would like to quote just one sentence: "Every year we delay in establishing a national energy policy perhaps brings us 1 year closer to disaster."

Almost 20 years later, finally, we're on the verge of developing a sound energy plan for our country.

Of course, I can't claim that Jennings Randolph didn't have some ulterior motive in mind, because the plan calls for a heavy reliance on West Virginia coal.

I don't believe anybody here will be surprised to learn that the coal utilization conversion bill which has already been approved by the House and Senate conference committee—and it's sure to become law—is almost exactly the same bill that Jennings Randolph introduced himself long before I became President. And I might add that as we use more and more coal, that coal will be hauled over the same Federal highways and the roads in West Virginia for which Jennings Randolph is directly responsible.

Well, I won't talk much longer, but I would like to say a couple more things. I've just cited a few of the accomplishments of this great leader. But they vividly underscore that he's not a man of yesterday, but he's a man of today and tomorrow. He's strong, determined, vigorous, active, competent, and because of the respect which he enjoys throughout the Congress and certainly in the White House, he's effective.

I think that there's no one who has done more for American veterans. I think there's no one who's done more for the disabled and the handicapped people of the United States. I think there's no one who's done more for all those who live in Appalachia, because the legislation that set up the Appalachian Commission, which I headed as chairman when I was Governor, was introduced, you know, by Jennings Randolph.

He doesn't believe in government hand-outs for those who are able to work, but he believes in giving people the opportunity to work if they are able. And I don't believe anybody has helped me more in trying to bring down the unemployment rate than has Jennings Randolph.

And finally, and what's perhaps most important of all for me, is that he's a man on whom you can depend, a man of absolute integrity. There has never been an allegation against his honesty, against his integrity, against his commitment of what was fine and decent and idealistic, that represents accurately what all West Virginia people would like to be themselves and what they demand and expect in a leader who represents them in the national and international councils of the United States Senate.

Well, as President, I face difficult and sometimes almost insoluble problems. And

I need Jennings Randolph in Washington to help me to serve our people, those who live here and those who live around the country. This is not going to be an easy election year. It will not be an easy campaign for Jennings Randolph. And I know that you've sacrificed coming here, contributing to his campaign financially. And I would hate for any one of you to go away thinking that you've done all that he or I expect from you.

When you get back home, think about the prospects for victory in your family, in your block, in your rural neighborhood, in your town, and say, "What can I do, myself, to organize an effective campaign with me as the campaign manager?" Don't wait for anyone from Jennings' organization to call you. Just start on your own. Ask the people in your church, in your Lions Club, who work with you in a factory, who mine coal with you, who have respect for you, who may not be very interested in politics, to join in helping to help West Virginia and to help the United States by keeping there in the Senate a great leader who has genuinely earned the admiration and appreciation of our country—my good, personal friend, Jennings Randolph, your Senator now and years to come.

NOTE: The President spoke at 2:15 p.m. in the West Virginia Room at the Charleston Civic Center.

Remarks Announcing the Establishment of the President's Commission on the Coal Industry. May 26, 1978

My good friend Senator Jennings Randolph, Governor and Mrs. Jay Rockefeller, Congressman Slack, Mayor and Mrs. Hutchinson, Ed Wiles, Governor

Bob Scott, and President Arnold Miller, other friends of mine who are interested in the present circumstances and the future of West Virginia:

I started my day in Du Page County, a suburb of Chicago, and I flew down to Springfield to have several meetings, one of which was to address the legislature of the State of Illinois. I talked to them about the proper relationship between government and people and where the strengths lie and the need for trust and an appreciation of the challenges of public service in a rapidly changing, modern technological world.

I'm deeply concerned about your State and deeply hopeful that this meeting today will lead to that bright future in the distance which Jennings Randolph has so eloquently described.

It's great to be here and to see just where Superblock<sup>1</sup> is going to be. It's my second visit. I wish I'd been here last night to hear Willie Nelson play. He's one of my favorite musicians. We've invited him to come and play at the White House in September, when we're having the stock car race drivers as our guests. They will be personal guests of mine and Rosalynn. The taxpayers won't pay for that, of course. [Laughter]

I think it's important for someone in my position, as is greatly illustrated by these great men behind me, to stay in close touch with the thinking and the hopes and dreams and fears and concerns of American people who have to work for a living and who share with us the prospect for the future of our country.

I'm glad that the Economic Development Administration was able to announce a $5 million grant this week for this convention center complex, which I understand will include a 12,500 seat multipurpose arena, a parking area, and a new lobby connected to this building. I wonder if anybody in the room can guess who started the Economic Development Administration? That's right, Jennings Randolph.

We rode in on an interstate highway. I wonder if anybody can guess who had the original idea for the Interstate Highway System? Jennings Randolph.

And this is the kind of leadership I think that will be pushed forward today. Superblock is a fine example of a proper working partnership between the Federal, State, and local levels of government and the private sector in our great free enterprise system. And I think it's a good example of what can be done to revitalize the urban areas of our Nation. Senator Randolph, Congressman John Slack have worked hard to make this joint development possible. And they, along with local officials and State officials, are providing stimulus for Charleston's economy.

When I spoke to the Nation a year and 1 month ago, I called energy the most serious, continuing challenge that will face our Nation in our lifetimes. I will leave here and go back to Washington, and without delay when I get there, I'll be meeting tonight with the President of France, Gisard d'Estaing. I'll be getting a report from my National Security Adviser, Zbigniew Brzezinski, who's just returned from several days consultation with the leaders of the People's Republic of China. Tomorrow morning, if our present plans go through, I'll be meeting with the Foreign Minister of the Soviet Union, Andre Gromyko, to talk about some means by which our two great nations, who are in competition, can live in peace and so that we might, through a SALT agreement, eliminate the threat of nuclear destruction that faces us all if we are not successful.

So, there is no incompatibility between speaking in Springfield about government leadership, meeting here with you about our energy problem, discussing with one of our major allies the strength of NATO, and trying to discuss the future peace in the entire world. These kinds of subjects all have equal importance to those of us charged with shaping the future of the United States.

Energy is inexorably linked to our own prosperity at home and also to our security as a nation in the entire world, both of which are imperiled by our great and growing thirst for foreign oil.

Last year, out of the pockets of American working people, there was taken $45 billion which was spent to purchase oil from foreign countries. We now import about half of all the oil we use. Last April, to dramatize the seriousness of this challenge, I compared it to war, and in this war, the most formidable defense weapon in our arsenal is coal.

West Virginia alone could supply all the energy needs of our entire country for more than a generation. And Appalachian coal fired the furnaces that made this Nation a great industrial power. It fueled the engines that first connected from sea to sea the people who live in the great land area of the United States.

It provides still much of our industrial and electrical power, as you well know. And ultimately, we will learn to harness the energy of the Sun and the oceans with fusion power to meet our energy needs. But for now, we have no choice but to continue to rely heavily on fossil fuels, and coal is our most abundant fossil fuel. Appalachian coal will be crucial for the remainder of this century and beyond.

In 1975, nearly 400 million tons of coal were produced in the Appalachian hills and mountains—nearly two-thirds of the Nation's total production. And of that amount, northern Appalachia, including West Virginia, produced almost 180 million tons. That production must increase as more and more of our energy-using equipment is modified from petroleum consumption to the use of coal.

West Virginia coal is high quality. Your metallurgical coal is the finest in the world. I know you are experiencing cut-backs at the present moment because of slow steel imports and markets. And I want you to know that Bob Strauss is trying to build up American production of steel. He's our Special Trade Representative, an Ambassador, and he's working on this problem right now.

As we convert to coal, we must assure that the supply is sure and steady, because those who use it must be able to depend upon it. We must solve the underlying problems that have troubled the coal industry for generations.

To that end, I'm announcing today in this meeting the creation of the President's Commission on the Coal Industry.

Your own Governor, Jay Rockefeller, has agreed to be the Chairman of this five-man Commission. He's a man who has intense interest in coal production, and he has the confidence both of the miners and the operators, and I believe that he will do a great job with the other members representing the public, who will be former Secretary of Labor Willard Wirtz, whose experience in labor-management problems goes back to his membership on the War Labor Board during World War II, and Dewey Presley, a distinguished business leader from Texas. I also will appoint a member to represent labor, who has not yet been chosen, and one to represent the coal operators—five people.

In addition to these five members who will vote, nonvoting members will include the Secretary of Labor and Secretary of Energy, and three each from the House and the Senate.

The Commission will produce for the first time a comprehensive review of the coal industry in the United States. Its work will focus on five general areas:

First, the general economic health of the coal industry, including productivity and capital investment now and in the future.

Second, labor-management relations in the coal fields, including collective bargaining, grievance procedures, and such other aspects as the Commission deems appropriate. Most often, when labor and management sit down together, it's in a time of tension or dispute as the details of future contracts are negotiated. But we want this Commission to be able to provide a forum of exchange of ideas, hopefully in a friendly way, but certainly a frank way on how the industry can be strengthened and how the well-being of miners and producers both can be improved and let our Nation benefit in the process.

The third major element of this analysis will be the health, safety, and living conditions in the coal fields and the coal-producing areas of our country.

And fourth, the development and application of new technologies using coal.

And fifth, the impact on the coal industry of Federal regulations.

That's a major assignment, as you can see. The Executive order setting up the Commission, which I signed between here and Springfield, Illinois, calls for a final report to be made to me and the public not later than 1 year after the first meeting.

The order also authorizes the Commission to sponsor a White House Conference on the future of the coal industry, bringing in representatives—before the final report is made—of all viewpoints to help find solutions to existing and potential problems.

The five members, of course, who vote will have available to them advice and counsel from many people throughout the country. But before we have a final report to go to the Nation, to the Congress and to me and future Presidents, I want to make sure at the White House that we have a large group of people come together to say, this is what we can do to strengthen the coal industry in the years ahead.

I come from flat country, as you might imagine from the name of my hometown, which is Plains. Our people in south Georgia have a lot in common with the people of West Virginia. But the land is about as different as it could possibly be. I've heard it said that if you ironed out West Virginia, it would be the biggest State in the Nation. I'm not sure about that, but I do know that around Plains our livelihood has depended upon the top 4 or 5 inches of land. The topsoil either made us or broke us.

Here in West Virginia it's long been known that what was under your land was the key to your prosperity and sometimes the cause of your problems. We abused the land in the Deep South for a long time, overworking it, not putting back into it what we took out; we let it wash away and blow away.

For a long time the hills of West Virginia were abused also. Your creeks and your rivers were polluted, your land was scarred and left raw, and too many of those who dug the wealth from under the ground were left poor and sick after their labors were completed.

In recent years we've learned how to stop this devastation, learned how to restore the hills as we have extracted their wealth, learned how to make life safer and more prosperous for those who bring it out of the earth.

The land and the people of Appalachia have sacrificed much to make your great past contributions to our national development. And I'm determined that in the future this land and its people will share in the benefits of meeting our Nation's needs.

When I announced the national energy plan, I promised that increasing production of West Virginia coal would not come at the expense of the environment, the health, or the safety of the people of West Virginia.

With the help of Jennings Randolph and Senator Gary Hart from Colorado, we are developing proposals for a 5-year program of impact assistance to help offset some of the social and economic costs of increasing coal production.

Nationwide this program would provide $675 million in grants and will put up to $75 million to guarantee $1½ billion in loans.

Governor Rockefeller, Senator Randolph, Senator Byrd, Congressman Staggers, and others have been of immeasurable assistance in developing this program. West Virginia has indeed been fortunate to have leaders like these—John Slack and others—represent your interest.

In mountainous country like yours there are extra costs and extra difficulties in building houses, in building roads, waterlines, sewers. These problems are not new, but they make coping with a rapid influx of people—when you develop a new coal field, for instance—even harder and more expensive than growth would be in a flat country.

In meeting your special needs, local and State governments must do their share. But this time the Federal Government will help.

I'm also committed to fair and firm enforcement of a new Federal strip mine law. West Virginia is already doing an excellent job in reviewing mined areas.

We must meet our clean air requirements so that greater use of coal doesn't endanger public health or environmental quality. And we need to meet these goals without giving undue advantage to the coal from one region over the coal from another.

To aid in this process, we must work to ensure that we develop technologies not just to burn coal as it is when it comes from the ground but also to convert that coal to synthetic liquids, gases, and solids that will meet future needs for clean-burning fuels.

West Virginia has been a leader in technological development in this area and will continue to lead as we move toward private sector commercialization of synthetics derived from coal.

Just recently, I intensified our own efforts to bring these technologies on stream through a series of design studies which may lead to construction of a joint government-industry coal liquids demonstration plant here in West Virginia.

The Federal Government should not shoulder the entire burden of developing these technologies. However, working together, we can create the right climate through joint ventures, loan guarantees, proper tariff treatment to help speed private sector development in partnership with the government.

The Nation will need synthetics from coal to meet our future energy needs, and West Virginia will play an important part in supplying both the coal and the technology to make this hope and expectation a reality.

The Congress passed, as Governor Rockefeller mentioned, and I have signed into law new black lung legislation, broadening the benefits and putting them on a sound financial footing. We also transferred the Mine Health and Safety Administration from the Interior Department to the Labor Department.

Despite all the progress, though, coal mining is still one of the dirtiest and most dangerous jobs on Earth. Operating a mine has often been financially precarious, subject to fast-changing demand and an unforeseeable or unpredictable future.

All of this has left scars that are slow to heal on West Virginia's lovely countryside and also on its people. But the healing process has begun. And I'm determined that the rising demand for coal to meet our Nation's energy needs will not leave scars on your land or on the proud and independent people of West Virginia.

Thank you very much. We are partners together.

NOTE: The President spoke at 2:45 p.m. in the Little Theater at the Charleston Civic Center. In his remarks he referred to Ed Wiles, executive director of the West Virginia Coal Association, Robert Scott, Chairman of the Appalachian Regional Commission, and Arnold Miller, president of the United Mine Workers.

President's Commission on the Coal Industry

Executive Order 12062. May 26, 1978

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution of the United States of America, and in order to establish, pursuant to the provisions of the Federal Advisory Committee Act (5 U.S.C. App. I), a balanced forum to review the state of the Nation's coal industry, it is hereby ordered as follows:

1-1. Establishment and Membership.

1-101. There is hereby established the President's Commission on the Coal Industry.

1-102. The membership of the Commission shall be as follows:

(a) Five members shall be appointed by the President. One shall represent the interests of labor, one shall represent management and three shall represent the general public. The labor and management representatives shall be chosen from among candidates recommended by the United Mine Workers of America and the Bituminous Coal Operators Association of America, but shall not be members of these organizations. The President shall designate one of the members representing the general public to chair the Commission.

(b) The President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives may designate three members of their respective Houses to serve as non-voting members of the Commission.

(c) The Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of Energy or their designees shall also serve as non-voting members of the Commission.

1-2. Functions.

1-201. The Commission shall conduct a comprehensive review of the state of the coal industry in the United States with particular emphasis on matters pertaining to productivity, capital investment, and the general economic health of the industry; collective bargaining, grievance procedures, and such other aspects of labor-management relations as the Commission deems appropriate; health, safety and living conditions in the Nation's coal fields; the development and application of new technologies to the industry; the impact on the coal industry of Federal regulations; and such other matters as the Commission deems appropriate.

1-202. The five members appointed by the President shall prepare and transmit a final report of their findings and recommendations to the President, the Secretary of Labor and the Secretary of Energy.

1-203. To assist the Commission in the exercise of its functions, the Commission may sponsor a White House Conference on the future of the coal industry.

1-3. Administration.

1-301. To the extent authorized by law, the General Services Administration shall provide the Commission with all necessary administrative services, facilities and support on a reimbursable basis.

1-302. The Department of Labor and the Department of Energy shall, to the extent permitted by law and subject to the availability of funds, provide the Commission with such information, advice, services and funds as may be necessary for the effective performance of its functions.

1-303. Each member of the Commission who is not otherwise employed in the Government may receive compensation at the rate now or hereafter prescribed by law for GS-15 of the General Schedule for each day such member is engaged in the work of the Commission. Each member may also receive travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence (5 U.S.C. 5702 and 5703).

1-304. The functions of the President under the Federal Advisory Committee Act (5 U.S.C. App. I) which are applicable to the Commission, except that of reporting annually to the Congress, shall be performed by the Administrator of General Services.

1-4. Final Report and Termination.

1-401. The final report required by Section 1-202 of this Order shall be transmitted not later than one year from the date of the first meeting of the Commission.

1-402. The Commission shall terminate thirty days after submission of its final report.

United States Ambassador to Denmark

Nomination of Warren D. Manshel.
May 26, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Warren D. Manshel, of New York City, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to Denmark. He would replace John G. Dean, resigned.

Manshel was born January 6, 1924, in Berlin, Germany, and became a U.S. citizen in 1944. He received a B.A. and M.A. (1949) and Ph. D. (1952) from Harvard University. He served in the U.S. Army from 1943 to 1946.

Manshel was a teaching fellow at Harvard from 1948 to 1952 and an analyst for the Central Intelligence Agency from 1952 to 1954. In 1954 and 1955, he was deputy director of the Congress for Cultural Freedom in Paris.

From 1955 to 1977, Manshel was with Coleman and Co., a member of the New York Stock Exchange, serving as associate, then partner, then consultant. Since 1965 he has been publisher of the Public Interest magazine, and since 1970 he has been editor and publisher of Foreign Policy magazine.

Meeting With President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing of France

White House Statement. May 26, 1978

President Carter hosted a dinner this evening for President Giscard d'Estaing, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and high officials accompanying him. This was the French President's first visit to the White House in the Carter administration. The two Presidents last met in Paris in January.

During this informal dinner, President Giscard d'Estaing outlined the proposals he made this week at the U.N. Special Session on Disarmament. The two Presidents also discussed a wide range of international issues affecting their two countries, including East-West relations, the forthcoming seven-nation summit in Bonn this July, and the Middle East. They expressed their common concern about recent developments in Africa and agreed that concerted action with the African countries is necessary to promote security and development in that continent.

Both Presidents welcomed this chance to renew their friendship. The talks were conducted in an atmosphere of personal warmth and mutual understanding. They also reaffirmed the close ties between France and the United States, which this year are celebrating the 200th anniversary of their alliance.

Hubert H. Humphrey Fellowship in Social and Political Thought

Statement on Signing H.R. 10392 Into Law. May 30, 1978

I am pleased to sign into law a bill which, in a unique way, will keep alive the courageous vision of Hubert Humphrey, not only in our Nation's Capital but throughout the world.

It is fitting that the University of Minnesota should have already taken the lead in establishing the Hubert H. Humphrey School of Public Affairs, an institution that will benefit and inspire younger Americans for many generations to come with Senator Humphrey's vision of compassionate government for this Republic.

This bill has a different purpose. It creates a living memorial right here in Washington. Instead of erecting yet another granite or marble edifice, the Congress has seen fit to establish a fellowship which will be awarded each year to a different person—from this Nation or from abroad—who best symbolizes the Humphrey vision, who will be honored not only for achievement in social and political thought but who will, through dedication to the process of free inquiry, contribute in Washington to our national debate on the issues confronting us.

It is right that the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars should be the home for the Humphrey fellowship and lectures, since Hubert Humphrey was the founding Chairman of its Board of Trustees.

It gives me great pleasure to establish the Hubert H. Humphrey Fellowship at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars. I am convinced the Humphrey fellows and lecturers will pass on the legacy of Hubert Humphrey to future times.

NOTE: As enacted, H.R. 10392 is Public Law 95-286, approved May 26.

North Atlantic Alliance Summit

*Remarks at the Opening Ceremonies.
May 30, 1978*

Mr. President, Mr. Secretary General, Excellencies, members of the Council, and distinguished guests:

On behalf of the people of the United States, I welcome here today our closest friends and allies, the leaders of the North Atlantic Alliance.

Twenty-nine years ago, at an uncertain time for world peace, President Truman spoke these words on signing the North Atlantic Treaty, and I quote from him: "In this pact, we hope to create a shield against aggression . . . a bulwark which will permit us to get on with the real business of government and society, the business of achieving a fuller and a happier life for all our citizens."

The alliance born that day in April 1949 has helped preserve our mutual security for nearly 30 years, almost a decade longer than the time between the two great wars of this century. History records no other alliance that has successfully brought together so many different nations for so long without the firing of a single shot in anger.

Ours is a defensive alliance. No nation need fear aggression from us, but neither should any nation ever doubt our will to deter and to defeat aggression against us. The North Atlantic Alliance is a union of peoples moved by a desire to secure a safe future for our children in liberty and freedom. Our Alliance is unique, because each of us 15 democratic nations shares a common heritage of human values, the rule of law, and faith in the courage and spirit of free men and women.

The military strength and the common political purpose of the North Atlantic Alliance has led us to cooperate in a thousand individual efforts, rightly conferring upon us the name of "community." And it has given us the self-confidence and strength of will to seek improved relations with our potential adversaries.

As an American I am proud that the commitment of the United States to the security, independence, and prosperity of Europe is as strong as ever. We are part of you, and you are part of us. The mutual pledges of trust we exchanged here in 1949 still hold firm and true.

During the next 2 days we will reaffirm our commitment to the Alliance, to its strategy and doctrine, and to each other. We will review a year-long effort to assess East-West relations as they exist now and as they may develop in the future. We will review our cooperation in defense procurement. And through a broad program of defense cooperation, we will seek to reinforce our individual efforts to guarantee our security against aggression for many years ahead.

We must be aware of the new challenges that we face individually and collectively, which require new efforts of us all.

The Soviet Union and other Warsaw Pact countries pose a military threat to our Alliance which far exceeds their legitimate security needs. For more than a decade the military power of the Soviet Union has steadily expanded, and it has grown consistently more sophisticated. In significant areas the military lead we once enjoyed has been reduced.

Today we can meet that military challenge, but we cannot be sure of countering the future military threat unless our Alliance modernizes its forces and adds additional military power. In this effort the United States will play its part across the spectrum of conventional, theater nuclear, and strategic nuclear forces. I'm gratified that America's allies are joining with us in building up their military might.

In the past year the United States has increased substantially its conventional combat strength in Europe and is enhancing its capability for rapid deployment of additional forces to that continent. United States theater nuclear forces are being modernized, and the United States will maintain strategic nuclear equivalence with the Soviet Union.

Our Alliance centers on Europe, but our vigilance cannot be limited just to that continent. In recent years expanding Soviet power has increasingly penetrated beyond the North Atlantic area.

As I speak today, the activities of the Soviet Union and Cuba in Africa are preventing individual nations from determining their own future. As members of the world's greatest alliance, we cannot be indifferent to these events because of what they mean for Africa and because of their effect on the long-term interests of the Alliance itself.

I welcome the efforts of individual NATO Allies to work for peace in Africa and to support nations and people in need, most recently in Zaire.

Our Alliance has never been an end in itself. It is a way to promote stability and peace in Europe and, indeed, peace in the world at large.

Our strength has made possible the pursuit of détente and agreements to limit arms, while increasing the security of the Alliance. Defense in Europe, East-West détente, and global diplomacy all go hand in hand. Never before has a defensive alliance devoted so much effort to negotiate limitations and reductions in armaments with its potential adversaries. Our record has no equal in the search for effective arms control agreements.

The United States continues to move forward in its negotiations with the Soviet Union on a new agreement to limit and reduce strategic nuclear weapons. Our objective is to preserve and advance the security of all the members of our Alliance. We will continue to consult and to work closely with our allies to ensure that arms control efforts serve our common needs.

NATO Allies are also working for the mutual and balanced reduction of forces in Europe to provide greater security for all European peoples at lower levels of armaments, lower tensions, and at lower costs. The Allies have recently made a new proposal to the Warsaw Pact, and we call upon those nations to respond in the positive spirit in which our offer was made.

Our efforts to reduce weapons and forces in both these negotiations are guided by the need for equivalence and balance in the military capabilities of the East and West. That is the only enduring basis for promoting security and peace.

The challenges we face as allies do not end here. Economic changes within our countries and throughout the world have increased our dependence upon one another and complicated our efforts to promote economic and social welfare for our people.

Social changes generated partly by economic and political progress will require creative thought and effort by each of our nations. Our Alliance derives additional strength through our shared goals and experiences.

Finally, we face the challenge of promoting the human values and human rights that are the final purpose and meaning of our Alliance. The task is not easy—the way to liberty has never been—but our nations preeminently comprise the region of the world where freedom finds its most hospitable environment.

As we seek to build détente, therefore, we must continue to seek full implementation by Warsaw Pact countries as well as our own of the Helsinki accords on security and cooperation in Europe that was signed 3 years ago.

If we continue to build on the fundamental strength of the North Atlantic Alliance, I am confident that we can meet any challenge in the years ahead. In the future, as in the past, the Government and people of the United States will remain steadfast to our commitment to peace and freedom that all of us as allies share together.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:35 a.m. in the Concert Hall at the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts. In his opening remarks, he referred to Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit of Turkey and NATO Secretary General Joseph M. A. H. Luns.

Later in the day, the President attended the opening and afternoon sessions of the summit meeting at the State Department and hosted a luncheon at the White House for heads of delegation.

North Atlantic Alliance Summit

Statement on Signing a Congressional Joint Resolution Reaffirming the Unity of the Alliance Commitment. May 30, 1978

This NATO Summit meeting is, as the resolution states, the "capstone of efforts to ensure that the needs of collective security will be met over the next decade." For almost 30 years, NATO has "preserved the peace . . . allowing its members to attain unprecedented levels of prosperity and well-being for their people."

We look forward to meeting the challenges of the future, confident of our Alliance and sure of our people's support for it. This resolution reaffirms that NATO will continue to enjoy the broad, bipartisan backing from Congress that it has always had. This administration will join with the Congress—in the words of the resolution—"to reaffirm the unity of the North Atlantic Alliance, to strengthen its defensive capabilities to meet threats to the peace, and on this basis to persevere in attempts to lessen tensions with the Warsaw Pact States."

NOTE: The President signed the joint resolution in a ceremony in the Thomas Jefferson Room at the State Department prior to the taking of the formal portrait of the NATO chiefs of delegation.

As enacted, S.J. Res. 137 is Public Law 95-287, approved May 30.

Flag Day and National Flag Week, 1978

Proclamation 4573. May 30, 1978

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

The American flag has grown and changed with the Nation. But for two hundred years, the United States remained unchanged in its commitment to the ideals which gave birth to that flag.

To commemorate the anniversary of the adoption on June 14, 1777 by the Continental Congress of the Stars and Stripes as the official flag of the United States of America, the Congress has requested the President to issue a proclamation calling for the observance of the fourteenth day of June of each year as Flag Day and the week in which that day occurs as National Flag Week (36 U.S.C. 157 and 157a).

To encourage the American people to reflect upon their Nation, its heritage, and its course in the years ahead, the Congress, by joint resolution of June 13, 1975, has set aside the twenty-one days from Flag Day through Independence Day as a period to honor America (36 U.S.C. 157b).

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby call upon the American people to observe June 14, 1978 as Flag Day and the week beginning June 11, 1978 as National Flag Week. I direct the appropriate officials of the Government to display the flag on all Government buildings during that week and ask the American people to display our flag at their homes and other suitable places for the same period.

I also ask each American to observe the period from Flag Day through Independence Day as a period to honor America. To that end, I ask all Americans to participate in local activities that reflect an understanding and appreciation of America and its institutions.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this thirtieth day of May, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

JIMMY CARTER

Meeting With Chancellor Helmut Schmidt of the Federal Republic of Germany

White House Statement. May 30, 1978

President Carter and Chancellor Helmut Schmidt of the Federal Republic of Germany held a 1-hour working breakfast at the White House this morning to review major international issues. Chancellor Schmidt is in Washington as head of his country's delegation to the summit meeting of the North Atlantic Alliance.

The President and the Chancellor reaffirmed their firm commitment to strengthening the deterrent ability of the North Atlantic Alliance on the basis of which they will continue efforts to improve East-West cooperation. The Chancellor gave the President an outline of his talks with Soviet President Brezhnev. They reviewed East-West relations generally and agreed to continue close consultations in this area.

President Carter outlined progress made to date on the negotiation of a SALT II agreement, emphasizing that the security interests of our NATO Allies will be covered in any agreement reached. The President and the Chancellor expressed the hope that the new Western initiative in the MBFR negotiations tabled last April will help to move those talks forward.

President Carter and Chancellor Schmidt also reviewed planning for the Economic Summit which will take place in Bonn on July 16 and 17. They agreed that the major world economic leaders must seek a coordinated, consistent approach to the problems of higher energy costs, high unemployment, inflation, depressed investment and payments imbalances. They agreed to strive for closer short- and medium-term coordination of economic policy and focus in depth on the long-term structural problems facing the world economy.

The President and the Chancellor welcomed this opportunity to exchange ideas personally on important issues and will continue their efforts, together with other countries, to synchronize approaches to common problems. Both looked forward especially to the President's forthcoming state visit to the Federal Republic and Berlin in mid-July, prior to the Economic Summit.

North Atlantic Alliance Summit

*Toasts of the President and Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit at the Dinner Honoring the Heads of Delegation.
May 30, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. First of all, I'd like to say that we are delighted to have you here. This is our first dinner, or supper, in the Rose Garden, and it's worked out very well. This is kind of a test of NATO's influence with the weather. [Laughter]

I would like to say, too, before anyone gets the wrong impression about our military commitment and our strength, although these representatives of our military bands can play the violin very beautifully, they also know how to fight. So we are good, staunch allies there.

I've enjoyed very much being with our President this evening, Prime Minister Ecevit. I've learned a lot about politics from him. We have several very distinguished Members of the Congress here, and I called one over to meet him tonight, Senator Bob Morgan from North Carolina. And when he came over, Prime Minister Ecevit told him that he used to live in North Carolina and worked for the Winston-Salem newspaper, and he said, "I've even got Tar Heel cufflinks on." So he's taught me a great deal.

This is a wonderful occasion for us. Very seldom in the history of our Nation and very seldom in the history of the White House, which has been here since 1801—except for a brief interlude when some of Jim Callaghan's <sup>1</sup> people got here in 1812—[laughter]—have we had such a delightful and distinguished group of guests.

As a matter of fact, you're not exactly guests, because you're partners of ours in one of the finest and most noble endeavors in the history of the United States of America. We are proud of our relationship. Yesterday was Memorial Day, and throughout our country we paused to recognize the tremendous contribution in past years of men and women who have given their lives and offered their lives in the defense of our Nation, what it stands for, our principles, our ideals. And it's a great reminder of what NATO has meant to us, too.

We know what can be the price of preserving precious ideals. We know the value of a partnership formed in a time of danger, a time of war. We know the value of strong and able and deeply committed allies. And this is what NATO means to us.

For 30 years now, almost 30 years, the strength of NATO has permitted democracy and freedom to flourish. And it's with a great gratitude and a sense of common commitment and common purpose that we've gathered here for these 2 days of deliberations.

This Alliance has guaranteed our own security here in the United States, and it's been of great value to us. It's one of the things that we cherish most highly. For us, therefore, it has been a matter of necessity to be a partner with you in the North American (Atlantic)<sup>2</sup> Alliance, and it's also been a fulfillment of what to us has been in the past, and still is, a moral obligation.

We learned, during two great wars in this century, some profound and unforgettable lessons: that through strength can come peace, and that in awareness of a common resolution among free men and women there can be a conviction of potential adversaries that is better for mutual respect and the preservation of peace.

We want a strong defense. We've assured that. We want a general commitment to peace and mutual disarmament. And both those elements of our desires can be guaranteed only through the accurate image of a capable and deep commitment to mutual strength.

I think the United States is particularly well qualified to be the host of NATO, the members of the North American (Atlantic) Alliance. We are not only your friends but we're your kinfolks, we're your relatives. Throughout our country there are tens of millions of people who look upon your countries as their second homeland. And it would be impressive to you if you could have shared the 2 years of campaign experience that I enjoyed around this Nation—or rather that I experienced around this Nation—[laughter]*—*to witness the deep sense of pride and a desire to protect the heritage that Americans share with their relatives in your own home countries. So, that, I think, qualifies us to be the host for this notable occasion.

In a few minutes we'll leave here and go down on the front lawn to witness again one of the great ballet performances available throughout the world. And the heritage of common beliefs, common ideals, and also common culture and enjoyment, is what we enjoy from the older countries in the European area. We feel that we share a common commitment to democracy, we share a common commitment to liberty, we share a common commitment to the rule of law. So, I would like to propose a toast on behalf of the people of the United States of America to the people whom you represent as our allies in Canada and in the European area, to the North American (Atlantic) Alliance, the guardian of safety, the servant of freedom, and the instrument of peace.

THE PRIME MINISTER. Allow me, Mr. President, to say a few words as Honorary President.

I wish to thank you in the name of all my colleagues and my wife. I wish to thank you, Mr. President and Mrs. Carter, for being such nice hosts to us this evening in this family atmosphere which made us feel really in the heart of America. We have had a very interesting session, or rather, sessions today in the NATO Council meeting in the true spirit of democracy, where everything, every idea was expressed and criticized freely in the search for a better way of life.

The North Atlantic Treaty community consists of nations who are all attached to the ideal of democracy, who all have great respect for human freedom and for human rights. There may be problems within the Alliance; in fact, there are problems within the Alliance that we have spoken about today. There may even at times be differences between some members of the Alliance, as in fact there are to some extent today. But I think there is a bond that will survive all such differences in NATO, and that is the attachment of our peoples to democracy and to freedom.

We are living in a rapidly changing time. And for institutions to survive such change, they must also learn to change themselves. They must not only be able to adapt to change but be agents of change themselves. And democratic communities can do that particularly easily, because one important characteristic of democracy, in my mind, beyond its capacity for freedom, free thought, and free expression, is the propensity for self-criticism, for self-questioning.

It is through self-questioning and through constantly questioning one's ideas, one's concepts, that mankind may make progress and has made progress, particularly in the way of science, and through such democratic self-criticism and self-questioning, that I'm sure we can find the best solutions to the North Atlantic Alliance as well.

NATO is a military organization. However, we are living in an age when battles are being given in nonmilitary areas as well, and through nonmilitary means as well. In our age, battles are mostly given for the minds of people, not with weapons, usually, but with ideas and ideologies. And I think the democratic countries are best equipped to such battles if they can use their merits well and in a conscious way, because democratic countries believe in the dignity of man and are based on respect and on belief for the creativity of man.

For this reason, that is, because of my conviction in the superiority of democracy and freedom, I also believe that NATO will survive all its problems and even in this rapidly changing world will still perform its functions.

I wish to thank you again, Mr. President, for being host to our meeting in Washington. And allow me to thank, also, the experienced and distinguished Secretary General, Mr. Luns, who has helped to make this meeting, our sessions today, very lively, by forcing us to enter into a democratic debate in many sensitive subjects. And I think they have been very useful debates.

I would like to ask your permission to wish you and Mrs. Carter and all your children and family every happiness. And I wish all my colleagues here, all our American friends, and all the peoples of the member countries of NATO, every happiness and success.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:47 p.m. in the Rose Garden at the White House.

Meeting With Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit of Turkey

White House Statement. May 31, 1978

President Carter and Turkish Prime Minister Ecevit had a useful and productive 1-hour meeting this morning which included a full discussion of key international and bilateral issues. The Turkish Prime Minister is in the United States heading his country's delegation to the NATO Summit, where he has also served as this year's Honorary President.

The President and Prime Minister noted the important place Turkey occupies in the NATO Alliance and stressed the Alliance's important contribution to the preservation of stability, peace, democracy, and human values. They also reviewed the urgent need for strengthening NATO's southern flank and for rebuilding United States-Turkish relations. President Carter assured Prime Minister Ecevit that he was determined to obtain congressional approval for the repealing of the remaining arms restrictions on Turkey. Prime Minister Ecevit in turn stressed the importance of the elimination of those restrictions for the revitalization of the United States-Turkish relations as well as for the common security interests of the Atlantic community.

President Carter and Prime Minister Ecevit reiterated that an early and equitable solution of the Cyprus problem was desirable in the interests of all parties concerned as well as for peace and stability in the region. Both expressed the hope that the discussions now taking place between the United Nations Secretary General and the representatives of the Cypriot communities would lead to early resumption of the intercommunal talks.

The Prime Minister reviewed the actions his government has taken over the past several months in the economic field which has opened up prospects for the amelioration of external payments. Stressing the importance he attached to closer economic cooperation with the United States, he also emphasized the necessity of a sound and healthy economy, both for the maintenance of an efficient defense structure and the strengthening of democratic institutions. The President has shown full understanding in this respect.

Also present for the meeting were Gündüz Ökçün, Foreign Minister; Hasan Esat Işık, Defense Minister; Ambassador Sükrü Elekdağ, Secretary General of the Foreign Ministry; Melih Esenbel, Turkish Ambassador to the United States; Secretary of State Vance; and Dr. Brzezinski, Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs. Matthew Nimetz, Counselor of the State Department; George Vest, Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs; and Paul Henze, NSC staff member, also took part in the meeting.

Meeting With Prime Minister Giulio Andreotti of Italy

White House Statement. May 31, 1978

President Carter met this morning in the White House with Giulio Andreotti, President of the Council of Ministers of the Italian Republic. The two leaders had a useful discussion of certain world issues, Alliance questions, and recent developments in both countries. Also present were Foreign Minister Arnaldo Forlani, Italian Ambassador Paolo Pansa, Minister Umberto La Rocco, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, Zbigniew Brzezinski, Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, and Gregory Trevorton of the NSC staff.

The President and the Prime Minister reviewed the joint initiatives to enhance the relationship between Italy and the United States decided upon during the Prime Minister's visit to Washington in July 1977. A series of Cabinet-level visits has taken place in both directions over the last 10 months. New agreements have been reached in the areas of health, social security, exchange of language-teaching experts, scientific cooperation, and others. The two leaders expressed their satisfaction with progress achieved so far and indicated that programs to further strengthen bilateral relations will continue, in particular a renewed emphasis on the Bilateral Energy Working Group. Special attention was also given to the common problem of unemployment.

Prime Minister Andreotti described several recent encouraging developments in his government's efforts to bring to justice the murderers of Aldo Moro. The President expressed our sympathetic interest in the Italian antiterrorist efforts. President Carter pointed to the resilience with which Italian democratic institutions withstood the terrorist attack and to other encouraging recent events. He reaffirmed the confidence of the United States in Italy's ability to overcome present difficulties and continue to play its active role in the Western Alliance.

The two leaders will see each other at the summit meeting in Bonn in July.

North Atlantic Alliance Summit

*Text of Remarks on NATO Defense Policy.
May 31, 1978*

Thank you, Mr. Secretary General.

These briefings illustrate the magnitude of the challenges we face. They do not justify alarm, but they should strengthen our resolve.

When I took office 16 months ago, I reviewed the condition of U.S. defenses. I found them strong, although needing improvement. In particular, I concluded that the United States should give top priority to Europe, especially the conventional defenses needed in the initial stages of a conflict.

I reached this conclusion for two reasons. First, the Warsaw Pact countries, especially the Soviet Union, have steadily expanded and modernized their conventional forces beyond any legitimate requirement for defense. They are now able to attack with large armored forces more rapidly than we previously believed. Second, although U.S. nuclear forces remain strong and are fundamental to deterrence, the long-recognized role of conventional forces in deterrence of war is increasingly important.

As a result, I directed the Secretary of Defense to strengthen initial conventional defense capacity in Europe. Of course, such efforts would amount to little unless accompanied by improvements in the conventional capacity of our NATO Allies. European NATO countries, not the United States, provide the bulk of our military forces in Europe. Also, the competing demands of our free societies limit the portion of our resources we can use for defense. Therefore, we must coordinate our defense planning to make the best use of these limited resources.

From our discussions in London last year, I know that you share my view of the challenges we face. The answers we have developed together are impressive. We are all making significant, real increases in our defense budgets. We are strengthening our national forces—and we will do more. Finally, we have designed a bold Long-Term Defense Program to pull together a more effective collective defense during the years ahead.

As we improve our conventional defenses, we must remember that the strength of our strategic and theater nuclear forces is also necessary for deterrence and defense. These forces are—and will be—fully adequate. Arms control can make deterrence more stable and perhaps less burdensome—but it will not, in the foreseeable future, eliminate the need for nuclear forces.

For years, the Alliance has relied principally on American strategic forces for deterring nuclear attack on Europe. This coupling of American strategic forces to Europe is critical, for it means that an attack on Europe would have the full consequences of an attack on the United States. Let there be no misunderstanding. The United States is prepared to use all the forces necessary for the defense of the NATO area.

As an alliance, we must continue to review our nuclear deterrence needs in light of developments in Soviet nuclear and conventional forces. As one result of the Long-Term Defense Program, the Nuclear Planning Group is examining in detail the modernizing of our theater nuclear forces, including the question of long-range nuclear systems. We need also to consider jointly the relation of long-range theater nuclear systems to arms control.

This will require considering the full scope of political and military issues, and being sure that we maintain the coupling of American strategic forces to the defense of Europe. As we examine this together, I assure you that the United States will protect the options before us as the SALT II negotiations move toward completion.

Let me now turn to conventional forces—the bulk of the Long-Term Defense Program. After all, our largest expenditures are for conventional, not nuclear, forces.

We must prepare to fight more effectively together as an alliance. We must markedly improve our ability to work together on the battlefield. We should overcome unnecessary duplication in our national programs, thus buying more security for the same money.

That is what the Long-Term Defense Program is all about. It is an unprecedented attempt by NATO to look across a longer span of years than ever before. It seeks a more cooperative course, as the only sensible way to improve our defenses without unnecessary increases in defense spending. It lays out specific measures of Alliance cooperation. It is the blueprint we need, and we must carry it out vigorously.

Of course, each of us depends on legislative approval for particular programs and projects within the Long-Term Defense Program. Because we lead democracies, we cannot bind our people by fiat. We can, however, pledge to do what is necessary to secure this approval and make this program work.

The United States is already responding to many Long-Term Defense Program recommendations, particularly in the field of reinforcement. And the recommendations will receive the highest priority in our own national defense programming. In short, we will do our part in adapting or modifying U.S. programs to support the NATO Long-Term Defense Program. I am confident that you will take similar action.

Finally, I want to mention the one remaining unresolved aspect of the Long-Term Defense Program. Although the program calls for new and unprecedented Alliance cooperation, no procedures have yet been devised for ensuring that it is carried out. We must avoid bold programs heartily endorsed—then largely ignored. The report before us directs the Secretary General to present for national review what changes are essential for vigorous followthrough.

Both the NATO Task Forces and we Americans have made several specific proposals to this end. For example, we favor explicitly recognizing NATO's new focus on logistics. One way is to create a new Assistant Secretary General for Logistics. We also favor clear assignment of responsibility for each program to one NATO body. Where appropriate, we would prefer a major NATO command. But I do not ask that you discuss our proposals today. Instead, I ask that all Alliance leaders here today to join me in calling for vigorous followthrough of the program.

In conclusion, let me state that we confront a unique opportunity to bring our national defense programs closer together. The result will be a more effective defense. The consequences will be greater security for our people. It is our responsibility not to let this opportunity pass.

NOTE: The President spoke at the morning session, which began at approximately 9:30 a.m. in the Loy Henderson Conference Room at the State Department.

Later in the day, the President attended a luncheon with the heads of delegation and the final session of the summit meeting, both held at the State Department.

Meeting With President António dos Santos Ramalho Eanes of Portugal

White House Statement. May 31, 1978

President Carter and the President of the Republic of Portugal, General Eanes, met this noon to discuss a wide range of political, economic, and security issues in which the two nations share an interest. Also present were Foreign Minister Sa Machado, Portuguese Ambassador The-mido, Dr. Brzezinski, George Vest, As-sistant Secretary of State for European Affairs, and Robert Hunter and Gregory Treverton of the National Security Coun-cil staff.

During the meeting the two Presidents reviewed developments in Africa, Euro-pean security, human rights, bilateral economic cooperation, and U.S. use of Lajes Air Base in the Azores.

President Eanes described Portugal's progress in consolidating its democracy and in promoting economic recovery since the two leaders last met a year ago in London. President Carter expressed his admiration for President Eanes' personal contribution to these accomplishments and assured him that Portugal can count on continued United States understand-ing and support.

With regard to Africa, both Presidents expressed their hope for greater progress toward social justice and majority rule, and President Carter praised the positive role that Portugal has played in its rela-tions with several African states. Presi-dent Eanes expressed strong support for President Carter's human rights policies and agreed on the need to continue stress-ing these basic values.

During their review of European secu-rity issues, President Eanes informed President Carter of progress made by Portugal in activating a NATO-committed Army brigade, and he expressed ap-preciation for the support the United States and other NATO Allies have given the brigade. Both Presidents looked to further cooperation within the Alliance.

President Eanes confirmed the desir-ability of an early renewal of U.S. rights to use the Lajes Air Base, and he reiterated Portugal's assurances that it will not call into question the continued use of the base by the United States.

United States Ambassador to Afghanistan

Nomination of Adolph Dubs. May 31, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Adolph Dubs, of Sumner, Md., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to Afghanistan. He would replace Theo-dore L. Eliot, Jr., who is being assigned to the State Department as Inspector Gen-eral of the Foreign Service.

Dubs was born August 4, 1920, in Chi-cago. He received a B.A. from Beloit Col-lege in 1942. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1942 to 1946.

Dubs joined the Foreign Service in 1949 and was posted in Frankfurt, Mon-rovia, and Ottawa. From 1957 to 1959, he took Russian language training and area studies at the State Department and at Harvard. From 1959 to 1961, he was an international relations officer at the State Department.

From 1961 to 1963, Dubs was political officer in Moscow, and in 1963-64, he at-tended the National War College. From 1964 to 1968, he was chief of political sec-tion, then counselor of political affairs, in Belgrade.

In 1968 and 1969, Dubs was Acting Director of Soviet Union Affairs at the State Department, and from 1969 to 1971, he was Country Director for Soviet Union Affairs. In 1971-72, he attended the Sen-ior Seminar in Foreign Policy.

From 1972 to 1974, Dubs was Deputy Chief of Mission in Moscow. In 1974-75, he was diplomat in residence at Southwestern at Memphis. Since 1975 he has been Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs.

United States Ambassador to Ethiopia

*Nomination of Frederic L. Chapin.
May 31, 1978*

The President announced today that he will nominate Frederic L. Chapin, of North Brunswick Township, N.J., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to Ethiopia. He would replace Arthur W. Hummel, Jr., who resigned to take another post at the State Department.

Chapin was born July 13, 1929, in New York City. He received an A.B. from Harvard University in 1950.

From 1950 to 1952, Chapin was an economic officer with the Economic Cooperation Administration and Mutual Security Agency in Paris. From 1952 to 1956, he was economic officer in Vienna, and from 1956 to 1959, he was an international relations officer at the State Department.

Chapin was political-labor officer in Managua from 1959 to 1961, and chargé d'affaires, then deputy chief of mission, in Fort Lamy in 1961 and 1962. In 1962 and 1963, he was a foreign affairs officer, then officer in charge of political affairs, at the State Department.

From 1963 to 1965, Chapin was special assistant to the Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs. From 1965 to 1968, he was on detail to AID as Deputy Executive Secretary. In 1968 he was a foreign service inspector, and in 1968 and 1969, he was Country Director for Chile-Bolivia. In 1969 and 1970, he was State Department coordinator of visits to Latin America by Gov. Nelson Rockefeller.

From 1970 to 1972, Chapin was Deputy Assistant Secretary for Management in the Bureau of Inter-American Affairs. Since 1972 he has been Consul General in São Paulo.

United States Ambassador to the Republic of Korea

*Nomination of William H. Gleysteen, Jr.
May 31, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate William H. Gleysteen, Jr., of Jenkintown, Pa., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Republic of Korea. He would replace Richard L. Sneider, resigned.

Gleysteen was born May 8, 1926, in Peking, China, of American parents. He received a B.A. (1949) and M.A. (1951) from Yale University. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1944 to 1946.

Gleysteen joined the Foreign Service in 1951 and was posted in Taipei, Tokyo, and Hong Kong, and at the State Department. From 1966 to 1969, he was Deputy Director of the Office of United Nations Political Affairs at the State Department, and from 1969 to 1971, he was Director of the Office of Research-Analysis for East Asian and Pacific Affairs.

From 1971 to 1974, Gleysteen was Deputy Chief of Mission in Taipei. From 1974 to 1976, he was Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, and in 1976 and 1977, he was detailed to the National Security Council. Since 1977 he has been Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for East Asian and Pacific Affairs.

Improving Government Regulations

Statement by the President. May 31, 1978

On March 23 I signed Executive Order 12044, creating a program to reform the regulatory process. We have now passed the first milestone in this effort.

Each executive agency that issues regulations has just published new procedures in the FEDERAL REGISTER, as well as lists of existing regulations proposed for “sunset” reviews.

These new procedures require that future regulations be written in plain English and be signed by the officials who issue them—and that they minimize the burden on the public.

Public comment on the new procedures and lists is due by late July, so that they can be revised in time to go into effect this fall.

I urge the public to give us its advice on whether the new procedures will do the job and whether we have selected the right targets for “sunset” review. We need public participation to make regulatory reform work.

NOTE: For a list indicating the dates of publication of agency proposals implementing Executive Order 12044, see page 24212 of the FEDERAL REGISTER of June 2, 1978.

North Atlantic Alliance Summit

Remarks Following the Conclusion of the Final Session. May 31, 1978

I would like to say as the leader of the host government that it's been a gratifying experience to us to have the meeting of the NATO Alliance countries here in Washington. We've spent 2 days in what the more experienced leaders have said is the most comprehensive and candid and productive discussion of any NATO conference to date.

The most vivid impression that I have is one of a well-acknowledged common purpose. The Alliance is obviously one of unity. It's one of complete dedication, and it is an alliance also that recognizes that 30 years of peace have been derived among 15 or so countries because we are mutually strong and mutually committed in a partnership based on common beliefs and ideals, common heritage, a common commitment to democracy, to freedom, and to the rule of law.

In addition to the maintenance of strength for common defense, we've also reconfirmed the fact that we want to have general peace with the Warsaw Pact countries, our potential adversaries, and that there is no incompatibility between the Special Session on Disarmament in New York, its purposes, and the purposes of the North Atlantic Alliance.

We believe that the most fruitful step toward general disarmament is an acknowledged strength among the NATO Allies. We considered three basic propositions. One was cooperation in the development and production of weapons, which can lead to a more balanced responsibility for this very important purpose, and also result in standardization of weapon components and systems, a much higher level of defense capability for a given expenditure of public funds.

Secondly, we completed the analysis of a year-long study of East-West relationships, political, economic, and military, which was an enlightening experience in its preparation, and I think it cemented a common understanding of the present and possible future interrelationships between the Warsaw Pact countries, their friends and other allies, and also the NATO community, friends and allies.

The most important subject, possibly, was to define and to commit ourselves to a Long-Term Defense Program. This, again, was proposed after a year-long study by our defense ministers and their subordinates. There was a unanimous endorsement of this commitment extending over the next 15 years and acknowledgment that incremental improvements in our defense capability was not needed as the result of fear or trepidation or crisis or deep concern, but just was a reconfirmation of the necessity for a strong alliance to be mirrored in a common revitalization of the Alliance because of our mutual commitment to sustain its military strength.

We also resolved to follow through on these recommendations. Additionally, we discussed matters that are of concern to us all, the SALT negotiations, present and future prospects; the mutual and balanced force reduction talks, which are gaining momentum, we believe; general questions concerning the Mideast, Africa, the economy of our countries. We had a very good discussion, I believe, sometimes heated, concerning the southern flank of NATO, involving the United States, Greece, Turkey. I reconfirmed to the entire group the purpose of our own administration to remove the legal barriers to the supply of military equipment and weapons to Turkey, an action still to be considered by the Congress.

There was a strong statement to this effect by the entire Alliance. Greece expressed some predictable reservations, but there was a meeting of minds about the need to have harmony between Greece and Turkey and a strengthening of our southeastern flank of NATO.

And lastly, there was a sense of friendship, of shared history. We reconfirmed our commitment to an alliance that's strong. And I think all of us see the future much more clearly than we did when this long, tedious, but productive study was initiated.

I feel much better about what NATO is, what it can be, and I think the potential frictions that arise among autonomous peoples, individualistic and proud, have been minimized. And I think every participating leader in diplomacy and defense and as executive leaders would share the assessment that I have just made.

It was a productive and constructive meeting, which will only result in an enhanced possibility for peace in the European theater, for our own country, and Canada, indeed for the entire world.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 4:17 p.m. to reporters assembled in the Dean Acheson Room at the State Department.

Meeting With Prime Minister Constantine Caramanlis of Greece

White House Statement. May 31, 1978

President Carter and Greek Prime Minister Caramanlis met today at the White House for 1 hour to discuss the entire range of issues regarding Greek-U.S. relations, the situation in the Eastern Mediterranean, and NATO. The meeting between the two leaders was warm and cordial with the President praising the restoration of democratic institutions in Greece under the Prime Minister's leadership.

The President emphasized the vital importance of maintaining peace in the Eastern Mediterranean. In this regard, he stressed the conviction of the United States that disputes which exist in the area be settled through peaceful procedures. The President reiterated the determination of the United States to make a major effort to prevent any action which would disturb peace in the area. The President also expressed his dedication to strengthened ties with Greece, an old and important ally.

Although their assessment differed on certain points, the President and the Prime Minister agreed on the necessity of working together with a view to promoting peace and security in the Eastern Mediterranean.

Also present for the meeting were Georgios Rallis, Minister of Foreign Affairs; Petros Molyviatis, Director General of the Prime Minister's Political Office; John Tzounis, Director General, Foreign Office; Menelas Alexandrakis, Greek Ambassador to the United States; Vice President Walter F. Mondale; Warren Christopher, Deputy Secretary of State; David Aaron, Deputy Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs; Matthew Nimetz, Counselor of the State Department; George Vest, Assistant Secretary of State for European Affairs; and Paul Henze, National Security Council staff member.

White House Fellows

Appointment of 15 Fellows for the 1978-79 Program. June 1, 1978

The President today announced the appointments of the 1978-79 White House Fellows, the 14th group since the creation of the program.

The Fellows, who were chosen from among 2,026 applicants and screened by 11 regional panels, will begin their year of service with the Federal Government on September 1. The President's Commission interviewed 32 national finalists before recommending the 15 persons to the President.

The 1978-79 White House Fellows are:

DAVID ROSS CALKINS, 29, of Cambridge, Mass., senior resident in the department of medicine at Beth Israel Hospital, Boston;

CAROLYN SUE CHIN, 30, of South Orange, N.J., marketing manager, American Telephone and Telegraph Co., Morristown;

NELSON G. DONG, 28, of San Francisco, attorney with the San Francisco firm of Morrison and Foerster;

FRANCIS J. HARVEY, 34, of Murrysville, Pa., fellow engineer, Westinghouse Electric Corp., Pittsburgh;

STEVEN RICHARD HILL, 30, of Tacoma, Wash., allocation manager, corporate raw material, Weyerhaeuser Co., Tacoma;

ISIAH LEGGETT, 32, of Silver Spring, Md., assistant dean and assistant professor of law at Howard University School of Law;

CHARLES ARTHUR MARTIN, 41, of Silver Spring, Md., editor in chief, Journal of Negro Education, Howard University;

JAMES JEROME PADILLA, 30, of Plymouth, Mich., position manager, fuel economy planning, Ford Motor Co.;

CRAIG S. RITCHEY, 33, of Palo Alto, Calif., vice president and partner, Blase, Valentine and Klein;

JOHN DAVID SAXON, 27, of Birmingham, Ala., attorney with Sirote, Permutt, Friend, Friedman, Hild and Apolinsky, P.A.;

TERESA M. SCHWARTZ, 34, of Washington, D.C., professor of law at George Washington University;

JAMES HENRY SCOTT, 35, of New York City, vice president of the Morgan Guaranty Trust Co. of New York;

JUDITH ANN SORUM, of Beltsville, Md., assistant dean for academic programs at the University of Maryland, College Park;

FERNANDO MANUEL TORRES-GIL, 29, of Alhambra, Calif., recruitment director for the Leonard Davis School of Gerontology and principal investigator, Andrus Gerontology Center, Los Angeles;

MICHAEL ORVAN WHEELER, 33, of Burke, Va., major, U.S. Air Force, Special Assistant to the Chief of Staff at Headquarters, U.S. Air Force, Washington, D.C.

The White House Fellowship program was established in 1964 to provide outstanding Americans with firsthand experience in the process of governing the Nation. It is open to U.S. citizens, early in their careers, from all occupations and professions. Employees of the Federal Government are not eligible, with the exception of career Armed Forces personnel.

In addition to their job assignments with the Vice President, members of the Cabinet, and with the White House staff, the Fellows participate in an education program that includes off-the-record discussions with top-level Government officials, journalists, and leaders from various other segments of private life.

Leadership, intellectual and professional ability, and a commitment to community and Nation are broad criteria employed in the selection process.

Applications for the 1979–80 program will be available in August 1978. Application forms and additional information on the program may be obtained by sending a postcard to the Director, President's Commission on White House Fellowships, Washington, D.C. 20415, or by calling (202) 653–6263.

National Gallery of Art

Remarks at Dedication Ceremonies for the East Building. June 1, 1978

Mr. Mellon, Bishop Walker, Mrs. Mondale, ladies and gentlemen:

In the name of the people of the United States of America, and on their behalf, I accept for the Nation this East Building of the National Gallery of Art.

I accept it with a full heart, with gratitude to all who have had a hand in its creation, and with a sense of exhilaration and joy that I know will be shared by the millions of people who will come here to look, to study, to contemplate, and to be moved and delighted and ennobled by what they find here.

This building is a gift of Paul Mellon, of his late sister, Ailsa Mellon Bruce, who's represented here by her grandchildren, and of the Andrew Mellon Foundation. We owe them thanks for the grandeur of their gift and for the modesty and grace with which it is given.

This building, too, is the product of many minds, of many hands, all intent on giving America their best. All have done so. I. M. Pei and his associates have given us an architectural masterpiece.

This great architect saw the unusual shape of the site not as an obstacle, but as an opportunity. And he has taken brilliant advantage of that opportunity. His design is sensitive to its surroundings. It is at once dignified and daring. It is monumental, yet without pomposity. And it reflects the human scale. It combines a reverence for the past with an eagerness for the future. It's worthy of the thousands of years of artistic creation that will be seen and studied under its roof.

J. Carter Brown, the Director of the National Gallery, has untiringly pursued the vision of a museum for people that would also be a center for art scholarship. Many others provided their skills and talents to this project, from the curators to the contractors, from the commissioned artists to the construction workers, who lovingly crafted each detail of the building, inside and out.

This beautiful building is an important addition to that unique repository of knowledge and culture, the Smithsonian Institution. Eight of its museums collect art, art that ranges from Vermeer to Pollock, from the sculpture of Henry Moore to the carved implements of the Eskimo people. With the addition of this building, the scope and definition of displayed art are both broader and deeper than ever before. With the private museums of this city, they make Washington a place where we may enjoy the full range of the creations of the human hand and the human eye.

This building tells us something about ourselves, about the role of art in our lives, about the relations between public life and the life of art, and about the maturing of an American civilization.

The beauty of this East Building and its location at the fulcrum of the ceremonial avenue of our Federal City will ensure that it takes its place alongside the Capitol Building and the Memorials as an emblem of our national life.

As the Capitol symbolizes our belief in political democracy and civil freedom, the National Gallery symbolizes our belief in the freedom and the genius of the human mind which is manifested in art.

In an open society like our own, the relationship between government and the arts must necessarily be a delicate one. We have no ministry of culture in this country, and I hope we never will. We have no official art in this country, and I pray that we never will. No matter how democratic a government may be, no matter how responsive to the wishes of its people, it can never be government's role to define exactly what is good or true or beautiful. Instead, government must limit itself to nourishing the ground in which art and the love of art can grow. So, within those limits, there is much that government can do, and much that we are doing.

In the past year we've increased substantially our support of the National Endowments for the Arts and for the Humanities. And much of that increase has come in the form of challenge grants, whereby government funds are matched with private donations.

Because we are committed to an open and flexible relationship, support for the arts and humanities flows through many different kinds of channels, leaving room for art and scholarship to develop naturally.

This Gallery, for example, is maintained at public expense, but it owes its existence to acts of private philanthropy. Moreover, acquisitions of works of art is financed entirely from private donations. It's equally significant that this building will serve both as a museum and as a center for art scholarship.

We have before us here in concrete, marble, and glass a tangible demonstration that excellence and access to a wide public are far from being contradictory. They are complementary. This building stands as a metaphor for what, at its best, the relationship between government and the arts can be.

When President Roosevelt dedicated the original National Gallery of Art on March 17, 1941, he said, "The dedication of this Gallery to a living past and to a greater and more richly living future is the measure of the earnestness of our intention that the freedom of the human spirit shall go on."

It did go on, and the building we dedicate today is a reaffirmation in this generation that human values, the expression of courage and love, in triumph over despair, will always endure.

NOTE: The President spoke at 2:13 p.m. outside the East Building. Prior to his remarks, John Walker, Episcopal Bishop of Washington, gave the invocation.

Following the ceremonies, the President toured the East Building.

Strategic Arms Limitation Talks

Remarks to Reporters. June 2, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. I understand that on occasion there will be inadvertent inaccuracies in reporting of news. And this is part of our system and I don't condemn it; I live with it. But this morning there was an example that I think is serious enough to warrant a direct appearance before you by the President of the United States.

This story in the Washington Post, "White House Imposes Freeze on Strategic Arms Talks," is totally inaccurate. And before that story was published, the reporters were informed that the story was totally inaccurate. The editors decided to go ahead with it anyhow.

It damages our country, it damages my credibility, and I think it damages the prospect for a continuation of the basic policy of our Government, which has not changed since I came in office, that is, to proceed aggressively with SALT discussions, to conclude a treaty as early as possible and without delay because of political considerations, and to make sure that that treaty, when concluded, is in the best interests of our country.

This matter has never been discussed, even informally, among the three people in our Government responsible for SALT discussions—Paul Warnke, the head of ACDA, Secretary of State Cyrus Vance, or myself. We have never even discussed it, and I wanted to make it clear and on the record that this story is inaccurate, that our policy is unchanged. And this is the statement I wanted to make to you.

Q. Is it possible someone's trying to torpedo the negotiations?

THE PRESIDENT. Jody will respond in depth in just a few minutes to any questions that you might have.

Q. Can you tell us anything about your talks with Gromyko, were there any hopeful prospects?

THE PRESIDENT. Jody can answer that.

NOTE: The President spoke at 9:45 a.m. in the Oval Office at the White House. Jody Powell is Press Secretary to the President.

James B. Allen

Statement on the Death of the Senator From Alabama. June 2, 1978

With the death of Senator James B. Allen of Alabama, the Senate has lost one of the great masters of parliamentary procedure in the long tradition of Southern Senators.

He was an honorable and indefatigable fighter for his beliefs and a man of great personal integrity. I extend my deepest sympathy to his family.

United States Ambassador to Ecuador

Nomination of Raymond E. González. June 2, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Raymond E. González, of La Habra, Calif., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to Ecuador. He would replace Richard J. Bloomfield, who has been transferred.

González was born December 24, 1924, in Pasadena, Calif. He received a B.A. from the University of Southern California in 1949 and an M.A. from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1950. He served in the U.S. Army from 1943 to 1946.

González joined the Foreign Service in 1951 and served in Guayaquil, Naples, Rome, and Brussels. In 1962 and 1963, he was an international economist at the State Department, and from 1963 to 1965, he was adviser to the U.S. Representative to the Council of the OAS. In 1965 and 1966, he attended the National War College.

González was political officer in San José from 1966 to 1970 and in Lima from 1970 to 1974. Since 1974 he has been Deputy Chief of Mission in Panama.

United States Ambassador to Thailand

Nomination of Morton I. Abramowitz.
June 2, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Morton I. Abramowitz, of Peabody, Mass., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to Thailand. He would replace Charles S. Whitehouse, resigned.

Abramowitz was born January 20, 1933, in Lakewood, N.J. He received a B.A. from Stanford University in 1953 and an M.A. from Harvard University in 1955. He served in the U.S. Army in 1957.

Abramowitz was with the International Cooperation Administration from 1958 to 1960, and served as consular-economic officer in Taipei from 1960 to 1962. In 1962 and 1963, he took Chinese language and area training. From 1963 to 1966, he was political officer in Hong Kong.

From 1966 to 1968, Abramowitz was an international economist at the State Department, and from 1969 to 1971, he was special assistant in the Office of the Deputy Secretary of State. From 1971 to 1973, he was a foreign affairs analyst at the State Department, and in 1973 and 1974, he was political adviser to CINCPAC. Since 1974 Abramowitz has been Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Affairs, on detail from the Foreign Service.

BROOKS MCCORMICK, chairman of the board of International Harvester.

Occupational Safety and Health Activities in the Federal Government

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. June 2, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting to the Congress the annual report required by Section 19b of the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970, entitled "Occupational Safety and Health Activities in the Federal Government." The report summarizes the Government's programs for the protection of the safety and health of its employees during 1976, activities prior to the beginning of my Administration, and was prepared by the Department of Labor.

The report indicates that not all agencies of the Federal Government have in the past fully followed guidelines set forth by the Department of Labor for workplace safety and health programs. This Administration is studying ways to improve the workplace safety and health efforts of all Federal agencies, including those programs that affect Federal employees. I intend that reports covering the years of this Administration will reflect significant progress in that regard.

Trade With Hungary and Romania

Message to the Congress. June 2, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with subsection 402(d) (5) of the Trade Act of 1974, I transmit herewith my recommendation for a further 12-month extension of the authority to waive subsections (a) and (b) of section 402.

In accordance with subsections 402(d) (5) (B) and (C), this recommendation gives my reasons for recommending the extension of waiver authority and for my determination that continuation of the waivers applicable to the Socialist Republic of Romania and to the Hungarian People's Republic will substantially promote the objectives of section 402.

I include as part of my recommendation, my determination that further extension of the waiver authority, and continuation of the waivers applicable to the Socialist Republic of Romania and to the Hungarian People's Republic, will substantially promote the objectives of section 402.

For the information of the Congress, I also include my finding and determination that the requirements for renewal of the United States-Romanian Agreement on Trade Relations under section 405(b) of the Trade Act have been satisfied.

JIMMY CARTER

The White House,
June 2, 1978.

RECOMMENDATION FOR EXTENSION OF WAIVER AUTHORITY

I recommend to the Congress that the waiver authority granted by subsection 402(c) of the Trade Act of 1974 (hereinafter referred to as "the Act") be further extended for twelve months. Pursuant to subsection 402(d) (5) of the Act, I have today determined that further extension of the waiver authority granted by section 402(c) of the Act and continuation of the waivers currently applicable to the Socialist Republic of Romania and to the Hungarian People's Republic will substantially promote the objectives of section 402 of the Act. My determinations are attached to this recommendation, and are incorporated herein.

The general waiver authority conferred by section 402(c) of the Act has proved to be a useful instrument in permitting the expansion of relations between the United States and East European countries. It permitted us to sign bilateral trade agreements with Romania and Hungary in April 1975 and March 1978, respectively, which have laid a foundation for increased trade and closer relations. The extension of general waiver authority is necessary to permit continuation of the U.S.-Romanian Trade Agreement for another three-year period. The recently-negotiated Trade Agreement with Hungary, a significant development in the favorable evolution of our relations with that country, is before the Congress for approval. Moreover, continuation of this authority will provide a basis for future steps to expand and improve our bilateral relations with other countries subject to subsection 402 (a) and (b) of the Act, should circumstances permit. I believe that all of these considerations make it in the national interest to extend the general waiver authority.

Extension of the waiver for Romania will permit us to continue to promote the objectives of section 402 of the Trade Act of 1974. Emigration from Romania to the United States has continued to increase during the period in which the waiver has been in effect, and 1977 saw a marked increase in overall emigration from Romania, led by a large increase in emigration to the Federal Republic of Germany. Emigration to Israel, however, has declined somewhat. The Administration has continued to advise Romanian officials periodically of our high interest in emigration both to the United States and to Israel. At my request, the Department of State conducted a detailed review of Romanian emigration trends and practices this winter, and a report was sent to the Congress on February 9. I also expressed our interest in greater emigration to Romanian President Ceausescu during his recent visit. The questions of emigration to Israel and the United States and of binational marriages were also discussed in detail during a meeting between Secretary of State Vance and Romanian Foreign Minister Stefan Andrei on April 13. This close dialogue with Romanian officials has led to the favorable resolution of many emigration and humanitarian problems. It is my intention to continue to bring to the attention of the Romanian government matters relating to emigration which do not seem to be consistent with the assurances which have been given in the past. Failure to extend the waiver authority would remove the major incentive to encourage Romania to be more forthcoming on emigration. In view of continuing progress in this respect, I therefore, strongly recommend continuation of the waiver for Romania.

On April 7, 1978, when I issued a waiver of the application of subsections (a) and (c) of section 402 with respect to Hungary, I noted that the Hungarian Government has stressed to us that it intends to continue dealing with emigration matters in a responsive and humanitarian way. Since that time Hungary's actions have remained consistent with this policy. I have therefore determined that a continuation of this waiver will substantially promote the objectives of section 402 of the Trade Act.

Trade With Romania

Memorandum From the President.
June 2, 1978

Presidential Determination No. 78-13

Memorandum for the Secretary of State

Subject: Renewal of the U.S.-Romanian Agreement on Trade Relations—Finding and Determination under Subsection 405(b)(1) of the Trade Act of 1974

Pursuant to the authority vested in me under the Trade Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-618, January 3, 1975; 88 Stat. 1978) (hereinafter "the Act"), I find, pursuant to subsection 405(b)(1) of the Act, that a satisfactory balance of concessions in trade and services has been maintained during the life of the Agreement on Trade Relations between the United States of America and the Socialist Republic of Romania. I further determine that actual or foreseeable reductions in United States tariffs and non-tariff barriers to trade resulting from multilateral negotiations are satisfactorily reciprocated by the Socialist Republic of Romania.

This finding and determination shall be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

Presidential Determination No. 78-14

Memorandum for the Secretary of State
Subject: Determination under Subsections 402(d)(5) and (d)(5)(C) of the Trade Act of 1974—Continuation of Waiver Authority

Pursuant to the authority vested in me under the Trade Act of 1974, (Public Law 93-618, January 3, 1975; 88 Stat. 1978) (hereinafter "the Act"), I determine, pursuant to Subsections 402(d)(5) and (d)(5)(C) of the Act, that the further extension of the waiver authority granted by Subsection 402(c) of the Act will substantially promote the objectives of Section 402 of the Act. I further determine that continuation of the waivers applicable to the Socialist Republic of Romania and to the Hungarian People's Republic will substantially promote the objectives of Section 402 of the Act.

This determination shall be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

Bombing Incident in Jerusalem

White House Statement. June 2, 1978

The President condemns the tragic event in Jerusalem where a cowardly and senseless bombing took the lives of a number of innocent civilians, including an American, and wounded many more.

The killing and maiming of innocent people advances no cause and serves no meaningful purpose.

Every such act of calculated cruelty places new obstacles in the way of those who seek peace, while strengthening the hand of those who feed on conflict. The United States denounces this latest example of terrorism and extends its sympathy to the victims and their families.

NOTE: Five passengers were killed by a bomb which was placed in their bus by Palestinian guerrillas.

The statement was released on June 3.

Overseas Private Investment Corporation

*Nomination of Edward L. Marcus To Be a Member of the Board of Directors.
June 5, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate Edward L. Marcus, of Branford, Conn., to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Overseas Private Investment Corporation for a term expiring December 17, 1980. He would replace Herbert Salzman, resigned.

Marcus was born June 14, 1927, in Brooklyn, New York City. He received a B.A. from Yale University in 1948 and an L.L.B. from Yale Law School in 1950.

Since 1950 Marcus has been a practicing attorney in New Haven, Conn., specializing in real estate, corporate, and commercial law. He was a member of the Connecticut State Senate from 1958 to 1970.

Lowell National Historical Park

*Statement on Signing H.R. 11662 Into Law.
June 5, 1978*

Today I am signing into law H.R. 11662, which establishes the Lowell National Historic Park.

The city of Lowell, Massachusetts, was founded in 1822 at a site on the Merrimack River about 30 miles north of Boston. Over the next 50 years the city rapidly expanded to become our Nation's first great industrial city and the center of the Northeast's textile industry.

This bill will permit the restoration and preservation of many of Lowell's historic structures through a cooperative arrangement with State and local governments. The Lowell National Historic Park will be administered by the National Park Service, while the Lowell Historic Preservation District, adjacent to the park, will remain under the jurisdiction of the city of Lowell.

The bill creates a Lowell Historic Preservation Commission to advise the city in its stewardship of the historic properties within this district. The Commission will comprise 15 members representing local, State, and Federal governments. It will be authorized to make low-interest loans and grants for the restoration and preservation of properties.

I want to thank Representative Paul Tsongas, Senator Edward Kennedy, and Senator Edward Brooke for their dedicated work on this legislation.

The enactment of this bill into law will preserve a portion of America's history for the perpetual enjoyment of our people.

NOTE: As enacted, H.R. 11662 is Public Law 95-290, approved June 5.

United States Court of Military Appeals Nominating Commission

Executive Order 12063. June 5, 1978

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and statutes of the United States of America, and in order to create in accordance with the Federal Advisory Committee Act (5 U.S.C. App. I) an advisory commission on the membership of the United States Court of Military Appeals, it is hereby ordered as follows:

1-1. Establishment of the Commission.

1-101. There is established the United States Court of Military Appeals Nominating Commission. The Commission shall be comprised of six members appointed by the President.

1-102. Not more than three members shall be officials of the Federal government. The Federal members shall include the General Counsel of the Department of Defense, who shall chair the Commission. The private members shall be selected from among those in the legal profession.

1-2. Functions of the Commission.

1-201. When notified by the President that he desires its assistance in filling a vacancy on the United States Court of Military Appeals, the Commission shall conduct inquiries to identify persons who may be qualified to serve in the position and shall conduct further inquiries to determine those persons' qualifications.

1-202. In conducting its inquiries the Commission shall follow any procedures or criteria established by the President in his letter of notification or by the Secretary of Defense acting on behalf of the President.

1-203. The Commission shall submit a report to the President and to the Secretary of Defense within 60 days from the date it is notified by the President that he desires its assistance. The report shall list the names of no more than five persons whom the Commission considers well qualified to serve in the position.

1-204. The Commission shall conduct such additional inquiries and submit such additional reports as may be requested by the President.

1-205. The Commission shall perform no function except when requested by the President to assist him in filling a vacancy.

1-3. Administrative Provisions.

1-301. The Commission is authorized to request from any Executive agency such information or assistance as the Commission deems necessary to carry out its functions under this Order. Each agency shall, to the extent permitted by law, furnish such information or assistance to the Commission.

1-302. The Commission is authorized to request from any State agency such information and assistance as the Commission deems necessary. It is authorized to obtain such information and assistance to the extent permitted by State law.

1-303. Members of the Commission shall serve without compensation. While engaged in the work of the Commission, members may receive travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by law (5 U.S.C. 5702 and 5703).

1-304. The Secretary of Defense shall furnish to the Commission necessary administrative support.

1-305. All necessary expenses incurred in connection with the work of the Commission, to the extent permitted by law, shall be paid from funds available to the Secretary of Defense.

1-4. General Provision.

1-401. No member of the Commission shall, while serving on the Commission or for a period of one year thereafter, be eligible to be nominated to fill a position as a judge on the Court of Military Appeals.

1-402. Notwithstanding the provisions of any other Executive order, the functions of the President under the Federal Advisory Committee Act (5 U.S.C. App. I), except that of reporting annually to the Congress, which are applicable to the Commission, shall be performed by the Secretary of Defense in accordance with the guidelines and procedures established by the Administrator of General Services.

1-403. The Commission shall terminate on December 31, 1978, unless sooner extended.

Joseph M. Montoya

Statement on the Death of the Former Senator From New Mexico. June 5, 1978

As a United States Senator, Joseph Montoya dedicated himself to legislation that would promote progress and benefit the people of his State and Nation. From the time he was first elected to the State house of representatives at the age of 21, he devoted his life to public service—a total of 38 years in office.

He attained justified, national recognition for his performance in the Senate at a time of national crisis.

Senator Montoya was part of the ancient and proud Hispanic tradition of New Mexico. My deepest sympathy goes out to his family at his death.

NOTE: Mr. Montoya served in the U.S. Senate from 1964 to 1977.

North Pacific Fisheries Convention

Message to the Senate Transmitting a Protocol. June 5, 1978

To the Senate of the United States:

I am pleased to transmit the Protocol Amending the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean between the United States, Canada, and Japan for Senate advice and consent to ratification. The Protocol, along with accompanying Agreed Minutes and Memoranda of Understanding, were signed in Tokyo on April 25, 1978.

The Protocol amends the existing International Convention for the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean. Under the Protocol salmon of United States origin will receive substantially greater protection than afforded under the existing International Convention for the High Seas Fisheries of the North Pacific Ocean signed on May 9, 1952. An amendment to the existing Convention, rather than sole reliance on the provisions of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act, is being sought in order to obtain the continuing benefits of the abstention principle established by the existing Convention, and to overcome the practical management and enforcement problems which occur in areas of the high seas where United States origin salmon intermingle with salmon originating in other countries.

I transmit also for the information of the Senate the report of the Department of State with respect to the Protocol and associated documents.

I urge the Senate to act favorably at an early date on this Protocol.

Budget Rescission and Deferrals

Message to the Congress. June 5, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the Impoundment Control Act of 1974, I herewith report one proposal to rescind $48 million in budget authority previously provided by the Congress. In addition, I am reporting three new deferrals totalling $8.1 million and revisions to three previously transmitted deferrals increasing the amount deferred by $0.4 million.

The rescission proposal affects the military assistance program. The new deferrals and the revisions to existing deferrals involve programs in the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, the Interior, and the Treasury.

The details of the rescission proposal and the deferrals are contained in the attached reports.

Mexico-United States Interparliamentary Conference

Remarks at a Reception for Delegates to the 18th Conference. June 5, 1978

*Senator Gamboa, Congressman Alvarez,
Senator Bentsen, Congressmen de la Garza, Wright, and others, friends of Mexico:*

It's a great pleasure to have you here in our house.<sup>1</sup>

I also speak English. [Laughter] And I would like to say in my own language that the first visitor that we had to the White House after I became President was the President of Mexico, my good friend, López Portillo. And my wife attended his inauguration before she attended mine.

When he came here, we had a great opportunity to discuss many important matters that are of concern to the people of Mexico and to the people of the United States. Several discussion groups were initiated between our two governments, and their work has already been of great benefit to our people.

We discussed the importance of the ratification of the Treaty of Tlatelolco. We discussed the importance of a free exchange of prisoners incarcerated in our two countries, and we discussed the problem of marine boundaries, a fisheries agreement, agricultural trade, civil aviation. And I can report to you that already we have made excellent progress in every one of these very important matters.

President López Portillo was very helpful to us in negotiating with Panama the terms of the new Panama Canal Treaty. His influence and his moderating position between our country and that of Panama was a very constructive element in the successful conclusion of this treaty which I believe lays a new foundation for relationships throughout this hemisphere.

When he and I became President, one of the greatest problems was the trade in illegal drugs between Mexico and the United States. Because of his courage and the effectiveness of our joint effort, this trade in heroin and other destructive drugs has been drastically reduced.

Obviously, we still have many serious problems that we share—the problem of how to deal humanely and properly with undocumented aliens, the problem of improving the economic status of the people in our two countries, how to increase already good trade relationships between us, to deal with tax problems. I realize that we have many challenges before us, but the friendship that binds us together is a good foundation on which we can anticipate success.

These negotiations are routinely conducted between Presidents or members of our Cabinet. But an exchange of distinguished legislative leaders from between our countries is a very constructive element in the understanding of common needs and in tying the people of our two countries together, even closer than they have been in the past.

We consider this visit to be one not only of great honor to us but one of present and future constructive efforts to make the relationships between our nations even better.

And finally, let me say that the people of the United States of America are blessed to have such a wonderful neighbor to the south. We live in harmony and peace with one another, with mutual respect and friendship, and we have a great admiration for Mexico, not only because of these blessings that are bestowed on us by your being our neighbor but also because of the increasing beneficial influence that the Government of Mexico is having throughout the world.

Your leadership in the developing nations of the world is because of the democratic principles on which your government is founded and in which your people believe, your complete commitment to preserving and enhancing basic human rights. And we are very proud to share these noble ideals with people for whom we care so deeply.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 5:20 p.m. in the East Room at the White House. In his opening remarks, he referred to Joaquin Gamboa Pascoe, majority leader of the Mexican Senate, and Enrique Alvarez del Castillo, president of the Great Commission in the Mexican Chamber of Deputies.

Federal Water Policy

Remarks Announcing the Administration's Policy. June 6, 1978

Last year, I asked Secretary Cecil Andrus to lead an interagency review of Federal water policy. And today, I'm sending to Congress a water policy message designed to achieve four basic objectives: one, improved planning and efficient management of Federal water policy programs, which will permit the completion of necessary water projects that are cost-effective, safe, and environmentally sound; two, a new national emphasis on water conservation; three, enhanced Federal-State cooperation in water policy and in planning; and four, increased attention to environmental quality. We will achieve these objectives without imposing any new Federal regulatory program for water management.

This policy recognizes that across the Nation there is remarkable diversity in the role that water plays. In most of the West, water is scarce and must be managed very carefully. Its use is governed by longstanding tradition and laws. In other areas of the country, flooding is more of a problem than drought. And in many areas, plentiful water resources have been offering opportunities for hydroelectric power and for navigation. Urban areas throughout the country face the need for rehabilitation of their drinking water systems. And everywhere, water is fundamental to environmental quality.

This policy recognizes the substantial benefits that water development has provided to our country. But our Federal water resource programs are now plagued by inefficiencies and environmental problems. These initiatives are specifically addressed to the four objectives of water policy.

First, to improve Federal water resource programs, I propose the use of new criteria and uniform procedures for the computation of project costs and benefits with an expedited interagency review to assure that projects are assessed rapidly and consistently, and cost-sharing to give States a more meaningful role in water project designs and decisions, yet to protect small States from undue financial burdens. Second, to establish water conservation as a new national priority, I'm directing all Federal agencies to incorporate water conservation requirements in all applicable programs, and proposing legislation to allow States the option of charging more for municipal and industrial water supplies from Federal reservoirs to encourage conservation, provided that the additional revenue is returned to the municipality.

Third, to enhance Federal-State cooperation, I'm proposing grant programs totaling $50 million to help States plan for their water needs and to implement water conservation programs, and creating a task force with State, local, and Federal officials to examine water-related problems and to deepen the partnership that this water policy review has begun.

Fourth and finally, to protect the environment, I'm requiring agencies to enforce environmental statutes more effectively, requiring agencies to fund environmental mitigation plans at the same time projects are being built, and seeking increased State cooperation in protection of in-stream flows and ground water resources.

I want to work closely with the Congress, with State and local governments, and with the public to implement this policy, to build needed water projects, to avert water shortages in the future, and to preserve our beautiful rivers and streams for tomorrow's America.

And now, Secretary Cecil Andrus, who has been instrumental in preparing this report which is going to the Congress, will be available to speak further and answer any questions that you might have.

Thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 11:02 a.m. to reporters assembled in the Briefing Room at the White House. Following his remarks, Secretary of the Interior Andrus and Stuart E. Eizenstat, Assistant to the President for Domestic Affairs and Policy, held a news conference on the policy.

Federal Water Policy

Message to the Congress. June 6, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

I am today sending to Congress water policy initiatives designed to:

- improve planning and efficient management of Federal water resource programs to prevent waste and to permit necessary water projects which are cost-effective, safe and environmentally sound to move forward expeditiously;

- provide a new, national emphasis on water conservation;
- enhance Federal-State cooperation and improved State water resources planning; and
- increase attention to environmental quality.

None of the initiatives would impose any new federal regulatory program for water management.

Last year, I directed the Water Resources Council, the Office of Management and Budget and the Council on Environmental Quality, under the chairmanship of Secretary Cecil Andrus, to make a comprehensive review of Federal water policy and to recommend proposed reforms.

This new water policy results from their review, the study of water policy ordered by the Congress in Section 80 of the Water Resources Planning Act of 1974 and our extensive consultations with members of Congress, State, county, city and other local officials and the public.

Water is an essential resource, and over the years, the programs of the Bureau of Reclamation, the Corps of Engineers, the Soil Conservation Service and the Tennessee Valley Authority have helped permit a dramatic improvement in American agriculture, have provided irrigation water essential to the development of the West, and have developed community flood protection, electric power, navigation and recreation throughout the Nation.

I ordered this review of water policies and programs because of my concern that while Federal water resources programs have been of great benefit to our Nation, they are today plagued with problems and inefficiencies. In the course of this water policy review we found that:

- Twenty-five separate Federal agencies spend more than $10 billion per year on water resources projects and related programs.

—These projects often are planned without a uniform, standard basis for estimating benefits and costs.

—States are primarily responsible for water policy within their boundaries, yet are not integrally involved in setting priorities and sharing in Federal project planning and funding.

—There is a $34 billion backlog of authorized or uncompleted projects.

—Some water projects are unsafe or environmentally unwise and have caused losses of natural streams and rivers, fish and wildlife habitat and recreational opportunities.

The study also found that water conservation has not been addressed at a national level even though we have pressing water supply problems. Of 106 watershed subregions in the country, 21 already have severe water shortages. By the year 2000 this number could increase to 39 subregions. The Nation's cities are also beginning to experience water shortage problems which can only be solved at very high cost. In some areas, precious ground-water supplies are also being depleted at a faster rate than they are replenished. In many cases an effective water conservation program could play a key role in alleviating these problems.

These water policy initiatives will make the Federal government's water programs more efficient and responsive in meeting the Nation's water-related needs. They are designed to build on fundamentally sound statutes and on the Principles and Standards which govern the planning and development of Federal water projects, and also to enhance the role of the States, where the primary responsibilities for water policy must lie. For the first time, the Federal government will work with State and local governments and exert needed national leadership in the effort to conserve water. Above all, these policy reforms will encourage water projects which are economically and environmentally sound and will avoid projects which are wasteful or which benefit a few at the expense of many.

Across the Nation there is remarkable diversity in the role water plays. Over most of the West, water is scarce and must be managed carefully—and detailed traditions and laws have grown up to govern the use of water. In other parts of the country, flooding is more of a problem than drought, and in many areas, plentiful water resources have offered opportunities for hydroelectric power and navigation. In the urban areas of our Nation, water supply systems are the major concern—particularly where antiquated systems need rehabilitation in order to conserve water and assure continued economic growth.

Everywhere, water is fundamental to environmental quality. Clean drinking water, recreation, wildlife and beautiful natural areas depend on protection of our water resources.

Given this diversity, Federal water policy cannot attempt to prescribe water use patterns for the country. Nor should the Federal government preempt the primary responsibility of the States for water management and allocation. For those reasons, these water policy reforms will not preempt State or local water responsibilities. Yet water policy is an important national concern, and the Federal government has major responsibilities to exercise leadership, to protect the environment and to develop and maintain hydroelectric power, irrigated agriculture, flood control and navigation.

The primary focus of the proposals is on the water resources programs of the Corps of Engineers, the Bureau of Reclamation, the Soil Conservation Service and the Tennessee Valley Authority, where annual water program budgets total approximately $3.75 billion. These agencies perform the Federal government's water resource development programs. In addition, a number of Federal agencies with water-related responsibilities will be affected by this water policy.

I am charging Secretary Andrus with the lead responsibility to see that these initiatives are carried out promptly and fully. With the assistance of the Office of Management and Budget and the Council on Environmental Quality, he will be responsible for working with the other Federal agencies, the Congress, State and local governments and the public to assure proper implementation of this policy and to make appropriate recommendations for reform in the future.

SPECIFIC INITIATIVES IMPROVING FEDERAL WATER RESOURCE PROGRAMS

The Federal government has played a vital role in developing the water resources of the United States. It is essential that Federal water programs be updated and better coordinated if they are to continue to serve the nation in the best way possible. The reforms I am proposing are designed to modernize and improve the coordination of federal water programs. In addition, in a few days, I will also be sending to the Congress a Budget amendment proposing funding for a number of new water project construction and planning starts. These projects meet the criteria I am announcing today. This is the first time the Executive Branch has proposed new water project starts since Fiscal Year 1975, four years ago.

The actions I am taking include:

- A directive to the Water Resources Council to improve the implementation of the Principles and Standards governing the planning of Federal water projects. The basic planning objectives of the Principles and Standards—national economic development and environmental quality—should be retained and given equal emphasis. In addition, the implementation of the Principles and Standards should be improved by:

- adding water conservation as a specific component of both the economic and environmental objectives;
- requiring the explicit formulation and consideration of a primarily non-structural plan as one alternative whenever structural water projects or programs are planned;
- instituting consistent, specific procedures for calculating benefits and costs in compliance with the Principles and Standards and other applicable planning and evaluation requirements. Benefit-cost analyses have not been uniformly applied by Federal agencies, and in some cases benefits have been improperly recognized, “double-counted” or included when inconsistent with federal policy or sound economic rationale. I am directing the Water Resources Council to prepare within 12 months a manual which ensures that benefits and costs are calculated using the best techniques and provides for consistent application of the Principles and Standards and other requirements;
- ensuring that water projects have been planned in accordance with the Principles and Standards and other planning requirements by creating, by Executive Order, a project review function located in the Water Resources Council. A professional staff will ensure an impartial review of pre-construction project plans for their consistency with established planning and benefit-cost analysis procedures and applicable requirements. They will report on compliance with these requirements to agency heads, who will include their report, together with the agency recommendations, to the Office of Management and Budget. Project reviews will be completed within 60 days, before the Cabinet officer makes his or her Budget request for the coming fiscal year. Responsibility will rest with the Cabinet officer for Budget requests to the Office of Management and Budget, but timely independent review will be provided. This review must be completed within the same budget cycle in which the Cabinet Officer intends to make Budget requests so that the process results in no delay.

—The manual, the Principles and Standards requirements and the independent review process will apply to all authorized projects (and separable project features) not yet under construction.

- Establishment of the following criteria for setting priorities each year among the water projects eligible for funding or authorization, which will form the basis of my decisions on specific water projects:

—Projects should have net national economic benefits unless there are environmental benefits which clearly more than compensate for any economic deficit. Net adverse environmental consequences should be significantly outweighed by economic benefits. Generally, projects with higher benefit/cost ratios and fewer adverse environmental consequences will be given priority within the limits of available funds.

—Projects should have widely distributed benefits.

—Projects should stress water conservation and appropriate non-structural measures.

—Projects should have no significant safety problems involving design, construction or operation.

—There should be evidence of active public support including support by State and local officials.

—Projects will be given expedited consideration where State governments assume a share of costs over and above existing cost-sharing.

—There should be no significant international or inter-governmental problems.

—Where vendible outputs are involved preference should be given to projects which provide for greater recovery of Federal and State costs, consistent with project purposes.

—The project's problem assessment, environmental impacts, costs and benefits should be based on up-to-date conditions (planning should not be obsolete).

—Projects should be in compliance with all relevant environmental statutes.

—Funding for mitigation of fish and wildlife damages should be provided concurrently and proportionately with construction funding.

- Preparation of a legislative proposal for improving cost-sharing for water projects. Improved cost-sharing will allow States to participate more actively in project decisions and will remove biases in the existing system against non-structural flood control measures. These changes will help assure project merit. This proposal, based on the study required by Section 80 of P.L. 93-251, has two parts:

—participation of States in the financing of federal water project construction. For project purposes with vendible outputs (such as water supply or hydroelectric power), States would contribute 10% of the costs, proportionate to and phased with federal appropriations. Revenues would be returned to the States proportionate to their contribution. For project purposes without vendible outputs (such as flood control), the State financing share would be 5%. There would be a cap on State participation per project per year of  $\frac{1}{4}$  of 1% of the State's general revenues so that a small State would not be precluded from having a very large project located in it. Where project benefits accrue to more than one State, State contributions would be calculated accordingly, but if a benefiting State did not choose to participate in cost-sharing, its share could be paid by other participating States. This State cost-sharing proposal would apply on a mandatory basis to projects not yet authorized. However, for projects in the authorized backlog, States which voluntarily enter into these cost-sharing arrangements will achieve expedited Executive Branch consideration and priority for project funding, as long as other project planning requirements are met. Soil Conservation Service projects will be completely exempt from this State cost-sharing proposal.

—equalizing cost-sharing for structural and non-structural flood control alternatives. There is existing authority for 80%–20% Federal/non-Federal cost-sharing for non-structural flood control measures (including in-kind contributions such as land and easements). I will begin approving non-structural flood control projects with this funding arrangement and will propose that a parallel cost-sharing requirement (including in-kind contributions) be enacted for structural flood control measures, which currently have a multiplicity of cost-sharing rules.

Another policy issue raised in Section 80 of P.L. 93–251 is that of the appropriate discount rate for computing the present value of future estimated economic benefits of water projects. After careful consideration of a range of options I have decided that the currently legislated discount rate formula is reasonable, and I am therefore recommending that no change be made in the current formula. Nor will I recommend retroactive changes in the discount rate for currently authorized projects.

WATER CONSERVATION

Managing our vital water resources depends on a balance of supply, demand and wise use. Using water more efficiently is often cheaper and less damaging to the environment than developing additional supplies. While increases in supply will still be necessary, these reforms place emphasis on water conservation and make clear that this is now a national priority.

In addition to adding the consideration of water conservation to the Principles and Standards, the initiatives I am taking include:

- Directives to all Federal agencies with programs which affect water supply or consumption to encourage water conservation, including:
  - making appropriate community water conservation measures a condition of the water supply and wastewater treatment grant and loan programs of the Environmental Protection Agency, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Commerce;
  - integrating water conservation requirements into the housing assistance programs of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Veterans Administration and the Department of Agriculture;
  - providing technical assistance to farmers and urban dwellers on how to conserve water through existing programs of the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Interior and the Department of Housing and Urban Development;

- requiring development of water conservation programs as a condition of contracts for storage or delivery of municipal and industrial water supplies from federal projects;
  - requiring the General Services Administration, in consultation with affected agencies, to establish water conservation goals and standards in Federal buildings and facilities;
  - encouraging water conservation in the agricultural assistance programs of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Interior which affect water consumption in water-short areas; and
  - requesting all Federal agencies to examine their programs and policies so that they can implement appropriate measures to increase water conservation and re-use.
- A directive to the Secretary of the Interior to improve the implementation of irrigation repayment and water service contract procedures under existing authorities of the Bureau of Reclamation. The Secretary will:
- require that new and renegotiated contracts include provisions for recalculation and renegotiation of water rates every five years. This will replace the previous practice of 40-year contracts which often do not reflect inflation and thus do not meet the beneficiaries' repayment obligations;
  - under existing authority add provisions to recover operation and maintenance costs when existing contracts are renegotiated, or earlier where existing contracts have adjustment clauses;
  - more precisely calculate and implement the "ability to pay" provision in existing law which governs recovery of a portion of project capital costs.

• Preparation of legislation to allow States the option of requiring higher prices for municipal and industrial water supplies from Federal projects in order to promote conservation, provided that State revenues in excess of Federal costs would be returned to municipalities or other public water supply entities for use in water conservation or rehabilitation of water supply systems.

FEDERAL-STATE COOPERATION

States must be the focal point for water resource management. The water reforms are based on this guiding principle. Therefore, I am taking several initiatives to strengthen Federal-State relations in the water policy area and to develop a new, creative partnership. In addition to proposing that States increase their roles and responsibilities in water resources development through cost-sharing, the actions I am taking include:

• Proposing a substantial increase from $3 million to $25 million annually in the funding of State water planning under the existing 50%-50% matching program administered by the Water Resources Council. State water planning would integrate water management and implementation programs which emphasize water conservation and which are tailored to each State's needs including assessment of water delivery system rehabilitation needs and development of programs to protect and manage groundwater and instream flows.

• Preparation of legislation to provide $25 million annually in 50%-50% matching grant assistance to States to implement water conservation technical assistance programs. These funds could be passed through to counties and cities for use in urban or rural water conservation programs. This program will be administered by the Water Resources Council in conjunction with matching grants for water resources planning.

- Working with Governors to create a Task Force of Federal, State, county, city and other local officials to continue to address water-related problems. The administrative actions and legislative proposals in this Message are designed to initiate sound water management policy at the national level. However, the Federal government must work closely with the States, and with local governments as well, to continue identifying and examining water-related problems and to help implement the initiatives I am announcing today. This Task Force will be a continuing guide as we implement the water policy reforms and will ensure that the State and local role in our Nation's water policy is constant and meaningful.

- An instruction to Federal agencies to work promptly and expeditiously to inventory and quantify Federal reserved and Indian water rights. In several areas of the country, States have been unable to allocate water because these rights have not been determined. This quantification effort should focus first on high priority areas, should involve close consultation with the States and water users and should emphasize negotiations rather than litigation wherever possible.

ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION

Water is a basic requirement for human survival, is necessary for economic growth and prosperity, and is fundamental to protecting the natural environment. Existing environmental statutes relating to water and water projects generally are adequate, but these laws must be consistently applied and effectively enforced to achieve their purposes. Sensitivity to environmental protection must be an important aspect of all water-related planning and management decisions. I am particularly concerned about the need to improve the protection of instream flows and to evolve careful management of our nation's precious groundwater supplies, which are threatened by depletion and contamination.

My initiatives in this area include the following:

- A directive to the Secretary of the Interior and other Federal agency heads to implement vigorously the Fish and Wildlife Coordination Act, the Historic Preservation Act and other environmental statutes. Federal agencies will prepare formal implementing procedures for the Fish and Wildlife Coordination Act and other statutes where appropriate. Affected agencies will prepare reports on compliance with environmental statutes on a project-by-project basis for inclusion in annual submissions to the Office of Management and Budget.

- A directive to agency heads requiring them to include designated funds for environmental mitigation in water project appropriation requests to provide for concurrent and proportionate expenditure of mitigation funds.

- Accelerated implementation of Executive Order No. 11988 on floodplain management. This Order requires agencies to protect floodplains and to reduce risks of flood losses by not conducting, supporting or allowing actions in floodplains unless there are no practicable alternatives. Agency implementation is behind schedule and must be expedited.

- A directive to the Secretaries of Army, Commerce, Housing and Urban Development and Interior to help reduce flood damages through acquisition of flood-prone land and property, where consistent with primary program purposes.

- A directive to the Secretary of Agriculture to encourage more effective soil and water conservation through watershed programs of the Soil Conservation Service by:

- working with the Fish and Wildlife Service to apply fully the recently-adopted stream channel modification guidelines;
  - encouraging accelerated land treatment measures prior to funding of structural measures on watershed projects, and making appropriate land treatment measures eligible for Federal cost-sharing;
  - establishing periodic post-project monitoring to ensure implementation of land treatment and operation and maintenance activities specified in the work plan and to provide information helpful in improving the design of future projects.
- A directive to Federal agency heads to provide increased cooperation with States and leadership in maintaining instream flows and protecting groundwater through joint assessment of needs, increased assistance in the gathering and sharing of data, appropriate design and operation of Federal water facilities, and other means. I also call upon the Governors and the Congress to work with Federal agencies to protect the fish and wildlife and other values associated with adequate instream flows. New and existing projects should be planned and operated to protect instream flows, consistent with State law and in close consultation with States. Where prior commitments and economic feasibility permit, amendments to authorizing statutes should be sought in order to provide for streamflow maintenance.

CONCLUSION

These initiatives establish the goals and the framework for water policy reform. They do so without impinging on the rights of States and by calling for a closer partnership among the Federal, State, county, city and other local levels of government. I want to work with the Congress, State and local governments and the public to implement this policy. Together we can protect and manage our nation's water resources putting water to use for society's benefit, preserving our rivers and streams for future generations of Americans, and averting critical water shortages in the future through adequate supply, conservation and wise planning.

National Commission on Unemployment Compensation

Appointment of Bert Seidman and Delores G. Sanchez as Members.
June 6, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of two persons as members of the National Commission on Unemployment Compensation. They are Bert Seidman, of Falls Church, Va., director of the AFL-CIO's department of social security, and Delores G. Sanchez, of Los Angeles, Calif., partner in La Quebradita Supermarket in Los Angeles and a founding member of the Mexican American Grocers Association.

Robert F. Kennedy

Statement by the President. June 6, 1978

The death of Robert Kennedy, 10 years ago today, was a terrible blow to the people of this Nation and the world. As a champion of the poor, of the victims of injustice, and of reconciliation and peace, he was an apostle and a symbol of hope.

He felt deeply, and aroused deep feelings. He is still mourned, and he is remembered as he was: passionate, moral, committed, spontaneous, joyful.

NOTE: Senator Kennedy was assassinated following his appearance at a political rally in Los Angeles, Calif. He was campaigning for the 1968 Democratic Presidential nomination.

United States Naval Academy

Address at the Commencement Exercises.
June 7, 1978

Admiral McKee, Governor Lee, distinguished guests, members of the graduating class, and friends:

We do have many distinguished guests here today. I invited my old boss, Admiral Hyman Rickover, to come and join us. He sent word back that he would, of course, comply with my orders as Commander in Chief, but he thought his work for the Navy in Washington was more important than listening to my speech. [Laughter] And I was not surprised. [Laughter]

I am glad to be back for a Naval Academy graduation, although I return with a different rank. I remember that 32 years ago I had the same experience that most of you are sharing today. I was not a midshipman officer. Most of you are not officers. I was thinking more about leave and marriage than I was about world events or a distant future. I would guess there are some among you who feel the same. [Laughter]

I was quite disappointed with my first appointment. We drew lots for assignments, and I had requested a new destroyer in the Pacific. I was assigned to the oldest ship in the Atlantic—[laughter]—the U.S.S. Wyoming, which was so dilapidated that because of safety purposes it was not permitted to come into Norfolk to tie up alongside the pier, but had to anchor in isolation in Hampton Roads. [Laughter]

We had a distinguished speaker, Admiral Chester Nimitz. As will be the case with you, I don't remember a word he said. [Laughter] My one hope was that the graduation services would be brief. As will be the case with you, I was disappointed. [Laughter]

And I have to confess with you in confidence that at the time I did not expect to come back here later as President of the United States.

Seven years later, I reluctantly left the Navy. But I can say in retrospect that the Naval Academy and my service in the U.S. Navy was good preparation for the career which I eventually chose.

I congratulate the members of the Class of 1978. Although your education from the perspective of an older person has just begun, you have laid the foundation for a career that can be as rewarding and as challenging as any in the world.

As officers in the modern Navy, you will be actors in a worldwide political and military drama. You will be called upon not only to master the technicalities of military science and military leadership but also to have a sensitive understanding of the international community within which the Navy operates.

Today I want to discuss one of the most important aspects of that international context—the relationship between the world's two greatest powers, the United States of America and the Soviet Union.

We must realize that for a very long time our relationship with the Soviet Union will be competitive. That competition is to be constructive if we are successful. Instead it could be dangerous and politically disastrous. Then our relationship must be cooperative as well.

We must avoid excessive swings in the public mood in our country—from euphoria when things are going well, to despair when they are not; from an exaggerated sense of compatibility with the Soviet Union, to open expressions of hostility.

Détente between our two countries is central to world peace. It's important for the world, for the American public, and for you as future leaders of the Navy to understand the complex and sensitive nature.

The word "détente" can be simplistically defined as "the easing of tension between nations." The word is in practice however, further defined by experience, as those nations evolve new means by which they can live with each other in peace.

To be stable, to be supported by the American people, and to be a basis for widening the scope of cooperation, then détente must be broadly defined and truly reciprocal. Both nations must exercise restraint in troubled areas and in troubled times. Both must honor meticulously those agreements which have already been reached to widen cooperation, naturally and mutually limit nuclear arms production, permit the free movement of people and the expression of ideas, and to protect human rights.

Neither of us should entertain the notion that military supremacy can be attained, or that transient military advantage can be politically exploited.

Our principal goal is to help shape a world which is more responsive to the desire of people everywhere for economic well-being, social justice, political self-determination, and basic human rights.

We seek a world of peace. But such a world must accommodate diversity—social, political, and ideological. Only then can there be a genuine cooperation among nations and among cultures.

We desire to dominate no one. We will continue to widen our cooperation with the positive new forces in the world.

We want to increase our collaboration with the Soviet Union, but also with the emerging nations, with the nations of Eastern Europe, and with the People's Republic of China. We are particularly dedicated to genuine self-determination and majority rule in those areas of the world where these goals have not yet been attained.

Our long-term objective must be to convince the Soviet Union of the advantages of cooperation and of the costs of disruptive behavior.

We remember that the United States and the Soviet Union were allies in the Second World War. One of the great historical accomplishments of the U.S. Navy was to guide and protect the tremendous shipments of armaments and supplies from our country to Murmansk and to other Soviet ports in support of a joint effort to meet the Nazi threat.

In the agony of that massive conflict, 20 million Soviet lives were lost. Millions more who live in the Soviet Union still recall the horror and the hunger of that time.

I'm convinced that the people of the Soviet Union want peace. I cannot believe that they could possibly want war.

Through the years, our Nation has sought accommodation with the Soviet Union, as demonstrated by the Austrian Peace Treaty, the Quadripartite Agreement concerning Berlin, the termination of nuclear testing in the atmosphere, joint scientific explorations in space, trade agreements, the antiballistic missile treaty, the interim agreement on strategic offensive armaments, and the limited test ban agreement.

Efforts still continue with negotiations toward a SALT II agreement, a comprehensive test ban against nuclear explosives, reductions in conventional arms transfers to other countries, the prohibition against attacks on satellites in space, an agreement to stabilize the level of force deployment in the Indian Ocean, and increased trade and scientific and cultural exchange. We must be willing to explore such avenues of cooperation despite the basic issues which divide us. The risks of nuclear war alone propel us in this direction.

The numbers and destructive potential of nuclear weapons has been increasing at an alarming rate. That is why a SALT agreement which enhances the security of both nations is of fundamental importance. We and the Soviet Union are negotiating in good faith almost every day, because we both know that a failure to succeed would precipitate a resumption of a massive nuclear arms race.

I'm glad to report to you today that the prospects for a SALT II agreement are good.

Beyond this major effort, improved trade and technological and cultural exchange are among the immediate benefits of cooperation between our two countries. However, these efforts to cooperate do not erase the significant differences between us.

What are these differences?

To the Soviet Union, détente seems to mean a continuing aggressive struggle for political advantage and increased influence in a variety of ways. The Soviet Union apparently sees military power and military assistance as the best means of expanding their influence abroad. Obviously, areas of instability in the world provide a tempting target for this effort, and all too often they seem ready to exploit any such opportunity.

As became apparent in Korea, in Angola, and also, as you know, in Ethiopia more recently, the Soviets prefer to use proxy forces to achieve their purposes.

To other nations throughout the world, the Soviet military buildup appears to be excessive, far beyond any legitimate requirement to defend themselves or to defend their allies. For more than 15 years, they have maintained this program of military growth, investing almost 15 percent of their total gross national product in armaments, and this sustained growth continues.

The abuse of basic human rights in their own country, in violation of the agreement which was reached at Helsinki, has earned them the condemnation of people everywhere who love freedom. By their actions, they've demonstrated that the Soviet system cannot tolerate freely expressed ideas or notions of loyal opposition and the free movement of peoples.

The Soviet Union attempts to export a totalitarian and repressive form of government, resulting in a closed society. Some of these characteristics and goals create problems for the Soviet Union.

Outside a tightly controlled bloc, the Soviet Union has difficult political relations with other nations. Their cultural bonds with others are few and frayed. Their form of government is becoming increasingly unattractive to other nations, so that even Marxist-Leninist groups no longer look on the Soviet Union as a model to be imitated.

Many countries are becoming very concerned that the nonaligned movement is being subverted by Cuba, which is obviously closely aligned with the Soviet Union and dependent upon the Soviets for economic sustenance and for military and political guidance and direction.

Although the Soviet Union has the second largest economic system in the world, its growth is slowing greatly, and its standard of living does not compare favorably with that of other nations at the same equivalent stage of economic development.

Agricultural production still remains a serious problem for the Soviet Union, so that in times of average or certainly adverse conditions for crop production, they must turn to us or turn to other nations for food supplies.

We in our country are in a much more favorable position. Our industrial base and our productivity are unmatched. Our scientific and technological capability is superior to all others. Our alliances with other free nations are strong and growing stronger, and our military capability is now and will be second to none.

In contrast to the Soviet Union, we are surrounded by friendly neighbors and wide seas. Our societal structure is stable and cohesive, and our foreign policy enjoys bipartisan public support, which gives it continuity.

We are also strong because of what we stand for as a nation: the realistic chance for every person to build a better life; protection by both law and custom from arbitrary exercise of government power; the right of every individual to speak out, to participate fully in government, and to share political power. Our philosophy is based on personal freedom, the most powerful of all ideas, and our democratic way of life warrants the admiration and emulation by other people throughout the world.

Our work for human rights makes us part of an international tide, growing in force. We are strengthened by being part of it.

Our growing economic strength is also a major political factor, potential influence for the benefit of others. Our gross national product exceeds that of all nine nations combined in the European Economic Community and is twice as great as that of the Soviet Union. Additionally, we are now learning how to use our resources more wisely, creating a new harmony between our people and our environment.

Our analysis of American military strength also furnishes a basis for confidence. We know that neither the United States nor the Soviet Union can launch a nuclear assault on the other without suffering a devastating counterattack which could destroy the aggressor nation. Although the Soviet Union has more missile launchers, greater throw-weight, and more continental air defense capabilities, the United States has more warheads, generally greater accuracy, more heavy bombers, a more balanced nuclear force, better missile submarines, and superior antisubmarine warfare capability.

A successful SALT II agreement will give both nations equal but lower ceilings on missile launchers and also on missiles with multiple warheads. We envision in SALT III an even greater mutual reduction in nuclear weapons.

With essential nuclear equivalence, relative conventional force strength has now become more important. The fact is that the military capability of the United States and its allies is adequate to meet any foreseeable threat.

It is possible that each side tends to exaggerate the military capability of the other. Accurate analyses are important as a basis for making decisions for the future. False or excessive estimates of Soviet strength or American weakness contributes to the effectiveness of the Soviet propaganda effort.

For example, recently alarming news reports of the military budget proposals for the U.S. Navy ignored the fact that we have the highest defense budget in history and that the largest portion of this will go to the Navy.

You men are joining a long tradition of superior leadership, seamanship, tactics, and ship design. And I'm confident that the U.S. Navy has no peer, no equal, on the high seas today, and that you, I, and others will always keep the Navy strong.

Let there be no doubt about our present and future strength. This brief assessment which I've just made shows that we need not be overly concerned about our ability to compete and to compete successfully. Certainly there is no cause for alarm. The healthy self-criticism and the free debate which are essential in a democracy should never be confused with weakness or despair or lack of purpose.

What are the principal elements of American foreign policy to the Soviet Union? Let me outline them very briefly.

We will continue to maintain equivalent nuclear strength, because we believe that in the absence of worldwide nuclear disarmament, such equivalency is the least threatening and the most stable situation for the world.

We will maintain a prudent and sustained level of military spending, keyed to a stronger NATO, more mobile forces, and undiminished presence in the Pacific. We and our allies must and will be able to meet any foreseeable challenge to our security from either strategic nuclear forces or from conventional forces. America has the capability to honor this commitment without excessive sacrifice on the part of our citizens, and that commitment to military strength will be honored.

Looking beyond our alliances, we will support worldwide and regional organizations which are dedicated to enhancing international peace, like the United Nations, the Organization of American States, and the Organization for African Unity.

In Africa we and our African friends want to see a continent that is free of the dominance of outside powers, free of the bitterness of racial injustice, free of conflict, and free of the burdens of poverty and hunger and disease. We are convinced that the best way to work toward these objectives is through affirmative policies that recognize African realities and that recognize aspirations.

The persistent and increasing military involvement of the Soviet Union and Cuba in Africa could deny this hopeful vision. We are deeply concerned about the threat to regional peace and to the autonomy of countries within which these foreign troops seem permanently to be stationed. That is why I've spoken up on this subject today. And this is why I and the American people will support African efforts to contain such intrusion, as we have done recently in Zaire.

I urge again that all other powers join us in emphasizing works of peace rather than the weapons of war. In their assistance to Africa, let the Soviet Union now join us in seeking a peaceful and a speedy transition to majority rule in Rhodesia and in Namibia. Let us see efforts to resolve peacefully the disputes in Eritrea and in Angola. Let us all work, not to divide and to seek domination in Africa, but to help those nations to fulfill their great potential.

We will seek peace, better communication and understanding, cultural and scientific exchange, and increased trade with the Soviet Union and with other nations.

We will attempt to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons among those nations not now having this capability.

We will continue to negotiate constructively and persistently for a fair strategic arms limitation agreement. We know that no ideological victories can be won by either side by the use of nuclear weapons.

We have no desire to link this negotiation for a SALT agreement with other competitive relationships nor to impose other special conditions on the process. In a democratic society, however, where public opinion is an integral factor in the shaping and implementation of foreign policy, we do recognize that tensions, sharp disputes, or threats to peace will complicate the quest for a successful agreement. This is not a matter of our preference but a simple recognition of fact.

The Soviet Union can choose either confrontation or cooperation. The United States is adequately prepared to meet either choice.

We would prefer cooperation through a détente that increasingly involves similar restraint for both sides; similar readiness to resolve disputes by negotiations, and not by violence; similar willingness to compete peacefully, and not militarily. Anything less than that is likely to undermine détente. And this is why I hope that no one will underestimate the concerns which I have expressed today.

A competition without restraint and without shared rules will escalate into graver tensions, and our relationship as a whole with the Soviet Union will suffer. I do not wish this to happen, and I do not believe that Mr. Brezhnev desires it. And this is why it is time for us to speak frankly and to face the problems squarely.

By a combination of adequate American strength, of quiet self-restraint in the use of it, of a refusal to believe in the inevitability of war, and of a patient and persistent development of all the peaceful alternatives, we hope eventually to lead international society into a more stable, more peaceful, and a more hopeful future.

You and I leave here today to do our common duty—protecting our Nation's vital interests by peaceful means if possible, by resolute action if necessary. We go forth sobered by these responsibilities, but confident of our strength. We go forth knowing that our Nation's goals—peace, security, liberty for ourselves and for others—will determine our future and that we together can prevail.

To attain these goals, our Nation will require exactly those qualities of courage, self-sacrifice, idealism, and self-discipline which you as midshipmen have learned here at Annapolis so well. That is why your Nation expects so much of you, and that is why you have so much to give.

I leave you now with my congratulations and with a prayer to God that both you and I will prove worthy of the task that is before us and the Nation which we have sworn to serve.

Thank you very much.

The address was broadcast live on radio and television.

Hospital Cost Containment Legislation

Statement by the President. June 7, 1978

Today the members of the House Commerce Committee will make their most important anti-inflation decision of this congressional session—whether to vote for a bill which will contain skyrocketing hospital costs. I urge the members of the committee to approve that bill and to work for congressional passage this year.

I proposed cost containment legislation last year to restrain rising hospital costs. These costs have been growing by about 17 percent a year—far faster than the rate of expansion in the economy as a whole.

The Congressional Budget Office estimates that the cost containment legislation now pending before the Commerce Committee will save at least $30 billion in hospital expenditures over the next 5 years. It will reduce Federal expenditures for Medicare and Medicaid by over $8 billion during this period.

Approval of this bill is essential for restraining health care costs. If the legislation I proposed last year had taken effect in October of 1977, our country would already have saved $2 billion in hospital costs by now. A vote against the bill is a vote against putting the brakes on runaway health inflation. A vote for this bill is a vote against inflation.

Powerful special interests will oppose any bill to fight inflation. This is certainly true for hospital cost containment, with intense lobbying against this needed legislation continuing up to the last minute. I am confident, however, that the members of the Commerce Committee will overcome these pressures and will take this crucial step to help all Americans fight skyrocketing hospital costs and rising inflation.

Community Investment Fund Program

Remarks at a White House Meeting on the Program. June 8, 1978

We have a very distinguished group here this morning, and I want to thank all of you for coming from different parts of the Nation, from different agencies in the Federal Government, representatives of the private lending sector, and representatives of volunteer groups, counties, cities, States.

When we evolved, with careful consultation among all of us, a new cohesive and, I think, adequate national urban policy, the main point we made was that it would be a new partnership, that the close working relationship and the consultation that evolved the policy itself would be continued in the future in its implementation.

One of the key elements of this partnership, which was, perhaps, not adequately emphasized at the time of the urban policy description to the public, is among the independent financial regulatory agencies in the Federal Government. And this morning, just for a few minutes, I'd like to outline some of the important progress that we have made already, and I hope this will be a basis for even greater future progress.

The Federal Home Loan Bank Board, under Bob McKinney's chairmanship, has evolved a $10 billion Community Investment Fund. This is derived from funds that are within the Federal Home Loan Bank system itself. These are not appropriations from Congress, but the effectiveness of them is just as great, perhaps even greater. Because they will be administered on a regional basis, there's a very tight-knit and effective administrative structure already in place in the private sector of our economy, and the knowledge of local needs is extensive and profound.

I'm very proud of this. These funds will be a supplement to normal moneys available for lending now. They will be concentrated on reinvestment in areas in our urban communities which are badly in need of stimulation, revitalization, of community beautification, financial consultation, the construction of low- and moderate-income housing. Just exactly what's needed in the extensive urban policy to reconstitute the vitality of our deteriorating neighborhoods in this country is what this fund will be used for. I'm very grateful for it, and I believe it will be a major step in the right direction.

I might say in addition that the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and others have combined already to eliminate the adverse consequences of redlining practices. This is a dampening policy on many areas of our Nation that need to be improved. And I think the coordinated study of the problem of redlining has resulted in a great step forward.

Lending institutions who don't want to see their loans lost, who want to minimize defaults, I think, have been adequately heard, and their voices have been part of a very major step toward minimizing redlining.

I'd also like to comment, in closing, on what other regulatory agencies are doing in the financial realm of our Nation. The Comptroller of the Currency has moved to implement a program, similar to the one I've just described, for the thrift institutions in the commercial banking community. The Federal Reserve Board Chairman, Bill Miller, has called publicly for increasing the number of minority citizens, women, representatives of consumer groups, labor, on the boards of the regional Federal banks. And in the Federal Reserve System, this will be a very constructive move. I think that it won't reduce the substantiality and the conservatism and the caution with which our banking system is run. But I think much more enlightened, much more progressive, I think much more sound loan policies can evolve if there's a clearer understanding among those who shape policy of the needs for people who in the past have been excluded.

As you know, Bill Miller has also called for the construction of any new buildings to be located in the areas that are served and which sometimes are tending toward deterioration because they are ignored in the rapid move toward suburbs and more rapidly growing areas. Quite often, the stability of neighborhoods that are in danger of deterioration has been threatened because the very institutions designed to help them move their centers of concentrated attention and presence away. And I think that this is also a step in the right direction.

The Chairman of the Federal Deposit Insurance Commission [Corporation], FDIC, has also evolved a new policy to check compliance with fair housing standards and to emphasize consumer protection. And all these efforts are in consonance, one with another.

Credit unions, in some instances, are badly needed in the neighborhoods that are foremost among those that create concern. An administrator of the National Credit Union Administration is now attempting to analyze on a nationwide basis those communities that can profit from credit unions and institute chapters there which might be both a stabilizing and a constructive step forward.

So, this morning we are very pleased at the Federal Home Loan Bank Board's making available to the public a supplementary opportunity for $10 billion in new loans, and I'm also very thankful that the other regulatory agencies concerned with the financial structure of our country are cooperating as enthusiastically as they can.

We've only had a few weeks, as you know, since the urban policy was revealed. And this progress that we have outlined this morning—I hope it will be just first steps in a concerted, sustained, sometimes even nonpublicized effort to make our Nation a greater one than it already is and to make sure that our urban policy is successful because of the new partnership to which I, as President of our country, am totally committed.

Thank you very much.

Department of State

Nomination of Viron P. Vaky To Be an Assistant Secretary. June 8, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Viron P. Vaky, of Corpus Christi, Tex., to be Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs. Vaky would replace Terence A. Todman, who has been appointed Ambassador to Spain. The President also announced that he will nominate Vaky to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Inter-American Foundation.

Vaky was born September 13, 1926, in Corpus Christi. He received a B.S.F.S. from Georgetown University in 1947 and an M.A. from the University of Chicago in 1948. He served in the U.S. Army from 1944 to 1946.

Vaky joined the Foreign Service in 1949 and served in Guayaquil, Buenos Aires, Bogotá, and at the State Department. From 1964 to 1967, he was Deputy Chief of Mission in Guatemala, and in 1967 and 1968, he was on the Planning and Coordination Staff at the State Department.

In 1968 and 1969, Vaky was Deputy Assistant Secretary, then acting Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs. He was on the National Security Council in 1969 and 1970. From 1970 to 1972, he was diplomat in residence at Georgetown University.

Vaky served as Ambassador to Costa Rica from 1972 to 1974 and Ambassador to Colombia from 1974 to 1976. Since 1976 he has been Ambassador to Venezuela.

Advisory Council on Historic Preservation

Appointment of James W. Haas as a Member. June 8, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of James W. Haas, of San Francisco, as a member of the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation for a term expiring in 1983.

Haas, 36, is an attorney with the San Francisco firm of Graham & James. Since 1973 he has been vice president and director of the Foundation for the Preservation of San Francisco's Architectural Heritage.

Anti-Inflation Policy

Remarks on the Administration's Anti-Inflation Policy. June 8, 1978

The most serious problem that our Nation has is inflation, and it's getting worse. It's absolutely imperative that Americans commit themselves, all of us, to a common sacrifice to control this rapid increase in prices.

I don't think it's going to be effective to ask other Americans to join in this effort for their own benefit unless the Congress, the President, and the entire Federal Government is willing to set an example here in Washington.

The Congress is now considering, for instance, legislation to control hospital costs. There has been an enormous increase in profits by people who own and operate private hospitals. Costs have been going up 17 percent a year, more than twice as rapidly as the cost of other products and services in our country.

Because of these enormous profits, lobbying pressures on the Congress are also enormous. But this is a tangible effort that, if successful by the Congress, can save consumers in our country, those who need medical care, $30 billion in the next 5 years, and can save in Federal expenditures billions of dollars in the cost of Medicaid and Medicare.

The budget that I submitted to Congress that was prepared last November and December has a deficit of about $60 billion. We've cut it down now to $53 billion by proposing a lower tax reduction. It's still too high. And still, there's pressure in Congress to increase spending unnecessarily.

I'd like to give one example. In education, we had a 24-percent increase in the educational budget in the proposed expenditures for next year compared to the current year. Still, the Congress wants to increase this more. In basic opportunity grants for college students, we advocated an increase of 47 percent as an alternative to tax credits for tuition. That's a $1.1 billion increase. Now the Congress wants to add several hundred million dollars more, completely excessive and threatening to unbalance the budget even further.

In defense spending, we had a $126 billion budget, the highest in history, carefully planned by me, the Defense Department leaders, and others. The Congress—the House has now voted to build a nuclear aircraft carrier which is not needed and which will cost $2½ billion.

We presently have a great shortage of beef in our country. Because of this shortage, which is going to continue for the next 3 or 4 years, beef prices already this year, since the first of January, have increased more than 35 percent. We have a lasting shortage of lean beef, used primarily for hamburger, and which is to be mixed with the trimmings from the fat cattle produced in our own country.

The Secretary of Agriculture has decided to negotiate to permit carefully controlled, modest increases in beef imports over the next year or so. This will not change the price of fat cattle at all. It will certainly not hurt the farmers who produce beef, but it will be a great help to consumers.

Another administrative decision that is being made now is in OSHA, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration. We want to control cotton dust in textile mills. Originally in 1976, a proposal was made to do this that cost $2.7 billion in investments of about $600 million a year. We've now worked out, after very careful planning and cooperation, a way to control this threat to the health of workers in textile mills, but with a greatly reduced overall cost.

The point I'm making is that there is not just one single action that can be taken or avoided to control inflation. It covers literally dozens, even hundreds of individual decisions made by me, the Congress, and the private sector of our economy. It absolutely must be done. It's not easy to go against hospitals, to go against doctors, to go against students, to go against farmers, to go against veterans, to go against the building of highways or the building of nuclear aircraft carriers. But someone has to hold the line on the budget, and I'm determined to do so. This is one of the most important and difficult decisions that we'll have to make, and there are literally hundreds of decisions to be made. And I call upon the Congress to join in with me to avoid a series of vetoes that will create disharmony in our Government.

I call on the private sector to join in and not mount intense lobbying efforts to control some privilege that they have in setting unnecessarily high prices. And I will do my part. I believe the American people will understand the need for it, and I'm perfectly willing to take the political consequences when people are dissatisfied with the requirement of having to make some modest sacrifice of their own.

This afternoon, Bob Strauss and Bob Bergland will explain some specific actions that we have been taking and will be taking. And I believe that it is important for the American people to understand that this is a great challenge to us, but it's extremely important. And I believe that there will be approbation or approval among American people if we adhere to the principles that I've described briefly this afternoon.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 3:35 p.m. to reporters assembled in the Briefing Room at the White House. Following his remarks, Secretary of Agriculture Bob Bergland and Ambassador Robert S. Strauss, Special Representative for Trade Negotiations, held a news conference on the increases in beef imports.

New York City Financing Legislation

Statement on House Action Approving Guarantee Legislation. June 8, 1978

I am extremely gratified by the responsible action of the House of Representatives in approving guarantee legislation which will assist New York City in meeting its financing needs.

I believe that the overwhelming House majority reflects its awareness of the progress that the city has made, as well as its recognition that the city's financing problems require a permanent solution.

It is my strong view that the enactment of the legislation supported by the administration is the appropriate course to avert long-term Federal dependency and restore New York to financing self-sufficiency.

National Council of Senior Citizens

Remarks at the National Council's Convention. June 9, 1978

Good morning. My good friend Nelson Cruikshank and I rode over together, and he described to me the history of this remarkable organization. I want to say to Jim Carbray that I'm very grateful to be here to speak to you this morning from the perspective of the President of our great country.

A while back I got a letter from a very young student who said, "Mr. Carter, you have been in office for a few months now. Would you rather be President or a real person?" [Laughter]

As I prepared to come over here this morning, I thought about that, because quite often the same thing could be said about those who have retired. "Would you rather be a retired citizen or a real person?" And the essence of our relationship with one another, as the leader of our country, and as an outstanding member of our society, President on the one hand, you on the other, is that we are real people. We relate to one another as individuals. We are different from one another. And there is no automatic, sharp transition in a person at the time of retirement. You're not one person the day before retirement; you're not a different person the day after.

And what I'd like to say this morning is that our country recognizes the tremendous contribution that all of you collectively have made. We've not always repaid that debt adequately. But at the same time, in the repayment of that debt, in the repair of oversights, we must remember the individuality of human beings, even those who have reached retirement age.

We've made a lot of progress in the last 15 months or so, 17 months. Nelson

Cruikshank has been at my right hand every time I've made a major decision about any matter in the Federal Government, constantly reminding me how this decision might affect those who have reached the status of senior citizenship in our country.

We've undertaken and successfully resolved one of the major problems, and that is to make sure that social security is sound, that it does not go bankrupt, and that it will retain that status for the rest of the lives of everyone who's in this room.

Just as a short while ago I was campaigning throughout the country, as some of you remember, for 2 years, and I would make a short 15-minute speech, and I would answer questions. And almost invariably the first question that came from a senior citizen would be, "What is going to happen to the social security system?" And I think it's good for us to look back on what the Congress has done in a very courageous way, because there have been intense pressures put on the Congress not to take action to protect the social security system, but then after the bill was passed, to undo what had been done.

And I would like to ask all of you to take the time in the next week to write your Member of Congress a note and say, "I'm not just demanding that you do something in the future, I want to thank you for what you did last year," because this would help them so much to recognize that their action, courageous as it was, was also needed and is also appreciated by you.

As you well know, we have also taken action within the last year to remove the mandatory retirement age, to let this be a decision made by American citizens themselves and not by an arbitrary imposition of regulations in the Federal Government. And we are moving to remove that restraint in the private sector as well, so that productive Americans will not have to retire until you and they are ready to do so, a major step in the right direction.

I think you know that [Representative] Claude Pepper is here, and he worked on this for years and years very successfully. Thank you, Claude.

I'm not going to outline for you a record of all the action that the Congress has taken in the last year and a half or that I have taken through administrative action or that the different heads of departments have taken. But I want to point not just to the past but to the future.

We have some major challenges ahead of us. We've evolved now a clear description of what a comprehensive urban policy ought to be, how to deal with deteriorating neighborhoods, how to make sure that American people have a chance to live a fruitful and enjoyable and a secure life. Because if there are three characteristics that are mandatory for any of us, no matter how young or how old we might be, first of all, it's to be secure, to recognize that our home, our community, our very lives, our property are protected financially and physically.

The second thing we want is to have a chance to expand our lives, to have a bigger heart to encompass new friends, to have a bigger mind to learn more about the world that God gave us. And the educational process ought not to stop when we graduate from college or even when we start a new career or when we finish a new career, because there are people in their seventies and eighties, as you know, who still have a dynamic approach, not just to today but to tomorrow. And that is an element that needs to be emphasized in our lives.

We have a challenge before us in the financial structure of our country, and you can help play a major role in shaping the policies of our Nation.

The most serious problem that I have, the most serious challenge that faces us, is to control inflation. It's bad; it's getting worse; and it's going to require some sacrifice on the part of American people.

One of the most serious threats is in the rapidly escalating cost of hospital care. The Congress is now facing another very difficult decision. As you know, the profits of privately owned hospitals have been leaping year by year. The costs of hospital care have been going up 17 percent annually, doubling every 5 years, much greater than the costs of the goods and services they have to pay for in providing medical care.

We have a very close vote coming up in the House Commerce Committee soon. It's going to be a difficult vote on the House floor, the same thing in the Senate, because there are tremendous profits involved and tremendously effective lobbying efforts being made not to do anything to interfere with the rapid costs of hospital care. Quite often medical doctors own part of the hospitals themselves. And patients are put in the hospital quite often when they can very well be served with outpatient care or a shorter stay in the hospital.

Services are provided quite often that are not needed. There's a much greater incidence of long-term hospital care, surgery, in the Northeast than there is in the South or the West. And we are trying to do everything we can to control these heavy burdens on retired people particularly, who quite often have to pay for a major portion of their health care. And we need your help in this respect.

We want to protect consumers. We want to have a good tax program, and I particularly appreciate your good help in this respect. If our tax reform proposals can go to the Congress—and again, it's a very tough battle—a million present retired taxpayers will have to pay zero income tax. In addition to that, the tax system will be simpler and also much more fair. If we can get hospital cost containment passed through the Congress, it will lay a good groundwork to implement our commitment for a comprehensive national health care system. You can help with this as well.

I would like to make an additional appeal to you. I recognize that in an organization like yours, there are many strong and dedicated voices and that one of your primary responsibilities is to protect the special needs of retired American citizens. But I've been particularly impressed with you in your willingness to broaden your interests and your influence and your contributions to cover the whole scale of issues that are important to American people of all ages.

You have helped me, for instance, with the Panama Canal Treaty vote, a very difficult political undertaking, the most difficult political assignment I have ever had, even including my campaign for the Presidency itself. And when I asked for your help to strengthen the reputation of our own country as the protector of human rights, to make sure that we had an image that was accurate in Latin America and around the world of treating other people as equals, of trying to strengthen our ties with the small, weak, developing nations, to be fair in dealing with the small nation of Panama, you added your strength and your support and your voice to a proposition that doesn't directly help you with your income or with your life, perhaps, as an American citizen. But because you wanted our Nation to be great in all respects, you came forward and gave me your support. And I know that you're doing the same thing to support our efforts to have a SALT agreement, to remove the threat of nuclear war from the world.

You are strengthening our effort here and in other parts of the world for human rights. You're interested in having a comprehensive energy bill passed through the Congress. And there are many other aspects of American life that apply across the board to all our citizens for which you have dedicated your influence, your time, and your very unselfish commitment. This, I believe, in the long run will greatly strengthen the influence of the National Council of Senior Citizens. And this, I believe, will give an image to the rest of the country, an accurate image of how unselfish you really are.

I want to be sure that all of you live not only a secure life, one dedicated to constant education and expansion of your minds and hearts that I've already described, but one that is productive. There is no reason why someone who has finished a business or professional career can't live an even greater, broader, more productive life when the years of retirement arrive. You have much greater flexibility in making your own decisions. You have more free time to broaden your interests and your influence. And this can be the kindling of an expansive life for every one of you.

The fact that you have saved up and earned enough money to come here to this convention is an indication that you already agree with me. But I would like to ask you in the future to continue this great contribution that you are already demonstrating as part of your lives, not on a national basis, not even to come to Washington for an exciting meeting of your own, but where you live. Whether you've retired and gone to California or Florida or Arizona or Georgia, or whether you've decided to stay with your own families and friends, there is an opportunity for greatly expanded service that I know will appeal to each one of you.

There is a chance to serve those who are mentally ill. It doesn't take professional training in medicine to volunteer your services to go into the centers in the community or to work with individuals to make sure that they have a chance to know that their lives are significant, that they're appreciated, that they're understood. This is important to them. It's important to you.

As you look around you in your own community, there are many people, many families much less fortunate than you are. They may not speak English very well. They may not have been in this country very long. All of our ancestors almost were in the same circumstance in years gone by.

There may be a time when they don't feel that they have a single staunch, dependable friend in the community. And it would not be difficult for you through your labor organizations, through your churches, through your civic commitments, to identify a particular family. You may not ever be thanked for it, but you could go and visit that family, get to know the father, the mother—they're retired people perhaps—the children that have problems with the law or in school, and just let them know that you are their friend. And if they do have a problem with the educational system, you could learn what it is, and with your own influence, with your own status in the community, go to the education officials and say, "I know that these poor people who live near me don't have the same opportunity that my children have had or that I had or that most do have." And you could be a voice for a single family; in the process, greatly expand your understanding of people who were deprived and are deprived in our society today.

There is an opportunity through volunteer work for you in effect to adopt as a friend some person who has been in prison, perhaps a young person who's now been paroled or placed on probation. Quite often the reasons for their earlier crime is that they are alienated from society. They don't have an access to the stable part, the productive part, the enlightened part of the American community. And working with qualified officials, you could say, "Let me be responsible as kind of a big brother or a big sister just for one person, and I'll try to understand what I can do for them."

Your community, whether it's a very small town like where I lived or the largest cities in the world, need help on a voluntary basis for repairing some of the deteriorating conditions of it. When you go back home, I would hope that you would look around your community with a quizzical eye, a critical eye, and say, "What could I do to make my community a more pleasant place to live? What can I do to make it more beautiful?" And it wouldn't take but four or five people to make a real impact on an entire community or city.

If one block in a deteriorated neighborhood, or sometimes even one house in a block, was beautified by your effort or perhaps your organization, it could set an example that would make the neighbors kind of ashamed and sweep an entire area with a recommitment to be proud of where one lives.

Teachers aides are needed, and I think one of the particular things that you can do as natural leaders, demonstrated by your presence here, is to look among your own peer group, other retired citizens who might be more timid, not well educated, not in good mental or physical health, not quite so affluent as perhaps some of you, and say, "What can I do to expand my own beneficial influence among those like myself who have reached the age of retirement and don't have as vigorous a life and as productive a life as I've carved out for myself?"

I'd like to add one other point that I think is important, and that is that many of you are fully qualified to have an extensive, continuing career. On the way over here in the car, I thought about a few people that have been very impressive to me and very helpful to me. I've already mentioned Nelson Cruikshank, who is working full time, putting in as many hours and is as productive as anyone in the Federal Government.

Esther Peterson, on my staff, far beyond the so-called retirement age, has certainly not retired. And she has shaped the consciousness of a President, and she's shaping the consciousness of a Congress. And four or five times a week, she leaves Washington to go to a major convention or major urban center to spell out the need to protect consumers against being cheated or robbed in the American free enterprise system. She works closely with the heads of major businesses. And this has given a new life and a new stimulus to the entire consumer movement.

I talked about the Panama Canal Treaty earlier. Ellsworth Bunker, a man, I believe, in his eighties, for the last 13 or 14 years, calling upon his superb mind, his sound judgment, his clear ability to analyze a complicated issue, and his good negotiating capabilities, has hammered out an agreement mutually beneficial to Panama and to the United States.

Averell Harriman is a man who's still a senior counselor for me, who understands the special character and consciousness and attitudes and beliefs of the Soviet Union, who knows their leaders, who knows the leaders in Great Britain, in Yugoslavia, and China. And when I have a very difficult decision to make in foreign affairs, I turn to him and say, "Governor Harriman, what do you think we ought to do in this situation?" These are the kind of people who mean a lot to me.

And I can't go down the list without commenting on two people that, perhaps among all those who presently live, have had the most impact on my life. One of them is Admiral Hyman Rickover. This year he's 77 years old, still dynamic, vigorous, aggressive. He is the man among all those who live on Earth who had the clearest picture of what peaceful use of atomic power could do for the world. And as a young naval officer, I worked under him, and he helped to shape my life. He still feels accurately that what he's doing as a full-time professional naval officer is helpful to our country.

Two days ago, I made a speech at the U.S. Naval Academy. Admiral Rickover is a graduate of there, as am I. And I, as a matter of courtesy, called up Admiral Rickover and asked him to ride over with me on the helicopter to sit there with me while I made my speech. He said, "Mr. President, I'll do anything that you order me to do, but," he said, "I believe that my work for the U.S. Government and the Navy is much more important than going over to listen to you speak." And this is typical of his attitude and his commitment and his competence.

And the last person I would like to mention is a former Peace Corps volunteer whom I know quite well, my mother, Lillian Carter.

Mother was born in 1898. And my father died when mother was almost 60. She had been a registered nurse. And it was a very good opportunity for her to retire. She would have had a pleasant life in a small town, but after 2 or 3 months, my mother began to see opportunities for involvement in local and statewide and regional and then national and international affairs that stretched her mind and stretched her heart.

At this time, she's a younger person than I am. And never does a day go by that mother doesn't get up in the morning, as do many of you, and say "What can I do this day to make my life more meaningful, to show other people that I care for them, and to learn more about the world in which I live?"

She's a very aggressive person. She speaks her own mind, and I might say that not only the President but other people listen. And she will soon be going over to Italy to receive an award for the person who's done the most, in their opinion, for alleviating world hunger and for demonstrating to people in the more wealthy nations that there are deprived people on Earth who need a helping hand and an open heart.

She'll be coming back through the Sahara region of Africa, if her present plans go well, visiting perhaps several countries there, a part of the world that at the present time, because of drought, is perhaps the most poverty stricken and hungry in all the Earth.

Well, I could go on and on, naming many of you assembled in this audience. But the point I want to make is that your ability and your talents and your sound experience and your judgment and your political influence are a resource in this country that we cannot afford to waste.

I need you, the Nation needs you, and I would like to ask all of you, in closing, not to dwell upon the past, but to look to the future with a bright and open heart, not just thinking about ourselves but thinking about and supporting the principles and the greatness of America, the country that we all love.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:02 a.m. in the International Ballroom at the Washington Hilton Hotel. In his opening remarks, he referred to Nelson Cruikshank, Counsellor to the President on Aging, and James Carbray, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

Father's Day, 1978

*Proclamation 4574. June 9, 1978By the President of the United States of AmericaA Proclamation

Today's fathers face new challenges as America changes. In addition to their traditional role as breadwinner for the family, many fathers are playing a greater role in raising children and in the home. The preservation of America's family structure will, in large measure, depend upon their ability to meet these demands.

To honor our Nation's fathers, and to provide an opportunity to reflect upon their contributions to our society, the Congress, by joint resolution of April 24, 1972 (86 Stat. 124; 36 U.S.C. 142a), has asked the President to issue annually a proclamation calling upon the American people to observe the third Sunday in June of each year as Father's Day.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby request that Sunday, June 18, 1978, be observed as Father's Day. I direct Government officials to display the flag of the United States on all Government buildings on that day and I urge all citizens to display the flag at their homes and other suitable places.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this ninth day of June, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

Government in the Sunshine Act*Memorandum From the President.
June 9, 1978Memorandum for the Heads of Departments and Agencies*

Subject: "The Government in the Sunshine" Act: Implementation

The Government in the Sunshine Act requires certain Executive agencies to give notice of their business meetings and open them to public observation unless they must be closed for any of ten specific reasons. If the agency finds that the public interest requires, it must open its meeting to public observation even if there is a reason to close it. The same reasons which permit Executive agencies to close their meetings also permit advisory committees to close theirs.

To evaluate compliance with this Act, I have asked the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to record the number of meetings subject to the Act, to note whether those meetings are open or closed, and if closed, to state the reason for closing them. He will pass this information along to me and to the Congress, recommending whatever actions may be appropriate to meet the spirit as well as the letter of the law.

In litigation under the Act, the Attorney General and the affected agencies must not defend the closing of any meeting unless they can demonstrate that harm would have resulted if an open meeting had been held.

I urge the agencies covered by the Sunshine Act to respect it by opening to the public as many meetings as possible.

United States Metric Board

Nomination of Bruce P. Johnson To Be a Member. June 9, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Bruce P. Johnson, of Reno, Nev., to be a member of the United States Metric Board for a 2-year term.

Johnson, 39, is an associate professor of electrical engineering at the University of Nevada. He is a specialist in solid state electronics and devices.

Washington Bullets Basketball Team

*Remarks at a White House Reception.
June 9, 1978*

[Laughter]

I wish I had thought of that during the 1976 campaign. [Laughter] There were a lot of times during 1976 when I thought the ballgame might be over, at least other people did. But I knew the fat lady had to sing.

Well, it's a great honor for me as President of a wonderful country to share the honor and glory by standing on the same stage with a group of men and their supporters and women who have exhibited superb courage, because I think it's accurate to say that at the beginning of the season, most commentators, most analysts didn't think they could win the division championship. I really wish that they could have done it without beating Atlanta, but—[laughter—because Atlanta has gone more than 42 years without a championship.

But it is a great pleasure for me to have all of you here and Wes, and Mr. Pollin, and all of the team. I've been cautioned not to single out any particular player, because I think one of the things that made this remarkable success possible is the fact that it was not built upon a single person. There are obviously stars, and there are obviously those who show that they are the most valuable player in a particular game or even in the great series. But what made this tremendous victory possible for the Bullets is the fact that it was a team effort. And I think that's the basis of a sound, unconquerable spirit that bound them all together.

The team was not fragmented or driven apart by jealousy, nor by an excessive desire for personal recognition. But all the way through there was a realization that only through a common effort and a team effort could this remarkable victory be successful.

The last time Washington had a champion was when Franklin Roosevelt was President. And this is really a hope that I might have brought good luck to Washington. [Laughter]

In my desire to be fair, I might say that I have a great respect for Seattle. I know you all do also. And at least Seattle has a racehorse named after them—[laughter—so they have something to compensate for it.

But I want to express my admiration on the part of the whole United States for the remarkable achievement that the Bullets represent. And I know that everyone in our country, no matter what basketball team they may have supported at the beginning of the season, share my admiration and my appreciation for this remarkable achievement.

So, thank you for letting me be part of it and thank you for being such wonderful men, such wonderful leaders, such wonderful sportsmen, such a wonderful representation of what our country is.

Thank you again.

BOB FERRY. Mr. President, on behalf of the team and the entire Bullet organization, [it is] a great deal of honor to present a basketball to the President of the United States. This is unreal. [Laughter]

MR. MOTTA. Mr. President, I just want to say one thing. I saw your picture this morning on the front page of the paper, catching a Frisbee. And you were so athletic looking, and we had our draft today—I told Bob Ferry to draft you No. 2.

THE PRESIDENT. It's a real honor for me also to welcome back Larry O'Brien. He helped to make the White House and the Presidential administration a subject of admiration when he was here. His relationship to a great President, John Kennedy, and the superb work he did to tie together the White House and the Congress has set a standard for all those who came afterwards. And I know that he has contributed just as much in dealing with the National Basketball Association, and I'm honored just to have Larry O'Brien a good friend of mine, and I'm sure a good friend of yours—although you may not always recognize it. [Laughter]

So, Larry O'Brien.

MR. O'BRIEN. Thank you, Mr. President. And I want to simply express the thanks of the National Basketball Association for all of us for the high honor of being here with you today and Mrs. Carter. It's a great privilege.

It's 10 years ago since I was in this building; I walked in here today for the first time in 10 years. And I spent 8 very interesting, sometimes frustrating, as you understand, but good years here some time ago. So, thank you very much on behalf of all of us in the world of basketball for your kindness, you and Mrs. Carter, in having us here today. Thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 5:10 p.m. in the East Room at the White House. In his remarks, he referred to Wesley Unseld, player, and Abe Pollin, owner, Washington Bullets. Bob Ferry is general manager of the team, and Lawrence F. O'Brien, former Special Assistant to President Kennedy, is commissioner of the National Basketball Association.

Interview With the President

*Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session
With a Group of Editors and News Directors.
June 9, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. I apologize for interrupting your meeting. [Laughter]

What I'd like to do very briefly is to outline some of the questions that face me at this moment that are both time-consuming and also of importance to our country, and then spend what time we have available answering your questions.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES

I think the overriding concern that I have is about inflation. It's very bad, getting worse. And I don't think yet we've marshaled an adequate degree of support in the Congress or around the Nation to join in a concerted effort to control this threat to the economic structure and stability of our country.

Whenever a tangible, specific effort is made to control inflation, it always touches a very powerful constituency group, sometimes quite benevolent in nature, sometimes, perhaps, otherwise.

I think the primary thing that the Congress can do this year in positive legislation is to pass the hospital cost containment bill. We've seen hospital costs go up almost like a skyrocket the last few years and profits along with it.

The average costs have gone up about 17 percent per year, which is between two and three times as much as the average increase in costs for services and supplies that the hospitals have to buy.

As you know, many of these hospitals are tightly controlled, both by private investors, also by medical doctors who supply the patients for them and who determine the level of care to be derived. And I think that some control over these costs is imperative. The lobbying effort against this legislation is formidable, and the issue is in doubt.

We are also trying to provide some mechanism by which we can control and make the Federal bureaucracy more effective, to manage it better. We have civil service reform legislation before the Congress, also reorganization plans. The difference is that the legislation requires positive action by Congress.

The reorganization plan goes into effect automatically if the Congress doesn't take adverse action within 60 days. I think we have a fairly good prospect for getting this passed. It will give the very fine, competent, dedicated, loyal, sometimes self-sac-official, public employees a chance to perform their work better. We could recognize excellence of performance and dedication and also have more flexibility in making their jobs more effective for the Government. If there are instances of inadequate performance, it gives us a chance to chastise or discharge that employee or transfer him to a more productive position.

We have taken some administrative actions. We've been considering for quite a long time now, several years in fact, how to control cotton dust in the air and textile mills. And I think we've now worked out a very good compromise position which still adheres strictly to the proposition that workers ought to be protected from cotton dust levels and at the same time would have a minimal adverse economic impact on the textile industry, which is already under severe strain from excessive imports.

So, we're getting into the regulatory business with inflation impact a major factor. But we're very desperately trying—and I think we will succeed—in not endangering workers' health, not endangering the quality of our environment on environmental standards, and trying to get the Government as much as possible out of the role of unwarranted regulation of the private enterprise system.

We've gotten good support and cooperation from business and labor. As you know, the Retail Clerks (Union)<sup>1</sup> the other day endorsed our deceleration plan. Several of the major industries in our country have done so, General Motors, A. T. & T., and so forth, volunteering to hold down executive salary increases and also to have their prices be less in this year than they were on an average for the last 2 years, the price increases.

I've taken administrative action yesterday to renegotiate beef import levels, which I think is very important to our country. We have a shortage of lean beef in particular. And in order to market existing trimmings from our very fat beef that we grow in our country, in grain-fed cattle, we need to have this importation of lean beef.

So, the State Department, working with the Agriculture Department, will negotiate to get an increased level of lean beef imports. This will help the consumers; it won't hurt the American farmers, because there is a worldwide shortage of livestock now—in particular, beef.

The other point I'd like to make is a general one, and that is we are going to have to hold the line on the budget. And I presented a very adequate budget to the Congress, prepared back in November and December, when the prospect of inflation was not nearly so alarming. The Congress has been inclined to take these adequate proposals and expand them considerably over a broad range of interests—education, labor, defense, agriculture, transportation, health, and so forth. And this has got to be controlled.

And I believe that you can see the necessity for me to deal firmly with the overall impact of inflation, because if I don't, I don't think anyone will. And I think any one of these proposals, if examined alone, could be justified: increased spending for transportation, increased spending for defense, increased spending for the handicapped, increased spending for college student aid programs, increased spending for agriculture, and so forth.

Briefly, on foreign matters, we are still working toward some settlement of the Mideast dispute. I will be delivering or exchanging the treaty documents with Panama next weekend, the Panama Canal Treaty.

We are negotiating on a daily basis with the Soviet Union on a SALT II agreement. I think the prospects, as I said a couple of days ago, are good. We have narrowed down the difference to a very small number of items, still very significant. We don't see the end in sight yet.

The comprehensive test ban negotiations between ourselves, the Soviet Union, and Great Britain are making good progress. We've just recently initiated talks with the Soviet Union on two important items. One is to limit the sale of conventional weapons to other countries, and the other one is to prohibit the attack on peaceful satellites by either the Soviets or us or to develop that capability.

We are quite concerned about Africa. Our Nation has had a late-blooming interest in Africa. I think it's true that 2 or 3 years ago we had very little interest there. But we have strengthened our ties of friendship, trade, understanding, communication with many of the African leaders who in the past looked on our Nation with great concern or distrust. I think this is a step in the right direction.

And, of course, we had a notable success last week in putting together a very strong recommitment of our Nation to the support of NATO. And our allies in that fine organization have reaffirmed their commitment to providing strength. I believe that only through a strong national defense posture can we have enough sense of security among American people to give us a flexibility to negotiate reduction in arms levels on a mutual basis or to deal with our allies with a sense of mutual commitment and partnership.

Well, these are just a few of the items. I could list a dozen or so more. But I think I would prefer to take what time we have available answering your questions.

QUESTIONS

MAYOR RICHARD G. HATCHER OF GARY;
PETER F. FLAHERTY

Q. Mr. President, my name is Dennis Schatzman, Pittsburgh Courier. My question is two-fold. One, Mayor Hatcher's recent refusal to accept the position within the White House as one of your advisers raises the question, what is the problem that people like Mayor Hatcher and other notable blacks are refusing this position? Is it because of the fact that they are not satisfied with the amount of power and accessibility that they want in reference to you? If that's the case, what is it they want, and why can't they get it?

And part two, your friend Peter Flaherty is running for Governor in my State and has a very bad image in the black part of Pittsburgh, his native Pittsburgh. If he asked you to come in and campaign for him, would you, for instance, go into the black community and support him? And if you would, what kind of way would you posture yourself in an atmosphere that's quite hostile to Mr. Flaherty?

THE PRESIDENT. To answer your last question first, I would be glad to help Pete Flaherty in any way I could if he requested it, either I or the members of the Cabinet or the Vice President or my wife or family. I think Pete did a good job as mayor; I know him very well. He was occupying one of the most difficult positions in the Nation, that is, the mayor of a major city. And I saw the progress that was made in Pittsburgh. I don't claim that he could meet the needs of all the constituency groups to their satisfaction.

I've also been able to observe Pete Flaherty as he performed as a Deputy Attorney General responsible for the administration and enforcement of the laws of our country, and he performed superbly in protecting minority interests and in every way that could be examined or cross-examined by black groups or any other. So, my confidence in him is very high.

We've not talked to anybody about coming to the White House except Mayor Hatcher. And the first time I ever met him and as far as I ever went with him was to explore the possibility of his coming in in a very tentative way. We didn't offer him a position; he did not refuse it. When I first talked to him on an exploratory basis, he said that he would like to come very much, he would enjoy working here.

He had complete confidence in our administration, which he's repeated since then. But he had obligations in Gary that he didn't think he could leave. And also the legislature there has passed a recent law saying that if he did leave, his successor would not be chosen on an open election basis, but they would be appointed by Democratic precinct chairmen or some sort of an arrangement where the political structure that has been his political enemies in the past would choose his successor. Now, those were the reasons that he gave me.

So, you said a series of blacks have refused to serve. I don't know of any black leader who's refused to serve, because we've only talked to Mayor Hatcher and I've described the essence of the conversation.

MAINE INDIAN LAND CLAIMS

Q. Mr. President, I'm Don Snyder from Bar Harbor Times in Bar Harbor, Maine. You were in Maine recently and addressed a town meeting, at which time I felt you demonstrated a sincere concern for the Maine Indians. As you know, we're having a sticky negotiation with two Indian tribes in Maine now that are claiming ownership of a considerable portion of land and some damages and trespass as well.

Some of the political leaders in Maine today are saying that Maine citizens should not accept a resolution to this problem that is not wholly Federal. In other words, they should not accept a resolution that involves any Maine land or Maine dollars. And insofar as this case might be a harbinger to other cases across the country, would you care to comment about that?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, there's no way that I could comment any further than I did when I was in Maine, and I expressed my position very clearly then. In my opinion, the proposal that was worked out between the Justice Department, the Interior Department, the Indians, and some of the private interests—and with no participation much by the State, because they would not participate; they were invited to do so—I thought was quite reasonable.

Judge Gunter, a distinguished jurist, was the referee, in effect, who made a proposal, and I think that it's a very fair one to the Indians and to the people of Maine. Obviously, this is a political issue in Maine during an election year. And someone running for office for a high position in Maine would naturally be inclined to want the Federal Government to pay all the costs and for the taxpayers of Maine or the property owners in Maine not to pay any. But I think this is a very reasonable resolution of a longstanding problem that has been proposed that would be fair to the Indians and fair to the people of Maine, fair to the private property owners both large and small.

We have obviously nothing to gain politically by trying to inject ourselves into the proposition. We could have just said "hands off" and let it languish in court for years, but this would have prevented in effect any property in that region from even being sold with a clear title. So, because of the best interests in Maine being foremost in our own mind, the Indians', and others', we did propose a solution. I still stand by the fact that the proposal that has been put forward is good, sound, and fair.

FEDERAL AND STATE TAX REDUCTION

Q. Mr. President, Bill Bayer, from Miami. The wins of Tuesday in California concern you, I'm sure. What if Congress comes back and says, "We want a Proposition 13 here with the Federal budget. We want to cut Internal Revenue income tax by one-third, or half," or whatever? And the wins—I'm sure you've heard from Georgia and Florida and you-name-it. What's going to happen?

THE PRESIDENT. I would be greatly surprised. You know, we've put forward a proposal to the Congress to cut income taxes.

Q. But not that much.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we put forward a proposal to cut income taxes by $20 billion. The Congress has not been willing to go along with cutting income taxes at all so far. They finally, reluctantly, agreed to consider $13 or $14 billion. But our proposal to cut taxes is much higher than the Congress has shown any willingness to accept.

Also, the inclination of Congress is not to cut my budget figures that I proposed, but to increase spending above what we proposed.

So, our main concern about Congress is not unacceptable levels of spending too low, but too high.

Q. Don't you think they're going to get a message from Tuesday?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I hope so, but we've had one vote in the Congress already that hadn't indicated any substantial decrease. And I would guess that they will certainly get a message.

The Federal Government, as you know, has no role to play with property taxes. This is basically a local thing and up to each individual State to make that decision. I would have been quite concerned, as Governor of Georgia, had the property taxes been cut 50 percent.

Obviously, this is a very good thing for property owners who are economically able to take care of their own needs. The ones who suffer are those who don't own property and those who are more dependent upon government services and have to send their kids to the public schools or have to be more dependent upon other public health services and that kind of thing.

But I think that this is a judgment that has been made by the California people by a 2-to-1 margin. They've spoken very clearly. And I certainly don't have any criticism of what they've done.

I might add one other thing: that our system of federalism has been set up to benefit from this sort of action, which you might identify as experimentation. The States reserve to themselves all the rights that they did not specifically grant to the Federal Government at the time our Nation was formed, plus the Federal Government has gained additional responsibility by Supreme Court rulings since then as they interpreted the commerce clause and others in the Constitution. But this leaves the States with much more responsibility and ability, when new circumstances evolve, to act as test cases.

In addition to this action that the California people have taken, I could point out a couple of others. One, for instance, was in environmental law. The first environmental laws were passed because of local problems with excessive air or water derogation. And the States eventually passed laws, scattered around the Nation—some States, very strict environmental laws, some with no environmental laws or lax ones. Eventually it worked up to the point where the Federal Government, in order to provide some uniformity, passed federal laws.

But the first experimenters and the first innovators were and should be the States. And as the Federal Government observed which States' environmental laws were effective, which ones were not, then we could make a much more sound judgment here in Washington. I was a Governor back in those days.

Another example has been no-fault automobile insurance, where States have tried out no-fault insurance. Some provisions or proposals have worked well; some have not. Now the Federal Government is in the posture of trying to evolve some uniform standards by which no-fault insurance laws could be assessed.

But this is part of our Federal system that gives us a way for 1 State out of 50 to try a new idea to see how well it works. And I think the whole Nation, including myself and the Congress, will be watching very closely in the next few months to see how California deals with it.

As you know, California has a fairly large State budget surplus, which was one of the causes of criticism and concern by the California people—that you would collect more taxes than you needed and hold those taxes in a reserve fund. That created some disturbance. But once that $4, $5 billion is spent, then a 50-percent reduction in property taxes is going to be a very difficult reduction to accommodate, because in California, for instance, a substantial part of the welfare costs are paid for by local property taxes. This is not the case in Georgia; we eliminated those while I was there as Governor.

But I think that this is the kind of thing that's going to work a very great challenge to Governor Brown, who's acting, I think, in a very responsible way now, and also to the people in California, because the ones who suffer are the poor and the dependent. The ones who celebrate and who enjoy reduction in property taxes are those who are affluent enough to be property owners. And, of course, that's not just rich people, that's average folks that have been able to buy a home or buy equity in a home.

It's an unpredictable sort of thing, and I think everyone in the country has gotten the message. I certainly welcome this kind of experimentation in our country.

ETHICS IN GOVERNMENT

Q. President Carter, I'm Ron De Fatta, KNOE Radio, Monroe, Louisiana. I have a question pertaining to the Korean influence buying scandal. What measures are you taking to ensure that this type of thing will not happen during your administration?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as you know, this is something that I don't think ever touched the executive branch of Government, so far as I've heard it described. It primarily was an allegation of lobbying efforts within the Congress. We have done everything we could to reveal the facts and also to provide testimony from Mr. Park,<sup>2</sup> who was here and who has been very forthcoming in giving information about what did occur.

He was willing to be examined and cross-examined; he was willing to do this examination with a lie detector in place. As far as we can tell, his testimony was complete and accurate. And all this information has been turned over to the Justice Department, who derived it, and also to the congressional investigating committee.

I think that the best way to deal with this sort of thing is to put a major portion of the financing of congressional elections in the public sector, as they already are now in the Presidential elections, and remove the possibility of unwarranted influence on Members of Congress because of heavy financial contributions. I think the ethics legislation and the public financing law that was proposed last year—and was blocked, as you know, by a Senate filibuster—is a step in the right direction.

And I think citizen groups and others who want the Congress to make decisions based on the merits of an issue, and not because they have some obligation to someone who gave them financial contributions in the past, would be a major step in the right direction—one step, by the way, that I support very strongly.

We have also pushed, as a carrying out of a campaign commitment, very strong legislation on revealing the activities of lobbyists. Now the law is primarily honored in its breach. But I think the new lobbying legislation that's making its way through the Congress will be another step in the right direction. I think public disclosure of the financial status of Members of Congress is another step in the right direction.

Those kinds of things to make sure that the interreaction between both executive officers like myself and my subordinates and the Members of Congress on the one hand, and lobbyists on the other, or major contributors, is the best way to prevent this happening in the future.

LABOR LAW REFORM

Q. I am Mel Toadvine, Salisbury Times, Salisbury, Maryland. Mr. President, what do you think your chances are of getting your labor reform bill through the Senate this year, and how much are you willing to give in to get it through?

THE PRESIDENT. I think the chances are good. As you know, the bill has very strong support in the Congress. The House passed it with a large majority. The legislation is needed; it's very moderate in its nature. I analyze every paragraph or portion of the reform legislation from the point of view not only as President but a small businessman who would have been affected by it.

I think the primary thrust of the legislation is just to make sure that the labor relations act that was passed many years ago can be enforced to expedite the resolution of employee-employer differences by open and free elections—which is the way the labor act now calls for, but which is subverted by unwarranted delays—and also to prevent the punishment of employees who might want to honor or to carry out their legal prerogatives and rights.

The law has some component parts that have been opposed by some people. I think the period of time during which the elections have to be held is somewhat flexible in the minds of the Senators. There's been an amendment already introduced, as you know, to exclude about, I think, 78 percent of all the businesses in the country, the very small businesses. And perhaps there would be some other amendments that the Senators would offer. But I think that with those amendments to be offered to remove the more difficult political aspects of the bill, that it will be passed, and its basic thrust and substance will not be modified appreciably.

Q. Do you believe the charge by American business that it is a push to unionize the Nation?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't think it's a push to unionize the Nation.

Q. This is the charge, unionizing America, when today, many times there are many people who are saying no to the union movement, greater numbers than ever before.

THE PRESIDENT. Under the National Labor Relations Act, passed many years ago, workers were given the right to form a union or to organize if they choose, if they choose freely, exercising their own judgment. And this is what the bill does. It doesn't expand that proposition or that principle at all. It just gives them the right that ostensibly has been guaranteed to them over decades in our country.

BEEF IMPORTS

Q. President Carter, Gary Watson, the Idaho Statesman, in Boise. Your announcement yesterday on beef brought, predictably, some very negative reactions from farmers and ranchers. And the initial reaction part was that this was just another evidence of a lack of concern by your administration for the West. I'm just curious to get your reaction to this.

THE PRESIDENT. Well, as you know, beef is produced all over the country, including Georgia as well as the West. [Laughter] This is another one of those difficult decisions that a President has to make. And I think we made the right decision.

There is a worldwide shortage of beef. In our country in particular, there will be a shortage of beef for the next 3 years at least, maybe 4 years. The early false news that we were removing all import quotas did have an adverse effect on the futures market. The spot market for farm grown and sold beef actually went up a dollar.

So, I think the beef industry, particularly the farm sale barn level, was not adversely affected, even when many thought that we were going to remove import quotas altogether. We took a very modest approach to it: to negotiate new beef imports of a particular kind and quality that we need in this country, so that we wouldn't remove controls on beef imports as was feared.

One aspect that I think is important is that when we produce in our country grain-fed beef, which has a lot of marbling in the texture and also a lot of fat trimming, that fat has to be used for one purpose or the other. Historically in our country we've taken the fat from the very high quality fed beef and mixed it with lean beef in a very reasonable and responsible way to make hamburger. About 50 percent of all the beef that's sold, as you know, in our stores to consumers is hamburger.

So, we have a real shortage of lean beef to mix with the fat from our grain-fed cattle. And this is the kind of beef that will be imported. I think 200 million pounds will be actually needed. If this is not done, then that fat portion of the grain-fed beef will have to be melted down for tallow, which is a very low-priced item.

So, in my judgment, this decision will not have an adverse effect on beef producers in the long run. It will protect the consumers to a very limited degree because of a worldwide shortage of beef. And the projections are that even when the beef comes in, it won't affect the price of hamburger more than 4 or 5 cents. It'll reduce it about that much. It's something that needs to be done, though, to provide adequate supplies of beef for the people to eat, to protect the interests of the beef producers, and to have some moderating effect on inflation trends.

MR. WURFEL. Thank you, sir.

THE PRESIDENT. I'll answer one more.

Q. Still on the beef subject—I'm Sue O'Brien from Denver, Colorado, KOA

[radio and television]—people from Colorado contend that ultimately there will be inflationary impact from the quota increase, saying that it will impede ranchers from recovering from 4 years of drought, that some more of them will go out of business, and extend the shortage of beef in this country or deepen it. Can you respond to that?

THE PRESIDENT. I've heard those arguments. I think I just responded to it adequately, because, as I said, there was an incorrect report put out that we were going to remove beef import quotas altogether. This information went all over the country. And even in spite of that, the spot market prices of beef at the sale barns went up a dollar, a dollar a hundred. So, I don't think that the American beef industry, which is very knowledgeable about its own characteristics and circumstances, is going to exaggerate a very small increase in imported beef. I don't think there will be any material change, for instance, in the number of brood cows kept for future herd growth.

And I think that it's obvious that the farmers who grow beef would prefer no imports, and I think it's obvious that the consumers would prefer lower prices. But what we've done is not to take action that would change prices very much, unfortunately, but we have done something that will prevent any adverse effect on beef producers, to let them have a prosperous future, to provide an adequate stimulus for further growth in the size of beef herds. And I think over 3 or 4 years those herds will be back up to the point where the rapid increase in beef prices will not be such a severe blow to the American consumers.

The fact is that since the first of January, beef sold by the farmers has jumped 36 percent. And I think this is an extraordinary growth. As you know, it's now up in the 50-cent to 60-cent bracket. It fluctuates up and down. But that's a very high increase. And I think that those present levels are going to be sustained. There's not going to be any adverse drop in beef prices to farmers, in my opinion. And none of my economic advisers disagree with that.

If you all don't have any objection, would you come by and let me get a photograph with each one of you?

Capitol Page School

*Remarks to Members of the Graduating Class.
June 12, 1978*

It's a great honor and pleasure for me, as President of our country, to welcome to the White House a group of distinguished young men and women who have already exhibited, in your own service to the Congress, a remarkable ability, scholarship, dedication and, I presume, now, a superb knowledge of the Congress. I have a great envy of you in that last respect. [Laughter]

I should have recruited you a year or so ago to help me with advice and counsel. I think our achievements would have been even greater than they have been.

I've enjoyed my service as President, and I hope that after your own college careers are completed that many of you will choose public service. This is the largest graduating class that we've ever had from the Capitol Page School. And I think that your academic record has been one of which I know you all are very proud.

We have learned a great deal about government, you and I together. Most of you are senior to me. We have early morning study hours. I was up this morning at 5 o'clock getting ready for my week's work. You do that regularly. I put in a full day's work, and I even do some homework at night, as you do.

I think this is a class that has had notable achievement already in the fact that all of you have been accepted in college. And I hope that all of you will take advantage of that remarkable opportunity. You've had good luck. I think that there are hundreds of thousands of young Americans who envy what you've had available to you already, not only in a very high academic education but, from a very fine perspective, an analysis of what our Government is, its good, sound elements and, perhaps, even some legitimate criticisms.

I hope that you, still in your formative years, as you've now reached young adulthood, will take this experience that you've derived and use it for the best interest of our country, not in a negative, adverse, or critical fashion, but in a constructive way, because you will help to shape what our country is in the years ahead.

I am very proud of your valedictorian, Bill McMillan. I understand he's made nothing but A's ever since the eighth grade, straight A's. And your salutatorian, Chip Barber, has done almost as well.

I now want to congratulate you collectively, and as we deliver the diplomas, I'll congratulate you individually.

[At this point, John C. Hoffman, principal of the Capitol Page School, read the names of the graduates, and the President presented them with graduation certificates.]

Thank you very much. Good luck to you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 12 noon in the Rose Garden at the White House.

Federal-State Social Services Claims

*Statement on Signing H.R. 11370 Into Law.
June 12, 1978*

I am today signing into law H.R. 11370, a bill authorizing appropriations for the settlement of all social services claims in dispute between States and the Federal Government under certain titles of the Social Security Act.

The bill authorizes an appropriation of $543 million to resolve disputes that have served as a continuing irritant to Federal-State relations for the past 6 years. These claims, arising under State social service programs, have been tied up in court so long it sometimes seemed they would never get out. The States and the Federal Government have spent vast sums of money during these legal tangles.

The bill signed today is the product of State and Federal efforts to achieve a mutually satisfactory resolution. It shows what is possible when we work together in good faith.

The bill, which has received bipartisan and nearly unanimous support, is a settlement. As such, it recognizes both right and wrong on the part of the States and the Federal Government. It is a compromise fair to all.

Now the States and the Federal Government will be able to refocus their attention to provision of essential social services to needy persons. The Social Security Act provides a partial mechanism to meet some of these needs, and I expect it to become a more effective tool, now that we are freer to devote our energies and combined creative powers to the task.

NOTE: As enacted, H.R. 11370 is Public Law 95-291, approved June 12.

United States Parole Commission

Nomination of Oliver J. Keller, Jr., To Be a Commissioner. June 12, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Oliver J. Keller, Jr., of Gainesville, Fla., to be a Commissioner of the United States Parole Commission for a 6-year term. He would replace George Reed, retired.

Keller was born April 21, 1923, in Lancaster, Pa. He received a B.A. from Williams College in 1947 and an M.A. in sociology from Northern Illinois University in 1965. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1943 to 1946 and from 1950 to 1951.

From 1951 to 1959, Keller was vice president and sales manager for a Springfield, Ill., radio station. In 1960 and 1961, he was chairman of the Illinois Youth Commission, and from 1961 to 1963, he was a commissioner on that commission, serving primarily as a member of the parole board for juveniles.

From 1963 to 1967, Keller was a special fellow at the University of Chicago, and from 1965 to 1967, he was a research fellow at the university's Center for Studies in Criminal Justice.

Keller was director of the Florida Division of Youth Services from 1967 to 1973, a centralized juvenile delinquency prevention and corrections agency. From 1973 to 1975, he was secretary of the Florida Department of Health and Rehabilitative Services. Since 1975 Keller has been a visiting professor of criminal justice studies at the University of Florida. He is also project director of Project Diversion, a federally funded project which places volunteers on a one-to-one "older friend" basis with juveniles charged with law violations.

Keller is the author of numerous articles and is a member of many professional associations and councils.

Visit of Prime Minister Morarji Desai of India

Remarks at the Welcoming Ceremony. June 13, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Prime Minister Desai, distinguished visitors from the great nation of India:

It's with a great deal of pleasure that I welcome you to our country as friends and as counselors, sharing with us deep commitments which have historically bound our nations together in peace and friendship.

One of the most significant political events of this decade was the vivid reaffirmation in India, in the past election, of democratic principles and the rule of law. India enjoys the prestige of having the largest free electorate in the history of the entire world, a tremendous democratic nation dedicated to the principles which are vividly demonstrated by Prime Minister Desai.

He is a man of courage in protecting those principles in which he believes so deeply. Along with Mahatma Gandhi and, later, Prime Minister Nehru, Prime Minister Desai was willing to suffer in prison as a fruitful demonstration of his commitment to those principles which he still protects with his actions and with his deeds. He's a man who frequently says that the means to an end are just as important as the end itself. He abides strictly by his deep-felt standards of conduct and ethics. Recently on an interview in our country, he says that one cannot use untruth to further truth, and one cannot dispel darkness with darkness.

When I was in India a few months ago, Prime Minister Desai and I issued a carefully prepared declaration of common principles designed to spell out in clear terms the common beliefs and common purposes of our two nations.

We have been great admirers of the economic growth and prosperity that has come to India under this enlightened administration. India is now prepared to be independent of mandatory food imports; in fact, in some products, is even a heavy exporter of food in these days. India has been and is a leader in the developing world. The nonaligned movement has seen and has benefited from the leadership of that great nation.

India has always been in the forefront of the expansion of basic human rights. And the recent declaration of Prime Minister Desai at the Special Session on Disarmament at the United Nations set a standard for other leaders throughout the world to assess and to emulate.

Under Prime Minister Desai, the Government of India has reaffirmed its commitment not to acquire nuclear weapons and to refrain from the explosion of peaceful nuclear devices. The warmth of the welcome extended to me, to my wife, and on other occasions, to my own mother, are a personal proof of the friendship of the Indian people toward those of our own country.

When I was in New Delhi with Prime Minister Desai, he gave me a very cherished gift, a dual bust of Abraham Lincoln and Mahatma Gandhi, with inscriptions thereon which again confirm that our nations stand united in pursuing freedom, our adherence to the principles of democracy, the protection of human rights, our desire for world peace, and our deep religious convictions.

Mr. Prime Minister, it is with the authority of the entire American people that I welcome you, a great leader, to our country.

Thank you very much.

THE PRIME MINISTER. Mr. President,

Mrs. Carter, I am very grateful to you for your very warm words of welcome. I return to this beautiful country after 9 years and with a feeling of deep satisfaction that our bilateral relations are so much closer than they have been for some time in the past.

I have always strongly believed that friendship between the millions of people in our two countries and the governments which represent them is of great significance in a bilateral as well as global context. There is a vast fund of good will that binds us, an unshakable commitment to the dignity of the individual, to the vitality of the democratic way of life, which adds a special qualitative dimension to this relationship.

We have a similar vision of building a world free from strife and tension. There is no conflict or clash of fundamental interest between us. On the other hand, we are blessed with a great variety of shared interests, the potential for which has perhaps only begun to be tapped.

The complex and changing world in which we live offers to both of us a range of challenging possibilities for cooperative endeavor which may not have existed in the past. The United States, by virtue of its size and strength, cannot but greatly influence the course of human progress and human events. The quality of leadership in the United States is, therefore, of crucial importance to all of us.

I would like to take this opportunity, Mr. President, of expressing, if I may, the admiration and respect that we in India have for you personally, for your family, with which we can claim with pardonable pride of enjoying special links, and for the leadership you are providing to your great country at this delicate juncture in international affairs. And at this stage, Mr. President, may I make a special request and ask you to convey my very warm greetings to your distinguished mother, for whom we have much affection and regard.

Thank you very much.

THE PRESIDENT. I certainly will do that. Thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:38 a.m. on the South Lawn of the White House.

Visit of Prime Minister Desai of India

White House Statement on the First Meeting
With the Prime Minister. June 13, 1978

President Carter and Morarji Desai, the Prime Minister of India, met privately for approximately 25 minutes in the Oval Office and in the Cabinet Room for an additional 45 minutes.

The President began by recalling his meeting with the Prime Minister in New Delhi last January and expressing his personal pleasure at this opportunity to welcome the Prime Minister to Washington. He noted that this second visit will build upon the close personal ties and mutual confidence they established in New Delhi.

The President expressed the hope that the significant improvement in bilateral relations over the past year, marked by a comprehensive exchange of correspondence between them and their exchange of visits, would be continued and deepened, building upon the shared values of the American and Indian peoples.

They particularly welcomed increasing trade, economic cooperation, the work of the Indo-U.S. Joint Commission, and the American response to Indian requests for improvements in the handling of student visas.

In this morning's meetings, the President and the Prime Minister discussed a wide range of major international issues of common concern. They devoted special attention to questions of peace and security in the world. The President reviewed the current status of our SALT negotiations with the Soviet Union and the prospects for the conclusion of a comprehensive test ban (CTB).

The Prime Minister and the President discussed their relationships with the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China.

They touched upon the upcoming meeting of the UNHRC [United Nations Human Rights Commission] to be held in Geneva this September, and President Carter reviewed recent improvements in human rights in several areas of the world.

The Prime Minister reviewed with the President his recent talks with the leaders of the EEC, Prime Minister Tindemans of Belgium, and Prime Minister Callaghan of Great Britain.

They also discussed the need for the peaceful resolution of the Ethiopia-Somalia conflict and the right of the peoples of Zimbabwe and Namibia to sovereignty and independent development.

Turning to issues of importance to the South Asia region, the President and the Prime Minister discussed the events in Afghanistan and their importance to recent stability in the region. They agreed that every effort must be made to ensure that countries of the region, while preserving their independent personalities, can continue the process of promoting beneficial cooperation on the basis of trust and stability which would be advantageous to the area as a whole.

Amendments to the Medicare Renal Disease Program

*Statement on Signing H.R. 8423 Into Law.
June 13, 1978*

For the 40,000 Americans suffering from the severe disorder known as end-stage renal disease, kidney dialysis and transplantation are essential and life-saving services. But until now, Federal policies have encouraged these patients to rely upon institutionally based dialysis, which is more expensive than other approaches, such as transplantation and home-based dialysis, and which may be less medically desirable. The important legislation I am signing today, H.R. 8423, changes Federal reimbursement policies to enable patients who are suitable candidates for transplantation or home-based dialysis to receive these treatments.

This legislation complements other initiatives designed to control soaring health care costs while maintaining the quality of care, such as the hospital cost containment bill now pending before several committees of the Congress. I will continue to work with the Congress to assure more efficient health care for the American people.

NOTE: As enacted, H.R. 8423 is Public Law 95-292, approved June 13.

National Advisory Council on Women's Education Programs

*Nomination of Seven Members.
June 13, 1978*

The President today announced seven persons whom he will nominate to be members of the National Advisory Council on Women's Education Programs. They are:

- ELIZA M. CARNEY, of Tempe, Ariz., academic adviser to the College of Nursing at Arizona State University;
- GLADYS GUNN, of Dayton, Ohio, director of the Central State University Training Institute and former assistant superintendent of educational services for the Ohio Youth Commission;
- ELLEN S. HOFFMAN, of Washington, D.C., director of government affairs for the Children's Defense Fund and former staff director of the Senate Subcommittee on Children and Youth;
- KATHLEEN E. HUMPHREY, of Boise, Idaho, a student in the B.S. program in computer science at Duke University;
- PAUL PARKS, secretary of education for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts;
- J. RICHARD ROSSIE, a Memphis, Tenn., attorney active in organizations dealing with the rights and educational opportunities for handicapped children;
- BERNICE SANDLER, an executive associate with the Association of American Colleges, where she is director of the Project on the Status and Education of Women.

The purpose of the Council is to advise and make recommendations to the Commissioner of Education and the Assistant Secretary for Education on policy, programs, and the allocation of funds for the improvement of women's education. ## Visit of Prime Minister Desai of India

Toasts at the Working Dinner. June 13, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. If I could have your attention a minute, I'd like to say just a few words; first of all, to welcome all of you who have come to the White House this evening for one of the most delightful and fruitful evenings of my administration.

I've learned to know and to respect and, if he'll excuse the expression, even to love the Prime Minister of India. He represents a country of greatness in many respects, and he is indeed a unique man himself.

He's traveled the breadth of our country, he's made a major speech at the United Nations, he's come all the way over here from India, he's been working hard all day. He's still as fresh and as young as anyone in the room, perhaps even more so. He's just explained to me that he's only 20 years old; he's celebrated 20 birthdays so far, having been born on the 29th of February. [Laughter] He's forgotten that every year that goes by, he gets older. He just doesn't get older. And I think that this is a characteristic of his that's derived from an inner strength and an inner peace with himself and convictions, social and religious and philosophical convictions that don't change. But he's a man also without arrogance, and he has an ability to understand the perspective of others who might disagree strongly with him.

He's a worthy leader of a country that's particularly close to me. My mother is about the same age as Prime Minister Desai. And I told him a few minutes ago that her brief stay in India was almost a time of rebirth for her, because she really started a new life there with a new perspective and a new appreciation of her fellow human beings. She went there expecting to do other people a favor as a member of the Peace Corps, but she came back realizing that the Indian people with whom she lived had provided her with much more of a contribution than she ever made in that village in which she lived.

I had a chance to visit one of the villages in India with our guest tonight, and I considered myself kind of an expert on India after I got back home. I asked him tonight how many villages there were like the one I visited. He said there were 550,000. [Laughter] So, he represents a nation that is the largest democracy on Earth; a people who provide the largest free electorate that the world has ever known. And he was elected at a time when his own country was torn apart by dissension and by discouragement and even by animosity. And he helped, with his leadership, and those who have come here with him, who served with him, to protect the purest principles of democracy and the fabric of the law.

I enjoy being with Prime Minister Desai, to speak to him privately and to seek his counsel and advice. When I was there, he gave me this dual bust on my left, which I think demonstrates the ties between our countries.

He is a great admirer of Lincoln, primarily because of his humility and because of his recognition that to live in public office is an opportunity to serve others. He suffered because of his beliefs. Mahatma Gandhi, a great religious and political leader, did the same. And they, too, had an inner strength that sustained them in time of testing, in time of crisis, even turmoil.

Prime Minister Desai sets an example for all those who serve in positions of leadership, I think, to analyze his philosophy of life and the principles of his government. He is an inspiration to all of us who know them.

He believes in peace, in all the aspects and meanings of that word. He believes in disarmament. He made an outstanding speech, as you well know, at the United Nations earlier this week. He is a man who gets along with leaders of different countries and respects each one; a superb representative of the nonaligned movement. I think he would agree that he recognizes the fact that Cuba is not indeed a non-aligned country. But he respects the harmony within that movement and hopes that Cuba will change in the future.

We have had long discussions about some of the attitudes of other countries. He's seeking now to have an improved relationship with Pakistan, to draw together that country, Afghanistan, Iran, India, into a recommitment of harmony and peace in that part of the world. They've been able to bridge the gap between the democracies and the totalitarian governments.

And they are trying to repair the strained relationships between India and China, the People's Republic of China, I think successfully, because of his broad mind and his willingness to analyze his own position and that of his country in an objective fashion.

This is a time, also, to recognize India's great and staunch commitment to the principle of protecting basic human rights.

And I think that in that country, where in the past so many people have suffered, that we've always cherished as a friend, it's indeed gratifying to him and those who serve with him to know that India's production of food now is adequate for their own needs. They have a reserve supply of food on hand, even the capability of exporting basic food items. And this is a symbol of the vigor of their great country, one of the most advanced technological nations in the world, and a real leader in almost every aspect of that word.

It is an honor, Mr. Prime Minister, to have you in our country. And from the perspective of the Presidency of our Nation, from the perspective of a personal friend, from the perspective of a member of a family who looks with great favor and appreciation on your country, I would like to propose a toast to a great leader and a personal friend, Prime Minister Desai, to the wonderful people of India, and to the enhanced prospects of world peace for which you strive so vigorously.

Thank you, sir.

[At this point, the toast was offered.]

I might say that those of you who like to drink water can thank the Prime Minister for his beneficent influence tonight.
[Laughter]

THE PRIME MINISTER. I don't know that that would be as much welcomed.
[Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. It's good for us all. Would you like to say a word?

THE PRIME MINISTER. I think it is quite good.

Mr. President, you have so overwhelmed me with your gracious words in attributing to me many qualities which I am struggling to possess, but have not yet fully attained. It was very kind of you to have invited me here to this great land with which we have much in common, in ideals and attitudes alike and in human qualities.

I have been here many times, and every time I have come here, I have been not only happy but I have always learned something, not only in life but also in the matter of democratic values.

I belong to a country which is poor in material resources—not that it was poor at a time when others were poor in other riches—but in the course of time, it has become the poorest today. But it is the richest in spiritual values which we have inherited from the holy past. And yet I can't say that we are quite a true specimen of that great heritage, but we hope that we shall be able now, after passing through several trials, be able to catch again that spirit and be of some service to the world.

We have no ambition of affluence as it is understood in the present day. We would be satisfied if our people have enough to be happy and we are able to serve the human society in such a way that the world becomes one family. That has been what we have been always advised and instructed.

We have always said the whole world is a family and so they would be able to overcome, as I said in the United Nations Assembly. And we have tried to live up to that, and with your help, we hope to do well.

This is a young country, but it has also very deep spiritual foundations. The country was founded by pilgrim fathers who protested against oppression, religious persecution and fanaticism, and came here and founded this country. It is that which gives the real urge for humane values to the people of this great country.

I think the world has yet to cite any example of a country which has helped very nearly the whole world in many ways and also has set that example before others. And it is that which inspires us. It is therefore that I admire this country, and more particularly, I have struck a common chord with you, Mr. President, and I find that we believe in the same values.

There can therefore be no misunderstanding between us. There can be some difference of opinion in some things. If we did not do that, we would cease to be intelligent. Therefore, that is also a proof of human values in my mind. But even if there are differences, we understand each other very fully and try to find out a way which is common, so that we are able to succeed in our common mission of achieving peace in this country and banishing war so that the world becomes one family of human beings.

We have to achieve it. There are many prophets of the dark whose prophecy is doom for this world. Personally, I think the world is going up and becoming better. But it is always passing through difficulties and sufferings that we can become better. Without suffering, there is no test of goodness, and without suffering, there is no acquisition of truth as we have been taught by our sages. And it is that also which attracts me here, because I find there is a regard for truth which I see everywhere I move.

Of course the world is not perhaps full of truthful people, and yet they all admire truth and they want truth. There is a great hope for the world.

And it is a matter of great pleasure and happiness for me that you very graciously invited me here to this great land and gave this opportunity of meeting various friends, discussing with them common problems and getting more and more friendliness. And for that, I am deeply grateful to you.

I only hope that you will visit us again and see the countryside and spend not less than 10 days. I don't know whether it is possible for such a busy President who has problems that are far more annoying than I have. And yet, may I say that we will see that you will forget those problems, and we might also be helpful in seeing that your problems are solved so that we are helped by you in solving other problems. It is more selfishness for which I am selling you.

I have passed the last few days very happily, and going from one end to the other, San Francisco, and coming back from there, I have met many Indians, the largest of them, largest numbers perhaps on record, in this country so far. That was also due to your kindness, because you are painting such a picture about me that they are all attracted. And for that, I am deeply grateful to you and thank you very much.

May I request, friends, to join me in drinking to the health of the President, his family, and eternal friendship between our two countries and world peace.

NOTE: The President spoke at 8:36 p.m. in the State Dining Room at the White House.

Following the dinner, the President and the Prime Minister visited the Lincoln Memorial.

Vice President Mondale's Visit to Israel

Statement by the President Announcing the Visit. June 14, 1978

I am pleased to announce that Vice President Mondale has accepted the invitation of Prime Minister Begin and Knesset Speaker Shamir to visit Israel as part of the celebration of Israel's 30th anniversary.

The Vice President will convey my congratulations and those of the American people to Israel on this important anniversary. His visit underscores the deep and enduring ties of friendship between the people of the United States and Israel.

Department of Energy

Nomination of James P. Wade, Jr., To Be Chairman of the Military Liaison Committee.
June 14, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate James P. Wade, Jr., of Reston, Va., to be Chairman of the Military Liaison Committee to the Department of Energy. He would replace Donald R. Cotter, resigned.

Wade was born December 26, 1930, in Richmond Heights, Mo. He received a B.S. from the U.S. Military Academy in 1953, and an M.S. (1959) and P.D. (1961) in physics from the University of Virginia.

Wade was on the staff of the NATO Defense College in Paris from 1955 to 1957, and served on the physics staff at Lawrence Radiation Laboratory from 1961 to 1965. In 1966 and 1967, he was with the operations directorate at USCINCEUR in Paris.

Wade has been at the Pentagon since 1968, serving on the staff of the Defense Advanced Research Agency in 1968 and 1969 and of the Office of Strategic and Space Systems, Defense Research and Engineering from 1970 to 1972. From 1972 to 1974, he was Assistant Director of the Office of the Secretary of Defense SALT Support Group.

In 1974 Wade served as Director of the Defense Department's SALT Task Force and Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs. Since 1977 he has been Assistant for Analysis in the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Research and Engineering.

Visit of Prime Minister Desai of India

White House Statement on the Final Meeting
With the Prime Minister. June 14, 1978

President Carter and the Prime Minister of India, Morarji Desai, met today in the Cabinet Room for 1 hour, from 10:30 to 11:30 a.m.

The meeting this morning covered both global and South Asian regional issues. The President outlined to the Prime Minister the current status of the SALT and CTB negotiations and his hopes for rapid movement in both areas. The Prime Minister said that he was happy to hear that progress is being made.

There was also a discussion of the role the nonaligned movement should play in international relations. The President expressed his support for Prime Minister Desai's concept of genuine nonalignment.

The President and the Prime Minister reviewed the situation in Africa. Both the President and the Prime Minister agreed on the importance of preserving territorial integrity in Africa and encouraging Africans to resolve their own problems.

There was also an extensive discussion of South Asia. The President reaffirmed the United States policy of support for the independence and development of all the states in the region, a goal which the Prime Minister shares. The Prime Minister discussed recent developments in relations among the South Asian nations.

The President concluded by expressing his great pleasure at the strengthening of his personal ties with the Prime Minister. They stated that these ties are valuable in maintaining the longstanding and close relationship between our two countries and agreed to continue the bilateral dialog through future meetings and correspondence, as well as through regular consultations between officials of both governments.

THE PRESIDENT'S NEWS CONFERENCE OF JUNE 14, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Good afternoon, everybody. I have two brief statements to make before I answer questions.

ARMS EMBARGO AGAINST TURKEY

The most immediate and urgent foreign policy decision to be made by the current legislative session is in lifting the arms embargo against Turkey. The points that the Congress intended to underscore 3 years ago, when the embargo was imposed, have all been made, but now the embargo is not contributing to a settlement of the Cyprus dispute, nor is it helping to improve our relationship with our allies, Turkey and Greece. It's driven a wedge between those two countries and has weakened the cohesiveness and the readiness of NATO. It's thereby harmed our own national security interests in the eastern Mediterranean, an area which is crucial to the defense of the southern flank of Europe, and also our own access and that of others to the Middle East.

It's important to implement an effective policy in this area of the eastern Mediterranean—Greece, Turkey, Cyprus area. We have three purposes, all of which are equally important: first, to serve U.S. and NATO security interests, as well as the security interests of Greece and Turkey as nations; second, to improve the relationship between Greece and Turkey; and third, to facilitate progress toward a Cyprus settlement.

I'm asking the Congress to support me in enacting the full program, which, in addition to removing the embargo against arms sales to Turkey, provides for military sales credits to both Turkey and to Greece, provides for economic aid to Turkey, and provides further funds for relief and rehabilitation for refugees in Cyprus.

Both Greece and Turkey are valuable friends and allies of our own. Lifting the embargo is essential to our hopes for peace and stability in the eastern region of the Mediterranean. And I hope that the American people and the Congress will give me their support in the realization of U.S. interests in this critical area of the world.

INFLATION AND FEDERAL SPENDING

The domestic issue that I would like to pursue is that of inflation. Last week I emphasized how important it is to hold the line on Federal budget expenditures as a series of appropriations bills are considered by the Congress during the next few weeks.

I cannot make this point too strongly, nor repeat it too often, because much of the fight against inflation from the perspective of the Federal Government itself depends on Congress action in the days ahead. Unless the Congress is responsible, the Federal deficit will rise at a time when it must and can be reduced. Unless the Congress shows restraint in spending, it will set the worst possible example for our workers and businessmen, whom I've asked to restrain their own wage and price increases in order to hold down inflation.

Unless we recognize the limits on our ability to spend in the Federal Government, then both American citizens and those in foreign countries will see that we cannot take the difficult decisions that are necessary if inflation is to be controlled.

I'm concerned in particular at this time about the public works appropriations bill that the House will begin voting on tomorrow. That bill, as passed by the Appropriations Committee, would add not only $1.4 billion in spending over the life of 46 new water projects, but it also continues spending for the unsound water projects which the Congress agreed not to fund last year. It would waste far too much of our taxpayers' money, and we just can't afford it.

With the help of many of the House Members who are also concerned about the inflationary impact of the public works bill, we will be working to eliminate the unnecessary spending proposals for water projects in that bill. Unless they are eliminated, I intend to veto it.

And now, I'd like to recognize Ms. Thomas [Helen Thomas, United Press International].

QUESTIONS

CUBAN INVOLVEMENT IN ANGOLA

Q. Mr. President, do you think that Fidel Castro is lying when he says that there's been no Cuban involvement in the recent invasion of Zaire? And since you made the charge, contrary to Castro's word, do you have proof that he did not attempt to restrain the rebels?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't really desire to get into a public dispute with Mr. Castro through the news media. The facts are these: In Zaire, the Cubans now have more than 20,000 armed troops plus other support personnel—in Angola, excuse me. They also are deeply involved in the ministries of the Angolan Government itself, and they have substantial control over the transportation facilities in Angola—the seaports, the airports, and so forth.

In the southeastern (northeastern)<sup>1</sup> part of Angola from which the Katangan attack was launched, the Cubans have around 4,000 or more troops. They are a heavy influence, both with all personnel in Angola, including the Katangans, and also, of course, with the Neto government itself.

There's no doubt about the fact that Cuba has been involved in the training of Katangan people who did invade. We have firm proof of this fact. And the knowledge that Cuba had of the impending invasion has been admitted by Castro himself.

This was a story published, I think, in Time magazine the last week in May, and later Castro informed one of our own diplomats that he knew about the impending invasion ahead of time and that he attempted to notify President Neto in Angola and was unsuccessful. (Castro informed one of our own diplomats that he knew about the impending invasion ahead of time and that he attempted to notify President Neto in Angola and was unsuccessful, and there was a story printed in Time magazine.)<sup>2</sup>

The fact is that Castro could have done much more, had he genuinely wanted to stop the invasion. He could have interceded with the Katangans themselves. He could certainly have imposed Cuban troops near the border, because they are spread throughout Angola, to impede the invasion. He could have notified the Zambian Government of this fact. He could have notified the Organization of African Unity. He could have notified the world at large that an invasion designed to cross and to disturb an international border was in prospect. And he did not do any of these things. At the present time, Mr. Castro has still not condemned the invasion of Zaire by the Katangan rebels. So, there is no doubt in my mind that just on the basis of these facts alone, my statement is true.

Rather than look backward, I would like very much for Mr. Castro to pledge himself and for the Neto government in Angola to pledge themselves to prevent any further crossing of the Angolan border which would permit future invasions of Zaire.

And, of course, we would also relish the withdrawal of Cuban troops in the future, both there and Ethiopia, and support for the American, British, and other efforts to bring about peace in the southern part of Africa.

Q. Would you be willing to see him on that subject?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't think it's appropriate for me to see Mr. Castro now.

TAX REDUCTION

Q. Mr. President, Proposition 13 would appear to have sent some politicians into shock, including some in this town. You don't appear to be in shock, but I wonder if the California vote will have any influence on your possibly reassessing your own policies and approaches.

THE PRESIDENT. Obviously we will have to observe very carefully the developments in California in the future as the full impact of Proposition 13 is felt. It will reduce property taxes perhaps as much as 60 percent in California.

One of the reasons for the decision made by the citizens of California is that property taxes there are very high, compared to those in other parts of the Nation, most other parts of the Nation. The property valuations have increased rapidly, and the taxes levied have increased rapidly. That, combined with the well-known fact that the State government had accumulated $4½ or $5 billion or so in surplus funds, I think, combined to increase the desire of California people to impose this limit on property taxes. Those factors would be unlikely to prevail in other States of the Nation at this time. But the 2-to-1 margin of approval by the California people to restrain public spending and taxation is obviously a message that's been well received and observed by all of us throughout the country. I think this is not incompatible with the fact that we want to hold down spending, we want to reduce taxes at the Federal Government level.

There will be some indirect impact on the Federal Government now and more direct influence in the future, because there's no doubt about the fact that unemployment will go up in California, as government workers are laid off because of stringent budget requirements. And, of course, our unemployment compensation payments will have to increase. Also, I think we have about 50,000 CETA jobs, comprehensive education training administration jobs worked out jointly with local governments. Many of those may be in danger.

We have no way yet to anticipate what other consequences will accrue. But all of us are concerned about the budget levels, about unnecessary spending, about more efficient operation of government, and about lower taxation. These were proposals that had already been made by us here in Washington. But I think they strengthen support now in the Congress for those considerations.

COMMUNITY SERVICES ADMINISTRATION

Q. Mr. President, the head of the Community Services Administration testified yesterday in Federal court that some of your top aides, including Frank Moore, asked the CSA to cut off funds to the Zavala County Economic Development Corporation. Why did your administration want to cut off funds to this Texas-Mexican American group?

THE PRESIDENT. I think there has been—I don't know many details about the proposal, but I do know that the Governor of Texas had complained earlier about the way the funds were managed, and this question was raised with the CSA. Later after the CSA, following an investigation, decided that some of the funding should be either cut back or terminated unless the management was improved, the people involved in the Zavala County effort tried to get the Federal Government to reverse its decision.

When that request was refused, the Zavala County officials went to court. A decision was made by Grace Olivarez, the Administrator of CSA, that the Federal Government position was the proper one. And we are prepared to go to court and to have the full information revealed to the court, and let the court decide whether it should be administered or not.

Q. I would like to follow that up.

THE PRESIDENT. Please do.

Q. Why did you claim executive privilege on the nine memos regarding that, from various aides to you and so forth?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think as a general rule, when I have a wide range of advice coming to me following the complaint of a mayor or a Governor or a State legislator or some other responsible official, when some of the complaints are based on hearsay or allegations or personalities or specific criticisms of the qualifications of administering officials, it would not be appropriate to reveal all those memos to the public.

This is something that's been honored for generations in our Government. And I think that if there was a possibility that those kind of confidential memoranda would later be made public, when they have to be very frank and open and free expressions of even contradictory views, there would be a tight reluctance on the part of my subordinates to give me free advice, because they would have to assess every document presented to me or every expression of opinion to see whether or not it could stand up to scrutiny later on for public analysis maybe 2 years later.

So, I think the confidential privilege of having my own subordinates give me free advice without their memoranda being revealed to the public is something that I would have to preserve.

Judy [Judy Woodruff, NBC News].

CUBAN AND SOVIET INVOLVEMENT IN AFRICA

Q. Mr. President, other than being critical of the Cubans and the Russians for their involvement in Africa, what can this Government do specifically to discourage any further involvement in the future? And specifically, have you made a decision about any possible retaliatory action against the Cubans, in the way of trade or travel restrictions, or against the Soviet Union because of the recent activities in Africa?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I don't contemplate any retaliatory action. As you know, we have a trade embargo against Cuba at this time, and we do not have diplomatic relations with Cuba. We do have a representative in Washington and in Havana that provides us communication service, if nothing else.

We are doing the best we can to acquaint the world with the hazards and the consequences of increasing involvement of the Soviets and the Cubans in Africa. I think it's accurate to say that they take advantage of local disturbances and move in with massive intrusions, both of military weapons, which contribute to further bloodshed among Africans themselves, and when they are permitted by the local government, they send in large quantities of troops. There are now more than 20,000 troops by Cuba in Angola. This number has increased in the last 12 months. And we believe that in Ethiopia there are more than 15,000 Cuban troops there now, even though the armed combat in the Ogaden area between Somalia and Ethiopia is over.

I think drawing public opinion to this, not only in our country but around the world, has been relatively effective. We now have the prospect of a further armed outbreak between Eritrea and Ethiopia. And I would hope that our expressions of concern would induce the Cubans not to become involved in that fighting itself.

I think it's time for the Cuban troops to withdraw from Ethiopia. Ethiopia has been heavily armed now by the rapid intrusion of Soviet weapons to them after Somalia did attack in the Ogaden area. I think Ethiopia is perfectly capable of defending themselves without Cuban troops, and it would certainly be contributory to world peace if Cuba would withdraw. But I think other than acting in a way to acquaint the world with their actions, the only other thing that we can do is, through peaceful means, to provide some strength to nations that do want to be autonomous, that do want to see African problems settled by African people themselves.

And we have provided a limited amount of economic aid, some limited military aid on occasion. The other thing that we are trying to do is involve multinational organizations to help in controlling outside intrusion into Africa.

The Organization of African Unity is a good organization, but it's been relatively reluctant in the past to deal with very controversial issues. And quite often the African nations themselves are divided on the controversial issues. The United Nations is one to whom we have turned, and we are working under the auspices of the United Nations in trying to deal with the Namibian question. I think you know that in Rhodesia and Namibia, we are working with other countries in trying to bring about majority rule and a peaceful settlement. We have had no help at all from either the Cubans or the Soviets, trying to deal with these very sensitive questions.

So, I think these brief things that I've outlined are some of the things, short of armed involvement—which we do not intend to do—to bring about some lessening of the Cuban-Soviet intrusion into Africa.

Q. I have a followup.

THE PRESIDENT. Go ahead.

Q. President Nyerere has been critical, at the same time, of our involvement in Africa. There are people in your own administration who have been critical, who think that we've made too much of the Cuban activities. Is there a possibility that all the recent criticism may in some way endanger potential resolution of other more serious problems in Africa, like Ethiopia?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think any military disturbance in Africa, when exacerbated by the intrusion of foreign troops and weapons, tends to spill over across other borders. One of the things that made it so important to draw the line on Cuba and, hopefully, the Katangans in the future, in the violation of Zairian borders, was that principle of leaving those international borders undisturbed.

I think the reason that Nyerere expressed concern was that he thought that we were supporting a so-called pan-African force, that we were developing a strike force of some kind that could be used whenever called upon to go to anywhere in Africa to try to intercede militarily to bring about peace.

This is a proposition that we have never considered. Our only involvement has been for the Shaba province in the southern part of Zaire to try to stabilize the situation there. And, as you know, we've only provided logistical support to other nations; we've not provided any troops and don't intend to. So, that's the limit of our involvement, and I don't think we'll go any further than that.

DAVID G. GARTNER

Q. Mr. President, in light of your code of ethics pledge never to appoint anyone with a conflict of interest or even the appearance of conflict, how do you justify appointing former Humphrey aide David Gartner to the commission regulating commodities, when he had accepted for his children $72,000 in stocks from a major commodities dealer, Dwayne Andreas? Did you know these facts before you made the appointment?

THE PRESIDENT. No, I didn't.

Q. How do you justify it?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I believe that the Senate committee and the full Senate did have this information before they decided that Mr. Gartner was qualified. Also he has pledged himself not to become involved at all in the consideration of any matter that related to that particular company. So, although I didn't know about it before I submitted his name, we knew about this before the Senate committee and the Senate at large considered his appointment.

It was approved overwhelmingly, as you know.

Q. You believe it does not constitute a conflict of interest or the appearance of conflict?

THE PRESIDENT. That's correct. I think that the circumstances and the facts have been made known thoroughly, so far as I'm able to tell. In spite of this, accommodating this, the Senate did approve his appointment, and he has pledged himself not to become involved in any matter that related to that particular company.

TAX REDUCTION

Q. Mr. President, to get back to Proposition 13, sir, today Budget Director McIntyre called it wishful thinking to suggest that communities in California could ask the Federal Government to bail them out of difficulties with their local payrolls and so on. How do you—there was an indication that he was speaking for you on this. Was he, and how do you feel about that? And if you were to get such requests from localities, what would you tell them?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, within the constraints of the presently existing programs for transportation, education, for air and water pollution control, crime control, and the LEAA, CETA jobs for public service and training, of course we would be glad to help the communities of California on the same basis as we help the communities around the country. And if there should evolve a crisis in a community, after careful assessment, within the bounds of the law and administrative procedures, we would obviously help them.

The Federal impact of the California decision will be felt long in the future. I think with a $5 billion surplus that presently exists in the State government for several months in the future, this can be used, as Governor Brown has very wisely proposed, to deal with those special needs.

Following that time, of course, we'll have to assess what role the Federal Government might play. But I don't think there would be any possibility of our passing a specific law just to deal with California. The reason for the interrelation on taxes, for instance, is to prevent double taxation. And I think even with the reduced taxes on property in California, the taxes, for instance, in States like Georgia or Alabama would still be quite a lot lower than those in California.

So, we still have no means, no inclination to single out California for special Federal programs just because they have lowered property taxes.

PRESIDENT'S FINANCIAL DISCLOSURES

Q. Mr. President, as a Presidential candidate you often cited the need for timely financial disclosure as a means of avoiding conflicts of interest, or appearance of it. And yet, as President, you have not yet released your income tax filing from last year, nor your 1976 nor your 1977 net worth statements, as you pledged to do. My question is, what are your plans with regard to disclosure?

THE PRESIDENT. Jody Powell now has all those data, and they are available for release. The reason we held this up is because we had an Internal Revenue Service audit of my 1975 and 1976 tax returns. I've forgotten the exact figures, but one of the years we had no change at all in the tax return. The other one, when I was Governor, I put in normal contributions as a State employee into the retirement system. When I got the money back at the end of my service as Governor, there was a $350 increase in value because of interest earned, and we did not pay income taxes on that. We owe $160 back taxes.

In the analysis of that year, however, the Internal Revenue Service found that there was owed to me from a previous year either $5,000 or $6,000—I've forgotten the exact figures—in back taxes. So, I will have to pay $160, approximately, to the IRS, and I will get a $5,000 or $6,000 refund that I had not known about. [Laughter] But that confirmation from the IRS just came to us this morning, and my wife came over at lunch and told me about it. That's what Jody has been waiting for. It's good news.

ARMS EMBARGO AGAINST TURKEY

Q. Mr. President, Turkey has openly stated that she is in a very bad situation in a military incapability. What is the alternative of the U.S. Government if the embargo is still not lifted and if Soviet Russia proposes a military aid to Turkey in this very desperate situation?

THE PRESIDENT. I would guess that Turkey would be reluctant to turn away from her historical alliance with the Western nations, those nations of NATO. Obviously we are not the only source of weapons or supplies for Turkey. And even under the present provisions of the arms embargo, the Congress last year did approve the sale, I think, of some F-4's, some fighter planes to Turkey, about $90 million worth.

Turkey has been very greatly disturbed because of the arms embargo, brought about, I think, 3 years ago by the fact that Turkey did violate the American law in using American-supplied weapons to go into Cyprus. I think that it's accurate to say that the Congress had good intentions 3 years ago when the embargo was enforced in hopes that it would have beneficial results.

The fact is, as I said earlier, it has not had beneficial results. It has driven a wedge between Greece and Turkey, between Greece and the United States, between Turkey and the United States, and it's weakened the alliance of Turkey and Greece toward NATO, and has, I think, brought into a deadlock or perpetuated a deadlock on Cyprus.

So, we've tried it; it didn't work. And my guess is that we will continue, we and the other NATO Allies, to include Turkey in all the plans—we will give them adequate supplies for their own defense within the capabilities of our nations and in compliance with the law.

My hope and my expectations are that the Congress will remove the embargo this year.

RIGHT TO PRIVACY

Q. Mr. President, on May 24, your Deputy Attorney General, Mr. Civiletti, urged Congress to pass a law that would require an American citizen to go to court to protect the privacy of his own personal records, and he said that to expect the Government to show reasonable cause to believe that a crime was involved was "just not realistic."

Now, as a leader in a world campaign to expand human rights throughout the world, how do you justify your administration's trying to punch holes into individual rights here at home?

THE PRESIDENT. My analysis of the attitude of the Attorney General is that he has been a foremost proponent of protecting individual rights. He has never deviated from this commitment so far as I know. I'm not familiar with the particular case to which you refer, and I'm hesitant to comment on it without being more thoroughly familiar with it. But if you would provide it to the Press Secretary, I'll be glad to try to answer it more definitively.

WILMINGTON 10

Q. Mr. President, Congressman Don Edwards has suggested that the administration file a friend of the court brief for the Wilmington 10, since no action has been taken on the part of the administration. Do you plan to follow up with a court brief, and if not, why?

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know. As you recognize, the case has been in the past in the Federal court. My understanding is that this group through their attorneys have now filed in the Federal court for some relief. And I think the Attorney General in the past, the Justice Department has inquired into the proper treatment of these defendants. But I don't believe that the Attorney General has any intention that—certainly that he's relayed to me—of joining in as a party to the Wilmington 10's application in court.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR NEW YORK CITY

Q. Mr. President, tomorrow the Senate Banking Committee will begin to consider the proposal you made to provide long-term Federal loans for New York City. How do you feel about the statements by some Senators that the banks and the unions in the city have not done enough and actually should be required to do more as a condition for further Federal aid, and about the apprehension by some Senators that this would allow excess spending by other cities?

THE PRESIDENT. My own belief is that the requirements placed on New York City, through their own volition and also because of the requests of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Blumenthal, are adequate. And the House of Representatives considered this matter very carefully and voted with a margin, I think, of more than 90 votes to go along with both short-term financing and also long-term financing.

My own belief is that the long-term financing is preferable. This would not endanger the Federal Government at all. We would not lose a penny on the guarantee of those loans; in fact, we would gain somewhat from interest paid by New York City on the guaranteed loans of the Federal Government. And I think it would remove the requirement that New York City act on an emergency basis in just 2 or 3 years at the most, when if they were given 7 or 8 years to work out of their problems, with careful constraints and monitoring of their actions, this would be a much more businesslike approach.

It would also let the labor unions, with their retirement funds, private investors, the banks, and others in New York, the sale of bonds themselves, which would be guaranteed by the Federal Government, and action by local and State officials to be much more carefully planned and much more harmonious.

So, for all practical purposes that I have been able to consider, I think that the long-range guarantee of those borrowed funds, those debts of New York City, is the best approach. My hope is that even though the committee may be much more averse to the proposal, that on the Senate floor itself, that the vote will be favorable and that the Senate will emulate what the House has done and approve those loan guarantees for New York City.

HUMAN RIGHTS IN THE SOVIET UNION

Q. In addition to the impending trial of Anatoly Shcharanskiy, who you have very vigorously denied was a CIA agent or had any intelligence functions, the Soviets have now arrested and imprisoned Vladimir Slepak, who you cabled in a telegram November 1976 you would make a cardinal element of your policy when you were elected, his defense and the defense of other Soviets who have been accused.

Do you regard the arrest of Mr. Slepak and some of the other Soviet actions in this field as a personal response to your human rights campaign?

THE PRESIDENT. No. I don't believe it's a personal response to a campaign that I have launched on human rights. I think the fact of the matter is, long before I came in office, the Soviet Union voluntarily signed the agreement at Helsinki, the last portion of which guaranteed certain basic civil rights within the boundaries of individual nations.

It's not as though other nations were intruding into the internal affairs of the Soviet Union. The Soviet Union voluntarily agreed to meet certain standards on the protection of the rights of its own citizens. There was set up a group within the Soviet Union and other countries to monitor compliance with the agreement, which the Soviets themselves had signed, and a substantial portion of that group in the Soviet Union have now been either harassed or imprisoned or tried, and I think this is something that is continuing.

I don't believe that it's an attack on me. I think it's a matter, as I said in my speech in Annapolis, of whether or not the Soviet Union can stand internal dissension and monitoring of the actions of the government by private citizens or private citizens groups.

I have expressed in the strongest possible terms, both publicly and through diplomatic channels, our concern about the actions of the Soviet Government. And I believe that even though they obviously have a right to make decisions within their own country, this works against the best interests of harmony and peace between the Soviet Union and other countries, because they look with concern upon the attitude of the Soviet Union towards its own citizens and they see in these actions a violation of an agreement, a solemn agreement, which the Soviet Union voluntarily signed.

Q. May I follow that up, Mr. President? Some of the people who have been arrested have said you have ceased to talk about particular cases, that you just speak now about human rights in general and that has left them victim to the Soviet crackdown.

Have you, in fact, ceased to come to the defense of people like Mr. Slepak and Mr. Shcharanskiy?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, you just mentioned three cases, and—maybe you mentioned four. I've commented on all of those, and I think that it's important for the world to monitor what goes on in the Soviet Union. I have not avoided a reference both publicly and privately to the Soviet Union on specific cases, and I intend to continue to do so.

FRANK CORMIER [Associated Press]. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much.

United States Ambassador to The Netherlands

*Nomination of Geri M. Joseph.
June 14, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate Geri M. Joseph, of Minneapolis, Minn., to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to The Netherlands. She would replace Robert J. McCloskey, who has been appointed Ambassador to Greece.

Joseph was born June 19, 1923, in St. Paul, Minn. She received a B.S. from the University of Minnesota in 1946.

From 1946 to 1953, Joseph was a staff writer for the Minneapolis Tribune. Since 1972 she has been contributing editor.

She is active in civic affairs and is a member of the President's Commission on Mental Health and the Minnesota Supreme Court Commission on the Mentally Disabled and the Courts.

University Press Centennial Observance

Proclamation 4575. June 14, 1978

*By the President of the United States
of America*

A Proclamation

America's colleges and universities have always met their responsibilities for preserving and enlarging the body of human knowledge. In our open society, they have an additional duty—that of making such knowledge available beyond the gates of the campus.

It was in recognition of that duty that the first university-affiliated press was established, in 1878, at Johns Hopkins University. In the century since, our country's university presses have established an admirable tradition of literary and graphic quality. Today the standard of excellence which they have established is being applied to an ever-increasing variety of subjects. As a result, one-sixth of all American books in print today are issued by American university presses.

In recognition of the impact, both here and abroad, of American university presses on culture and scholarship, the Ninety-fifth Congress, by joint resolution (S.J. Res. 140) has asked the President to issue a proclamation commemorating the American university press.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, JIMMY CARTER, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate the seven-day period ending on June 17, 1978 as University Press Week and call upon the people of the United States, as well as all interested groups and organizations, to mark that period with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this fourteenth day of June, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred seventy-eight, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and second.

White House Conference on Small Business

Memorandum From the President.
June 14, 1978

Memorandum for the Heads of Executive Departments and Agencies

Last month, I announced plans for a White House Conference on Small Business, in January 1980. It has been several decades since any Administration has focused upon the role of small business in the economy. By the time of the Conference, I would like to be able to show that the relationship between the Federal government and the small business sector has improved significantly.

In order to further the objectives of that Conference, your agency should select, in cooperation with SBA, at least one important advance to report to the Conference. Ideally, this means developing an initiative that will be visible and completed or well underway by December 1979.

The initiative you select should be relevant and important to your constituency, and to the small business community in general. An agency involved in regulation of small companies might, for example, simplify their regulations. Agencies with substantial procurement activity might increase their procurement from small businesses. Other areas for programs include: capital development, government regulation/paperwork, technology and industrial innovation, management assistance, minorities/women enterprise, antitrust/consumer affairs/competition, international trade policy, agricultural policy, manpower and human resources development, natural resources/energy tax policy.

To coordinate this project, please delegate as a liaison either an Assistant Secretary or Personal Assistant, to deal directly with the Honorable A. Vernon Weaver, the Small Business Administrator. He will discuss this request directly with you soon. You should develop preliminary options, in conjunction with SBA, by the end of August 1978. It may be useful to first select a few alternatives for discussion with SBA, and agree on the most acceptable program. The Domestic Policy Staff will conduct the final review of all options.

Thank you for your participation in this important effort to assist our country's small businesses.

National Rural Electric Cooperative Association

Remarks on Greeting Members of the Association's Youth Tour. June 14, 1978

I never saw so many cameras, I don't think.

If I could have your attention just a minute, let me say a few words. It's a great honor for me as President to stand here in front of the White House and to greet a group of young Americans who share a great deal with me. As representatives of the Rural Electric Cooperatives throughout the country, I know you share not only a pride in what has gone on before, but you have a unique perspective from which to assess the future of our great country.

I grew up on a farm, until I was 14 years old, that didn't have electricity, and our whole family was constrained very closely to a very narrow part of Georgia. And because of the heavy labor requirements we did not have much flexibility as far as expanding our minds or expanding our hearts or our influence or our interests beyond the farm itself. And then under President Franklin Roosevelt, I think in 1937, we formed the Sumter Electric Membership Corporation, and my father, who was just a farmer, became a director in the local REA chapter. This gave him an opportunity to participate in government. And he would go to the national conventions—once, I remember, he went to Chicago—and he would come up here to Washington as an outspoken farmer to argue for the protection and the expansion of the Rural Electric program.

Our life changed. Our horizons broadened. Later, my father became a member of the Sumter school board, Sumter County school board; later ran for the State legislature. And as a result of that, I got interested in politics and served on the school board, and then ran for the Georgia Senate, and then ran for Governor, and then ran for President. So, you might say that had it not been for the REA program, I would not be President. So I'm thankful for it, along with you.

I understand there's a young man here from Leesburg, Georgia—named Carroll Carter, I don't know if we're related—which is only a few miles from our home, who's also a part of the Sumter Electric Membership Corporation.

Let me say just a word about the future. We live in the greatest nation on Earth. We have an ability to make it even greater in the future. And I think the degree of achievement in a free country like ours, a democracy, depends upon the attitude of those who have a free heart and a free spirit and who are not bound by the mistakes of the present and the past.

You've been able to see it firsthand, from a wide geographical range and from different points of view, how well government can work together with your own family; not to constrain what your family does, but to liberate your family to do even greater things. And because you, in competition with 14 times more people than this, have been honored because of your own leadership to come to Washington, you now have an ability to go back home and to let them know the greatness of our own system of government.

It's not perfect. There's still enough room for improvement. And I would just like to ask you, as a former farmboy myself, to assess what you have received as a heritage from the past, the degree of individuality and freedom of spirit which you enjoy as a citizen of our great country, and with a clear perspective of the future and the courage of your own convictions, to work with me and others to make our country even better.

You and I are partners in a way. The responsibility of our Nation's character and future is on my shoulders, but it's also on yours. And you have a much clearer picture of what our Nation is and what it can be than I had at your age.

So, the future is unlimited for you and for our Nation. It's a clean, good, strong, idealistic, and compassionate nation. And we've formed a system of free enterprise and a system of government controlled by the people that gives us a good basis for future growth and achievement.

I'm thankful for what you've done already, but I'm even more thankful for what you can do and will do in the future.

Thank you for letting me be part of this ceremony.

NOTE: The President spoke at 3:50 p.m. on the South Lawn of the White House to representatives from 24 State electric cooperatives.

Reception For Black Business Executives

*Remarks at the White House Reception.
June 14, 1978*

THE PRESIDENT. It is good to see you. Please be seated.

I notice in the New York Times this morning that this is the first time this group has been recognized in the White House by the President. It is not nearly so much an honor for you to come here as it is for me to have you here. I deeply appreciate all the help that many of you have given me in the past, in my campaign to become President, and since I've been in this very important office.

Many of you have been here to the White House to counsel with me and others in shaping the policies of our country. But I noticed in the analysis of your achievements the substantial income that you all have derived from your own efforts. And I was invited by Jessie Hill and Johnny Johnston and Nat Goldstein and Herman Russell and a few others to bring this group in here to ask you to help me balance the Federal budget by—[laughter]—making a contribution to our Nation. And I'm sure you won't object. If you won't do it voluntarily, we'll collect through the Internal Revenue Service. [Laughter]

I think it's accurate to say that this meeting is one that could not possibly have been successful 10, 15 years ago. The dynamism of each one of you individually, your competence, your ambition, the recognition and esteem with which you are held by your customers and your clients, is an achievement in itself. And it's something of which I'm very proud as a leader of our Nation.

I think it's also accurate to say that although many of your businesses evolved primarily within the black community, that the influence has been extensive throughout the entire structure of the American economy. I notice that almost every one of your businesses is growing rapidly, and the competition is increasing to be recognized as one of the top 100. It's very good that the Black Enterprise publication would provide this opportunity for the rest of the Nation to recognize your achievement.

It does me good to stand here and be honored by your presence. And I think it's a real inspiration to Americans of all kinds, white or black, those who speak English fluently, those who perhaps speak Spanish, or those whose families have been here for generations, those whose families have just come, to recognize that in a society like our own, based on free enterprise, freedom, and the slow but rapidly increasing removal of discrimination, that there is an upward mobility possible if one has confidence in the American dream, confidence in oneself, and a respect for those with whom one has to deal.

I've tried to do what I could in a limited way, as President, to recognize the need to overcome past discriminations, the evidence of which still prevails throughout our country. We set a goal, for instance, to have at the end of last year a deposit of $100 million in black-owned banks, and we more than met that goal, and we hope to have a higher goal this year.

We introduced legislation for public works jobs with a provision in it that at least 10 percent of all the contracts had to be made with minority-owned businesses, and that's been successful. In the area under Secretary Kreps' direction, early in the year, she achieved more than a 15-percent achievement rate. And other Cabinet officers are now finding that where there was some reticence in their own departments, that when the law was laid down to them, that the goal was not difficult to meet. And I would like for that not to be a special thing in the future, but a natural part of the consciousness of all those in top ranks in Government who make those kinds of decisions.

In the Defense Department and other areas, we are trying to make purchases of routine supplies be channeled more and more into those businesses that are owned by minority citizens. And I believe that this is a trend not only that has been enthusiastically endorsed by many in my own administration but which has been accepted with enthusiasm by almost all Americans. I've not had any adverse reaction accusing us of setting artificial or unwarranted quotas, because I think there is a general recognition that in the past the opportunity has not been there for equal chance at government business and for a chance to compete on an equal basis in a free enterprise system.

We have benefited greatly in our administration, too, by having a large number of black administrators who help shape policy at the Cabinet level and in lower positions as well. And this has provided all of us with a growing insight into how we might have a more equitable opportunity in our great country.

I think the last thing I would like to say is that I need your continued advice.

You are men and women of stature, and others around you look to you for leadership. And I know that quite often, particularly among segments of any society against whom discrimination has been punitive, that you don't have to be in an elected office to speak with a loud and strong voice.

My own early government years were centered around Atlanta. And the university complex there, the business community, the professional community, as well as the governmental community provided a means for white leaders to understand, for the first time, what action could be taken which they might very well have never observed on their own initiative, thinking that they were doing an adequate job in providing equality of opportunity when they really didn't understand the special deprivations that quite often are hidden from those who don't suffer from them.

And I would like for you to provide that service to me throughout my service here in the White House, to give me your strong support when you think I am doing right, to work closely with me and other officials in the Government for counsel in the evolution of new programs, the implementation of programs, and for your tough criticisms when you think I fall short of what I should do to serve the same people who are served by you.

In the areas that don't specifically relate to minority groups, I know that you've reached a degree of influence and a breadth of vision that your efforts don't have to be confined to the black constituency in our country. You serve as Americans, not as black Americans, and I would hope that in the broad areas of civil rights in this country, human rights around the world, domestic affairs and foreign affairs, tax matters and welfare matters, housing, transportation, education, health, that you would use your own superlative positions in government and in business and in the professions to represent people in a much broader sense.

These are considerations that are very important to me and to you. And I would like there to be formed between me and you a continuing working relationship and a partnership.

This doesn't have to be related at all times directly to me alone. If a matter involves the Defense Department, then Secretary Alexander or Secretary Brown would be the natural one for you to go to. You don't have to come to me. And if it involves trade, exports, commerce, Secretary Kreps is the one for you to approach. And I think you know all the Cabinet officers. If it involves foreign affairs, obviously the Secretary of State or Andy Young would be ones that you could relate to easily.

And I would hope that your own interests would expand far beyond the boundaries of our own country. We have a very great advantage over other nations in the ethnic American groups that comprise our country's population. When I go to Poland, the Polish American group is a reservoir not only of advice and counsel to me about historical occurrences or problems that presently exist in Poland, but they provide an introduction for me to that country in Eastern Europe that I may not be able to get at all through the State Department. But those people who still have relatives and friends who correspond and travel and visit can provide that sound, human basis on which better relations can be predicated.

The same thing, obviously, applies to our long-time friends and allies in Europe—Italy, Germany, France, and so forth. But I think there is a new awakening interest in our country now in Africa. And many of you have a special interest in Africa. You're trusted just because you happen to be black. And I think one of the greatest things that's happened to me in foreign affairs has been the appointment of Andy Young at the United Nations, who gives a sense of compassion, understanding, sensitivity, trust, the ease of communication, that makes him irreplaceable and also gives him a sense of security so that he's not timid, as you may have noticed, in speaking out when he disagrees with me. [Laughter]

Well, you can do the same, perhaps on a more limited basis, but that's the kind of support and help and counsel that I need from you. And of course, all these efforts don't have to be through government. I would hope that if you have a product to export, that you might use your position as a trader in international affairs to strengthen the ties of friendship and understanding between our country and those countries that encompass your new customers.

When I went to Nigeria, for instance, I took Jessie Hill along with me. He is an oldtime friend of mine. And he was able to expand the influence of my presence there many times over. And I think this is the kind of thing that all of you can do.

So, I would just like to say that although you have reached a position of great achievement with justifiable pride and the worth of recognition, I would like for you to keep your horizons broadened in the future, because you are secure now in business and professional achievement. And I would hope that whether or not you ever serve in government on a full-time basis, that you might try to expand the beneficial influence of our country.

You have a great success story to tell and to demonstrate in a personal way, not only for you, your family, your friends, your associates, but also for our country, which is the greatest nation on Earth.

Thank you very much.

EARL G. GRAVES. Mr. President, Mrs. Carter, members of the Cabinet and Congress, honored guests:

On behalf of my fellow business men and women, I want to thank you for hosting this afternoon's briefing and reception and for giving recognition to the significant contributions of black business persons to the health and growth of the Nation's economy. We at Black Enterprise magazine are pleased to have played a part in identifying, highlighting, and bringing to the fore the tenacious and valiant struggle for success so many minority business persons have made and are continuing to make for a share of the American dream.

Today I feel as if the pages of Black Enterprise have come alive in the White House, for we, the chief executives of this Nation's leading black businesses, have all come together in this Nation's Capital on an invitation from the President of the United States to share with him and his administration our economic hopes and concerns, which is indeed an historic moment.

We have come not for a social gathering, but because this President has pledged to do more to help minority enterprise than any other Chief Executive officer in recent history and because he is working hard to right the huge urban ills of this Nation, which affect both our businesses and our lives. We are here to do more than simply hold President Carter to his promises; we are here to do all we can to help this administration in its efforts to strengthen the economic fiber of this Nation and to make certain minority businesses obtain their fair share of American commerce.

We have come offering our input and counsel with the hope that this invitation represents a new level of constructive communication between the black business community and President Carter and his administration.

Mr. President, on behalf of my fellow business men and women, I would like to present you with a bound copy of this year's Black Enterprise 100.

THE PRESIDENT. I know how intense the competition is. I understand that Mr. Graves has been threatened already with being kicked off the list next year unless he works very hard this year. [Laughter]

Thank you again for being here as our guests in your White House. And now my wife and I would like to meet every one of you personally, if you don't object. And perhaps if you would just pause as you shake hands, we would like very much to have a photograph individually with you. So we will meet you outside, both of us.

Thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 5:23 p.m. in the State Dining Room at the White House. Earl G. Graves is publisher of Black Enterprise.

Visit of Prime Minister Desai of India

Joint Communiqué. June 15, 1978

At the invitation of President Jimmy Carter, the Prime Minister of the Republic of India, Morarji Desai, paid an official visit to the United States of America between June 9-15, 1978.

In the talks the Indian participants were:

Morarji Desai, Prime Minister, Government of India

Atal Bihari Vajpayee, Minister of External Affairs, Government of India

N. A. Palkhivala, Ambassador of India in Washington

V. Shankar, Principal Secretary to the Prime Minister

J. S. Mehta, Foreign Secretary, External Affairs Ministry and others

The American participants were:

Jimmy Carter, President of the United States of America

Walter Mondale, Vice President of the United States of America

Zbigniew Brzezinski, Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs

Warren Christopher, Acting Secretary of State of the United States of America

David Aaron, Deputy Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs

Robert Goheen, Ambassador of the USA to the Republic of India and others

President Carter and Prime Minister Desai held extensive and useful talks in a spirit of mutual confidence, candor and friendship. They agreed that there has been a significant improvement in bilateral relations over the past year, marked by a comprehensive exchange of correspondence between them and President Carter's visit to India in January 1978. This should be continued and deepened, building upon the common principles enunciated in their Joint Declaration signed in New Delhi in January 1978.<sup>1</sup> They also had a broad exchange of views on major international issues of common concern and reviewed the current situation in South Asia. The views of the two sides reflected wide areas of agreement on the issues discussed.

Prime Minister Desai and President Carter devoted special attention to questions of world peace. They agreed that world peace can only be assured through effective measures to halt the arms race, particularly in the nuclear field, including the prevention of the proliferation of nuclear weapons and their ultimate elimination. The Prime Minister welcomed the progress being made in CTB and SALT negotiations, as described by the President. They called for a stronger and more effective role for the United Nations in the field of disarmament, and emphasized their active support for the Special Session on Disarmament of the United Nations General Assembly.

The President and the Prime Minister agreed on the urgent need to find a comprehensive, just and lasting solution to the problems of the Middle East. It should be based on Israel's withdrawal from territories occupied as a result of the 1967 war, respect for the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people, and steps to ensure the independence, territorial integrity and security of all states of the region.

The President and the Prime Minister reviewed developments in Africa and agreed that peace, racial equality, stability, and economic development with particular attention to the needs of the individual, were essential elements of their policies toward the continent. They agreed that African problems should be solved without outside intervention which can aggravate regional conflicts and inhibit their resolution.

The President and the Prime Minister agreed that the Ethiopia-Somalia conflict should be resolved by peaceful means, respecting the legitimate aspirations of the peoples of the region within the framework of territorial integrity and in conformity with the principles of the Charters of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity.

The President and the Prime Minister expressed support for the legitimate aspirations of the African peoples to self-determination and majority rule and they condemned racism in all forms. They reaffirmed the inalienable right of the peoples of Zimbabwe and Namibia to sovereignty and independent development and the necessity of ensuring a rapid transfer of power to the African majority, in the spirit of pertinent United Nations resolutions.

The President and the Prime Minister reviewed the situation in South Asia and the recent events in Afghanistan. They expressed the hope that while preserving their independent personalities, stability, trust and beneficial cooperation among the countries of the region would continue.

The President described the state of talks between the USA and USSR on the stabilization of their military presence in the Indian Ocean. The Prime Minister expressed the hope that these discussions would continue and result in the eventual removal of all great power military presence in the Ocean.

The President and the Prime Minister had extensive and highly useful discussions on the Indo-U.S. Nuclear Cooperation Agreement and statutory requirements affecting the continued supply of enriched uranium from the United States. They discussed measures to ensure non-proliferation of nuclear weapons, including appropriate universal means of ensuring that nuclear energy is not misused for military purposes. They agreed that the dialogue between the two countries will continue. President Carter pledged to make every effort consistent with American law to maintain fuel supplies for Tarapur and continue nuclear cooperation with India.

The President and the Prime Minister noted with satisfaction the development of economic exchanges between their two countries, and agreed that there is potential for expanding them substantially. President Carter noted that Commerce

Secretary Kreps would visit India later this year to explore that potential.

The President and the Prime Minister welcomed the initiative of the India-U.S. Business Council in implementing a program designed to promote and facilitate cooperation between Indian and U.S. commercial organizations in construction and engineering projects in third countries. The President noted that the International Executive Service Corps would be assigning a highly qualified, retired American businessman to New Delhi this fall to pursue this important Business Council project.

The President and the Prime Minister welcomed the successful conclusion of negotiations for an Indo-U.S. understanding providing for concessions under the Tropical Products Group of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations as an indication of their mutual desire to contribute to a dynamic and open world trading system. They agreed on the desirability of fighting protectionism and working toward a more open and fair global trading system through a successful conclusion to the Multilateral Trade Negotiations. They also agreed on the need for close consultations in these final stages of the negotiations. It was also agreed that contributions from developing countries should not be inconsistent with their individual development, financial and trade needs. They took note of the recent steps taken by India to liberalize foreign trade.

Prime Minister Desai and President Carter reviewed the relations between the world's industrialized and developing nations. They favored further exchanges of views between senior officials from the United States and India, as well as from other developed and developing countries. Through such exchanges both developed and developing countries can improve their understanding of their common interests and responsibilities in the equitable operation of the global economic system.

The President and the Prime Minister expressed satisfaction on the progress of discussions between the two governments on joint projects in agricultural research, extension and education. They also welcomed the progress made on the design of joint projects in the area of solar technology and expressed the hope that they would be speedily implemented.

Prime Minister Desai met with members of the House of Representatives and the Senate. The talks showed a mutual desire to deepen understanding between the two countries and peoples.

The President and Prime Minister expressed their satisfaction at the results of their talks and agreed to continue the bilateral dialogue through future meetings and correspondence as well as through regular official-level consultations and within the India-U.S. Joint Commission.

Prime Minister Desai also visited New York, California, and Nebraska.

Prime Minister Desai expressed his warm thanks to President Carter for the friendly and hospitable reception extended to him throughout his visit which is the natural expression of the friendship and shared values of the American and Indian peoples. He was particularly pleased that his tour took him to both coasts of the United States and included the opportunity to visit a working farm in the American mid-West.

United States Ambassador to Upper Volta

*Nomination of Thomas D. Boyatt.
June 15, 1978*

The President today announced that he will nominate Thomas D. Boyatt, of Cincinnati, Ohio, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Republic of Upper Volta. He would replace Pierre R. Graham, who has resigned.

Boyatt was born March 4, 1933, in Cincinnati. He received a B.A. from Princeton University in 1955 and an M.A. from Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy in 1956. He served in the U.S. Air Force from 1956 to 1959.

Boyatt joined the Foreign Service in 1960 and was posted in Antofagasta, Luxembourg, and Nicosia, was detailed to the Treasury Department, and took Greek language training. In 1970 and 1971, he was Special Assistant to the Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern and South Asian Affairs.

From 1972 to 1974, Boyatt was Country Director for Cyprus at the State Department. He was in the senior seminar in foreign policy at the State Department in 1974 and 1975. Since 1975 he has been Deputy Chief of Mission in Santiago.

New York City Financing Legislation

Statement on Action by the Senate Banking Committee. June 15, 1978

Today's action by the Senate Banking Committee represents an historic juncture along New York City's path to economic recovery and financing self-sufficiency. When we first proposed guarantees last winter, the prevailing view was that such legislation could never be enacted. Today's vote reflects national support for the city and the commitment of the Banking Committee to approve a responsible and permanent solution to the city's problem.

I understand that the committee will consider further amendments tonight. We are following continuing developments closely, and I would hope that the committee would not add conditions of a sort that would be inconsistent with our objective of a workable and responsible financing plan.

Atlanta, Georgia

*Remarks to Members of the Southern Baptist Brotherhood Commission.
June 16, 1978*

President Jimmy Allen, Ambassador Dennis, Reverend Hardy, my good friend Glendon McCullough, fellow members of the Southern Baptist Brotherhood, fellow Christians, my friends:

It was almost worth the trip to Atlanta just to discover that Baptists wrote "Blest Be the Tie That Binds" and the words to "My Country Tis of Thee."

I've been reading about the convention with great excitement. I read about the breakfast plans this morning. I understand that Glendon McCullough was trying to finance a cooperative program. [Laughter] This may have worked with Episcopalians and other wealthy people, but Baptists have a limit on what we can contribute for breakfasts. [Laughter] Perhaps if he had asked Anita Bryant this morning, there may have been more success.

This morning, as a Christian, as a Baptist layman, I'm pleased to be here, but I would like to talk to you from the perspective of a President.

I've been in office now not quite a year and a half, and I've seen very clearly that government touches every life and that what the American Government is touches people in every other nation because of the power, the strength, the influence, the wealth of our country.

This puts a tremendous responsibility on me as a public official, but it also puts a tremendous responsibility on you, every one of you, as American citizens, because in a free society like our own, we are not only blessed with a chance to grow, to learn, to stretch our hearts and minds in total freedom, but our religious convictions teach us how that freedom might be used and the limits of it as we serve others. And in a democracy we know that we shape and control the government to the extent that we are willing to participate and contribute our influence.

So, in effect, as Americans, as Christians, we not only shape our own lives and set an example for our neighbors immediately around us, but we also shape what our country is and what it hopes to be in the future, therefore influencing people throughout the world.

As President, I still look on government in a personal way, which is a surprise to some people. Last year I got a letter from a child who said, "Now that you've been in office for 6 months or so, would you rather be President or a real person?"

[Laughter]

That question has kind of preyed on my mind. And as I prepared my remarks for this morning, I thought about it. And as I speak to you, my brothers and sisters in Christ, I'll keep that before me.

In a modern, fast-changing, technical world, we tend to be dehumanized, stamped out in a pattern. Individual traits that give us a uniqueness in God's world tend to be ironed out and smoothed over. This creates conflicts in us, because there is a difference between our attitude toward our private, inward life and our public, outward life, no matter how broad the scope of our participation might be in public affairs.

I remember in Plains, Georgia—that's a small town which is my home—our house was only about 30, 40 yards from the railroad track. And as a tiny boy I used to stand there and watch those tremendous steam engines go by, and the big yellow wheels, and I would watch the connecting rods pushing forward, pulling back, pushing forward, pulling back, and the wheel went around and the train went forward. And I couldn't understand it for a long time, but now I see very clearly that unless a connecting rod went forward and back, that the wheel could not have continued to turn, and the train could not have made any progress.

Well, we as Baptists, as Christians, as Americans, are trying to make progress. The bold mission effort is a new ideal, a new program, a new commitment, a new concept which lets us as a denomination spread our influence in a beneficent way much more rapidly, much more broadly, than we had contemplated a few years ago.

I've noticed this convention has concentrated on how we might use our position in life to greater influence in the service of God. But quite often we are much more interested in using our influence for ourselves, for material benefit, for stature, for a good reputation, for influence, even to win in the competition of life than we were or are or possibly will be in God's service.

When I was a naval officer, a scientist, a businessman, I was intensely committed to doing well. I worked many hours every day. I thought at night about how I might do better. When I was a candidate for public office, particularly the last campaign I ran, I gave a hundred percent of everything in me to win, to let the American people know the good side of my character, perhaps to conceal my defects, to let them realize how badly I wanted to serve.

I didn't waste any time and neither did my family, and neither did many friends. But I have to stand here and confess to you that I've never given that much of a sustained commitment to serving God.

But this is not an inherent limit on human beings just because I or perhaps some of you are guilty of that misapplication of priorities, because there have been many times in the past when individual people adopted in their own lives a bold mission, and not only changed their own lives but were able to use their lives in a way that carried on through history.

Abraham Lincoln, Mahatma Gandhi, Martin Luther King, Jr., were people who used their influence in political ways to correct wrongs, to open up new possibilities for other people to expand their hearts, to expand their minds, to live better lives. They lost their lives through violence in this carrying out of a bold mission for themselves.

In our own denomination, we've seen the same thing. Luther Rice, Annie Armstrong, Lottie Moon<sup>1</sup> gave their lives, quite often unrecognized, unappreciated while they were alive, but we know that they transformed the concept of Christian missions because they persevered. They had journeys, a journey inward, a journey outward; inward to find peace of one's spirit, to struggle with doubt, to struggle with fear, to lay one's fears on God, to build up strength to turn outward for an expanded life, a more fruitful life to benefit others.

These two are linked, sometimes shifting from one to another in a matter of a second or two. Sometimes long periods of time are required to shift from an inner finding of one's self to the use of one's self for others. Sometimes Baptists have been too inclined to turn inwardly and to stay that way, within a person, within a home, within a church. That can be a defect, but it's not necessarily good for us to deny, because of a search for inner peace, the rest of the world. As we know ourselves, we know God better. We are able to face fears, leading to a full life.

Some of us in public service turn to politics, to public service on a full-time basis. This is not contrary to Christian beliefs. Isaiah, Jeremiah pronounced God's judgment in the very center of political power.

So, there is no conflict that prevents bringing one's personal religious life together with the political arena. There is a danger, obviously, of conflict, of collusion—Baptists are very much aware of that.

Thomas Jefferson, in the original days of our country, said that he was fearful that the church might influence the state to take away human liberty. Roger Williams, who created the first Baptist church in our country, was afraid that the church might be corrupted by the state. These concerns led to the first amendment, which prohibits the establishment of any official state church, and on the other hand, in the same sentence, prohibits the passing of any laws that might interfere with religious freedom.

Separation is specified in the law, but for a religious person, there is nothing wrong with bringing these two together, because you can't divorce religious beliefs from public service. And at the same time, of course, in public office you cannot impose your own religious beliefs on others.

I have never detected nor experienced any conflict between God's will and my political duty. It's obvious that when I violate one, at the same time I violate the other.

Politics is not unsavory. It's not degrading. It's not something of which we need to be ashamed. In my acceptance speech at the Democratic Convention almost 2 years ago, I said that I wanted an opportunity to translate, aggressively translate love into simple justice. Well, that's my chance as one individual, no better than you, to adopt a bold mission.

All of us in this room, in our own special way, are influential. And we know that Christ says that unto whomsoever much is given, much will be required, and to whom men commit much, they will demand more.

Too many of us as Americans, as Christians, are derelict in the duty of taking our influence, our power, our wealth, our free time, and dealing with those issues that still remain as a great challenge to us all. We tend to even ignore the fact that challenges are there.

I'll just give you one example: human rights. More than a century ago, our ancestors, yours and mine, were in the forefront of those dedicated to the preservation of slavery. More recently, you and I were not in the forefront of those dedicated to eliminating segregation, racial discrimination among our own neighborhood, friends, particularly in the South. We've spoken with a voice on this basic issue that's too timid.

I was pleased this morning to read in the New York Times the absolutely beautiful resolution passed by the Southern Baptist Convention concerning human rights. But the passage of a resolution is not enough, unless we as individuals reach out in our own community, in our Nation, around the world, to detect and to destroy those elements of life which still interfere with the realization of those hopes and dreams of people who are afflicted and deprived.

I hope that our country never again turns its back because of convenience or embarrassment as we did when millions of Jews lost their lives in the Holocaust during the Second World War. Of course, this is just one example, and in my office at the White House, I have to deal with many domestic problems, many other international problems: peace, freedom, nuclear explosives, the sale of weapons, terrorism, rapidly expanding populations without food. But this is more than a list of political problems. These are also for you and me moral problems, because they violate the very precepts of God in which we believe.

Reinhold Niebuhr, in his book "Moral Man and Immoral Society," pointed out the difference between a society and people. The expectations and demands on a person are a much higher standard. A person should have as our goal complete agape love. The most we can expect from a society is to institute simple justice.

So, we as people have to be better, particularly if we are blessed with the opportunity to demonstrate our worth. Leaders also have to be careful not to be too timid.

Sometimes we are reluctant to deal with a complicated issue or a contentious issue; controversy scares us. There's no doubt in my mind that adopting a commitment for a bold mission program is fraught with difficulties and the prospect of failure, and no one likes to fail because you bring upon yourself, if you obviously fail, a bad reputation, derision, scorn, embarrassment. And sometimes the best way to avoid failure is not to try very hard, not to be in the center of a noble effort, or to quit soon enough so you will not be associated in the end with disappointment.

I want our country to be preeminent in many ways, not just preeminent in military might but preeminent in those characteristics of which we can all be proud after careful scrutiny. I want our country to be strong enough in all these elements, military and otherwise, so we never have to prove we are strong.

As you know, a person who is strong and knows it can then afford not to prove it and can be gentle and fair and patient and understanding and generous.

When I leave here in a few minutes I'll go to Panama to exchange documents of ratification of the new treaties concerning the canal, which the Senate has passed now with more than a two-thirds vote.

This has been a difficult issue, but our Nation has spoken, and we've shown that we are strong, powerful, but we are also generous, we are also fair, we treat other people as equals.

We know that our security is bound up with that of others. We cannot any more depend upon the isolation of friendly neighbors and deep oceans. And we cannot any more depend upon a dominant military force, which we did have a few years ago, with a monopoly on nuclear weapons.

So, we cannot ignore others because we are isolated. We cannot dominate others any more because we are strong. We have a new opportunity, a new responsibility. And how we handle this changing factor in an international world will be a measure of our emotional and our spiritual maturity.

Power, wealth, is not enough. We must be willing and able to analyze our own faults. And I think anyone knows that the character of American life has been tested and the fabric held together as we experienced the Vietnam war, the Watergate disgraces, the revelations about the CIA.

Our country was tested, and because our people had an inner strength, our country has not been permanently damaged, but my judgment is that it's now stronger than ever.

So, a country will have authority and influence because of moral factors, not military factors; because it can be humble and not blatant and arrogant; because our people and our country want to serve others and not dominate others. As a person has a conflict with God, we know that because of that we have conflict with our fellow human beings. And a nation without morality will soon lose its influence around the world.

So, to close, let me say this: A nation, like a person, has to continually be on an inward journey and an outward journey, and we grow stronger in the process. There's a relationship between personal leadership and a people.

Moses demonstrated this, as you know, when God called him to lead the Israelites out of Egypt. He was not ready to assume that responsibility until he had spent 40 years tending sheep, acquiring a family, discussing the problems with his father-in-law, Jethro. And he finally was able, reluctantly, to turn to God for help and support and a kind of a partnership, and then he was able to work with and sometimes against the people of Israel as they made their long, tortuous journey.

What are the goals of a person or a denomination or a country? They are all remarkably the same: a desire for peace, a need for humility, for examining one's faults and turning away from them; a commitment to human rights in the broadest sense of the word, based on a moral society concerned with the alleviation of suffering because of deprivation or hatred or hunger or physical affliction; and a willingness, even an eagerness, to share one's ideals, one's faith with others, to translate love in a person to justice.

Thomas Jefferson, as he considered what the emblem of our Nation ought to be, the Seal of the United States, suggested that it be a picture of the people of Israel following a cloud and a column of fire, because he saw this inner journey and the outward journey interrelated, and also visualized, although he was not a very deeply religious man on the outside, he saw that dependence on God was good for his new Nation that he loved.

So, the great outward journey of the Israelites, of our own Nation, was based on an inward journey, where peace was derived from an inner strength and an awareness of the will of God and a willingness to carry this will out.

We cannot succeed without this. Moses couldn't. Lincoln couldn't. Lottie Moon couldn't. And neither can we as Baptists, Christians, or as Americans.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:47 a.m. at the Omni International Coliseum to the commission's National Conference of Baptist Men. In his opening remarks, he referred to Jimmy Allen, president of the Southern Baptist Convention, Francis A. Dennis, Liberian Ambassador to the United States, William E. Hardy, chairman of the board of trustees, and Glendon McCullough, executive director, Southern Baptist Brotherhood Commission, an agency of the Southern Baptist Convention.

Prior to his remarks, the President presented certificates of special recognition on behalf of the Brotherhood Commission to Curtis Hickman and William White for their work in the commission's programs.

Visit to Panama

*Remarks at the Welcoming Ceremony.
June 16, 1978*

President Lakas, General Torrijos, my friends from Panama and the United States, and to the children from the schools of Panama who so enthusiastically have sung our national anthems:

To all of them, I wish to express my thanks for having given such a happy beginning to our visit. Thank you.

I have looked forward to this trip for a long time. As all of you know, the relations between the United States and Panama have been an important part of my daily work since the day I became President. I have learned a great deal about the history and accomplishments of the Panamanian nation, and about the pride and determination of the Panamanian people. So, I don't come to you as a stranger, but as a friend and partner.

Throughout the long negotiations and debate on the canal treaties, our two nations have been blessed with the continuing encouragement of our friends in the hemisphere. I especially appreciate the fact that the leaders of five Latin American and Caribbean democracies are here in Panama today as a testimony to the significance of this historic transfer.

We meet as neighbors—some richer, some larger, some with resources vital to the others, each with different needs and problems. But we share the common goal of creating a world where all people may devote their energies to improving human life.

In the years since World War II, much of the Earth's geography has been redrawn—colonial empires have dissolved, and new, sovereign nations have been born. The control of many of the passages, both natural and manmade, that connect the Earth's lands and seas has shifted from one nation to another. Too much blood, too much strife, too much bitterness, have gone into many of these changes.

But transferring control of the Panama Canal continues and strengthens the bond that was forged between our nations in its building. There will be no bloodshed, no bitterness, no instant when the path between the Earth's two great oceans will be closed.

This is a moment of great historic promise. The nations of our hemisphere are embarking on a new, more equal relationship. For 75 years the United States and Panama have been friends. Now we will also be partners, setting an example for the world of how nations can resolve their differences peacefully and to their mutual benefit, thus ensuring that the responsible, long-term management of an important international resource, instead of being endangered, will be forever guaranteed.

Thank you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 3:10 p.m. at Tocumen International Airport in Panama City in response to remarks by Brig. Gen. Omar Torrijos Herrera, Chief of the Government and Commander of the National Guard of Panama. Demetrio B. Lakas is President of Panama.

The President spoke in Spanish, and the translation of his remarks follows the transcript.

Visit to Panama

Remarks on Signing the Protocol of Exchange of Instruments of Ratification Regarding the Panama Canal Treaties. June 16, 1978

General Torrijos, President Lakas, President Pérez, President López Michelsen, President López Portillo, President Carazo, Prime Minister Manley, distinguished guests and friends:

First of all, I want to thank General Torrijos and President Lakas for their invitation to participate in this great ceremony.

I came to Panama and accepted this in-vation, because I want to dramatize my appreciation for this great achievement—a firmer, more productive friendship between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama and, more broadly, a gain for the cause of peace and cooperation among all nations.

We are honored by the presence of the leaders of the five democratic countries who gave encouragement to us and advice to both nations during the final treaty negotiations. I'm grateful to them not only for the serious and helpful role they played in those final days and weeks but also for their continuing leadership in dealing with such crucial matters as world peace, nuclear nonproliferation, the status of human rights and democratic governments, and better relationships between the developed nations and the developing countries of the world.

It is now three quarters of a century since the first spade of earth was turned in the building of the Panama Canal. This path between two seas remains one of the greatest and most benevolent creations ever wrought by human labor and by human ingenuity.

As a neutral artery for the ships of all nations, the canal has contributed immensely to the peaceful work of the world. The treaties we solemnize today will help perpetuate that peaceful work for many generations to come.

Under the treaties, our two governments agree to maintain the neutrality and security of the canal. At the same time, we reaffirm our commitment to honor national sovereignty and the principle of nonintervention. These principles are enshrined in the charters of the Organization of American States and the United Nations.

During the long and difficult negotiations, both sides held to a vision of friendship and good will. Both sides were determined to build a new relationship of mutual respect, fairness, and equity. Because of that vision, because of that determination, we were finally able to reach agreement.

Now, after 14 years on opposite sides of the bargaining table, we sit together as partners. We are equally committed to putting into practice the agreements we have forged. During the period of transition which lies ahead, the United States and Panama will be working closely together. Both our countries want that transition to be smooth and effective.

Under the treaties, both nations are committed to safeguarding the interests of those Americans and Panamanians who have operated the canal so efficiently and so expertly during its period of American stewardship.

Together, our two countries have set an example for peaceful and successful negotiation that has few parallels in history. We have demonstrated our mutual sincerity and good will. In the face of disagreements not only between the two nations but within the nations themselves, disagreements that were initially very deep, in the face of our vast disparity in size and power, we dealt with each other in good faith as equals and with equal determination to overcome all differences.

During the years ahead we will work as partners to make the promise of the treaties a reality. We, the people of the United States, and you, the people of Panama, still have history to make together.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 4:25 p.m. at the Coliseo-Gimnasio Nuevo Panama (Panama City Coliseum) in response to remarks by General Torrijos.

Also present at the ceremony were President Carlos Andrés Pérez of Venezuela, President Alfonso López Michelsen of Colombia, President José López Portillo of Mexico, President Rodrigo Carazo Odio of Costa Rica, and Prime Minister Michael N. Manley of Jamaica.

Visit to Panama

*Remarks at the Cinco de Mayo Plaza.
June 16, 1978*

General Torrijos, dear friends of Panama, leaders from the other countries:

It is a great day for the people of Panama and the people of the United States. Thank you very much. Thank you all.

This day marks the beginning of a new partnership between Panama and the United States. The new treaties embody our mutual commitment to work together to assure that the Panama Canal shall always remain open, secure, and accessible to the vessels of all nations.

With the help of the five great American democracies whose leaders are with us today, Panama and the United States reached an agreement. In the process we breathed new life into old principles—principles of peace, nonintervention, mutual respect, and cooperation.

It is easy to honor these principles in theory. What our two countries have done is much harder and much more meaningful. We have made them the basis for action. We have shown that even great changes in international relations—changes that involve deep emotions and powerful material interests—can be accomplished through putting these principles to work.

That is why the significance of our joint achievement goes far beyond the special concerns of the United States and Panama. That is why I believe that we stand on the threshold of a new era of inter-American understanding and cooperation.

Let us now apply these principles to the overriding concerns of our hemisphere—peace, human rights and dignity, and economic development.

Let us resolve anew to settle the remaining territorial disputes in our hemisphere through peaceful negotiation. Let us work together to bring into effect the Treaty of Tlatelolco, which bans nuclear weapons from Latin America.

Let us advance the cause of human dignity and build a hemisphere in which citizens of every country are free from torture and arbitrary arrest, free to speak and write as they please, free to participate in the determination of their own destiny.

Let us build a fairer, more cooperative international economy, one which fosters social justice and helps the world's poor lift themselves out of misery.

As we move toward these goals, we will need not new slogans, but a new spirit. In the peaceful process of negotiating the treaties, we have shown the world a spirit which recognizes and respects the rights of others and seeks to help all people to fulfill their legitimate aspirations with confidence and dignity. That spirit must continue to bind us together in the years to come—the people of Panama and the United States and the people of all the Americas who are working to bring into being a hemisphere free from war, free from want, and free from any oppression of human liberty.

Thank you all.

NOTE: The President spoke at 6 p.m. at the plaza in Panama City in response to remarks by General Torrijos. He spoke in Spanish, and the translation of his remarks follows the transcript.

Visit to Panama

Remarks at a Reception for Visiting Dignitaries. June 16, 1978

First of all, let me say that this has been a wonderful experience for all of us from the United States to come here and be received with such great hospitality by President Lakas and by General Torrijos, their wives, and the people of Panama. And we're also deeply honored to have the presence of those who have been instrumental through their encouragement, through their tough criticisms when we were laggard in proceeding, to inspire us to reach an agreement that would be not only good for us but for the people of Panama and, I hope, the entire hemisphere.

This evening's entertainment will follow a very productive discussion among six of us who represent people hungry for peace, hungry for a better life for our people, and hungry for a constant consultation whereby we might derive from one another both inspiration and wisdom. So, I would like to ask the interpreter to repeat those words, and then I would like to add some other comments, very brief, about our negotiators and about the United States Senators who have also made this action possible.

After the difficult debates in our country, it's also a great pleasure to be among so many people who are in favor of the ratification of the treaties. I wish we had Mr. George Gallup up here tonight to take a poll among this group. [Laughter]

I know that the people of Panama have become acquainted with the Senators of the United States. We have a group of about 10 or 12 Senators who have come down here. If you don't know them by looking at their faces, you know them by their voices. We brought the good voices with us, and I think it's very important that you recognize their leadership and courage.

As has been the case in Panama, this was a very difficult decision for our Nation to make, because we have always been very proud of the Panama Canal and proud of the way it was built and managed and proud of the peaceful way in which it has been maintained for the world. And we have proven, through a two-thirds vote under very difficult political circumstances, the commitment of the American people to these treaties. And I think it might be good to compliment the Senate, too, on the fast action they took—only 38 days—whereas the negotiators had taken, as you know, 14 years. This is a credit to the Senate, and I want to express those words as well.

In conclusion, I would like to recognize the negotiators who, with great patience and great determination and great wisdom, overcame immense difficulties in reaching a successful conclusion. I believe that the agreement which has now been reached between Panama and the United States of America has established a degree of momentum that will lead to even greater cooperation and friendship in the years to come.

I understand that we had too much momentum during the negotiations, that Ambassador Bunker now owns Contadora Island. [Laughter] And I understand that Ambassador Lewis owns the farm that Ambassador Bunker thought he had in Vermont. It happened that in 1903 Ambassador Bunker bought this from a Frenchman, and because of that, Ambassador Lewis claimed it as his own. [Laughter]

So, we have perhaps overnegotiated, but we've established a spirit of compromise, friendship, and a momentum which, in my opinion, will pay rich dividends in the future for our two countries and for others who have observed this great accomplishment.

And my strongest feeling at this moment is to express my appreciation to those of Panama and to those of our own country and to those who helped them. And I would like to say thanks to the negotiators, who made this possible.

NOTE: The President spoke at 8:30 p.m. in the Yellow Room at the Palacio Presidencial.

Visit to Panama

Toast at the State Dinner. June 17, 1978

General Torrijos, President Lakas, President Pérez, President Michelsen, President Carazo, Prime Minister Manley, distinguished friends from Panama and the United States:

It's a great pleasure for me to be in a country where people are so hospitable and friendly, where the President has the first name of Jimmy and the Foreign Minister is a graduate of the University of Georgia, and where the Chief of State is the only person in the world that knows better than I do the Senators of the United States. [Laughter]

I noticed tonight that when he has not met the Senators before, as soon as he hears their voice, he knows who it is. [Laughter] We've brought the Senators with good voices. [Laughter]

We have found the Panamanian negotiators and their Chief of State to be tough, prudent, fair, tenacious, friendly, and gracious.

As we move toward a time of increased friendship, equality, and partnership, many people in the United States have taken the time and effort to learn more about Panama. We have learned about the pride of the people, their dignity, and we've seen at first hand now the tremendous new investment, under this administration, in those who in the past have been deprived and poor.

We have seen the rapid development of the poor in the rural and urban areas and the heavy investment that has been made in alleviating hunger here, increasing the economic well-being of the people, and the heavy emphasis on better health care and better education. Primary education is available to all, and the enrollment in the schools increased, at one time, 80 percent in just 3 years.

I grew up on a farm in Georgia that did not have running water, and I've observed the statistics that show that formerly less than 50 percent of the people in this country had running, fresh water. Now more than 85 percent are scheduled to have this very basic need filled by the year 1980.

General Torrijos has a great slogan. He wants to do away with the class struggle and have a classroom struggle instead.

We in the United States know that the world is changing. We've recognized this fact by establishing a new relationship with our longtime friend and neighbor, Panama. And I believe that we have now seen the clear need to recognize the innate and sacred sovereignty of the people in this great country, to reaffirm our commitment to the principle of nonintervention, and to face the future with a realization of the benefits to us as well as to Panama from a new partnership that has now been formed.

My friend Omar Torrijos and I have decided to serve our nations in a time without challenge and without difficulty. [Laughter]

We have been successful, I believe, in convincing the people of both nations that the difficult decisions that have been made were the proper ones. And the reception today is a vivid demonstration, beyond anything we had anticipated or had hoped for, that there is a deep and abiding friendship among the Panamanian people for those of the United States. And we share the same feeling for your people, General Torrijos.

The years ahead will not be easy. There will inevitably be differences of opinion, and perhaps the partnership which we celebrate this evening will have its trying moments. But with the foundation of friendship and mutual trust and good will and easy communication between us, there is no doubt in my mind that we can protect and preserve the Panama Canal for the benefit of our people and for the benefit of the world and minimize those differences that might otherwise cause dissension among our people.

I look forward to this coming time, and I believe that we can avoid any challenge to this commitment which we have made together.

After the interpreter repeats my next toast, I would like for us to drink to General Torrijos for his patience and determination, to President Lakas for his leadership which inspired the Panamanian people to approve the terms of the treaty, to the people of this great country for their sense of equality and their sense of trust and their willingness to assume a new partnership, to the leaders and people of Latin America, and to the principles which bind us together—liberty, dignity, equality, mutual respect, peace, and permanent friendship.

NOTE: The President spoke at 12:10 a.m. at the Old Golf Club. President López Michelsen of Colombia responded to the President's toast.

Visit to Panama

Joint Statement Issued Following Multilateral Discussions. June 17, 1978

The Presidents of Colombia, Costa Rica, the United States and Venezuela, the Chief of Government of Panama, and the Prime Minister of Jamaica, present in Panama City on the occasion of the exchange of the Instruments of Ratification of the Panama Canal Treaties between the Republic of Panama and the United States of America, the culmination of a process with which we have been directly concerned, expressed the belief that the treaties represent an historic step forward in inter-American relations. These treaties symbolize a fundamental respect for sovereignty and a cooperative spirit which can motivate all countries to address the difficult problems which affect all the world.

They believe that the Panama Canal treaties demonstrate how all of us can work together in a new spirit of cooperation to shape the future in accordance with our ideals and to resolve all areas of friction in the region by peaceful means. They are determined to build on this example so that attention can be focused on economic cooperation and integration in order to promote socioeconomic development and thereby strengthen solidarity among the peoples of the Americas.

Accordingly, they pledge to work actively and in cooperation with each other and with other states.

To promote world peace, they pledge:

—To work to bring into effect the Treaty of Tlatelolco banning nuclear weapons from Latin America and the Caribbean.

—To strengthen the peacekeeping machinery of the Organization of American States and the United Nations.

—To work toward an effective regional limitation of conventional armaments based on cooperation among suppliers and purchasers to put an end to their acquisition for offensive purposes. They are deeply concerned about the waste of resources to purchase arms and are therefore encouraged by the decision of the countries which signed the Ayacucho Declaration to renew their determination to find a new agreement to limit purchases of weapons. They also hope that the Ayacucho example will be expanded to include all Latin American countries, and perhaps to other regions as well.

—To use their good offices and cooperation to encourage the solution of international disputes and to reduce areas of tension in the hemisphere. They hope that the patience and mutual respect which led to the successful negotiation of the canal treaties will help countries to resolve such problems and points of controversy in a mutually helpful way.

—To consult on a regular and continuous basis on a wide range of international issues in order to reduce the differences between national policies and increase the likelihood of reaching mutual agreement.

To promote greater respect for human rights and to widen the scope of international action in the defense of human dignity, they pledge:

—To strengthen the autonomy and capabilities of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights.

—To work to bring the American Convention on Human Rights into effect in this year, the 30th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. The leaders viewed with sympathy the offer made by Costa Rica for San Jose to be the site of a proposed Inter-American Court on Human Rights, conscious of the advantages of this site.

—To speak out for human rights and fundamental freedoms everywhere and to work to eliminate repression.

—To facilitate the development of conditions that would promote democracy with popular and effective participation. In particular, they express gratification that the will of the people of the Dominican Republic was freely expressed in elections last month, and they reiterate their hope and understanding that the electoral commission in the Dominican Republic will adhere faithfully to the integrity of the democratic process.

—To work through international organizations to strengthen the juridical foundations of political, social, and economic rights.

To move forward toward a more just and equitable international economic system and to insure that ongoing multilateral negotiations, including those on the Common Fund and debt, are pursued expeditiously with the goal of bringing concrete and significant results for the benefit of all countries, particularly for the developing countries, and to help raise the living standards of the world's poor, they pledge:

—To help alleviate hunger and poverty by emphasizing food production and studying the implications of rapid population growth.

—To complete the work of the Multilateral Trade Negotiations in Geneva and thereby reduce trade barriers and increase the participation of developing countries in an improved world trading system.

—To seek ways to improve the efficiency, growth, equity, and stability of commodity markets, and to seek to bring into effect the International Sugar Agreement, the International Coffee Agreement, and other commodity agreements which will have the purpose of establishing fair prices for the products of developing countries. In particular, they consider that the achievement of equitable agreements of this character will strengthen political stability and promote regional solidarity and will benefit both producers and consumers of such products.

—To support fully the work and capital replenishments of the Inter-American Development Bank and the World Bank.

—To give full support to the Caribbean Group for Cooperation in Economic Development and in other ways to encourage the economic development of the region.

They also wish to express their strong support for negotiations in the United Nations toward the conclusion of a treaty prohibiting bribery and illicit payments in international transactions.

In pledging themselves to these objectives, they invite all states to join with them in this spirit of cooperation to work actively for peace, human rights, participatory government, and a just and equitable international economic system.

NOTE: The multilateral discussions were held in the Panama Room at the El Panama Hotel. The first meeting took place on the evening of June 16, and the second meeting was held on the morning of June 17.

Visit to Panama

Remarks at Fort Clayton. June 17, 1978

Distinguished officials who have operated and defended the canal, who have performed superb service for our Government, who are an integral and admired part of the American community:

I come here with a sense of history, a sense of appreciation for what you have accomplished and are accomplishing for our country, a sense of gratitude to you.

A few months ago as I was visiting with David McCulloch, who wrote the book "The Path Between the Seas," I began to sense and to feel the enthusiasm for the extraordinary engineering achievement that the canal represents.

I've just returned from a flight over the canal to see the beautiful operation of it. I've been looking forward to a chance to visit Fort Clayton, Miraflores Locks, so that I could see firsthand the professionalism and the dedication that make this canal work and which keep the canal secure.

I'm very proud of those of you who belong to the various military components of the Southern Command. I was in the Navy for 11 years. And as you well know, we depended on the Army to take care of the canal so that we could go from one—[applause]—

Through a long and difficult period you've maintained a very high level of preparedness for the defense of the canal and for the protection of American lives and property and for the representation of the spirit and character of the United States in the most superb way. It's your effort and your training that have kept Americans assured of our strength and our security here, and I thank you for it.

Those of you who are civilians, both Americans and Panamanians, have contributed immeasurably to the operation of the canal. My life would be easier if every Government employee showed the same consistent combination of efficiency and talent as your group does, and we all appreciate this superb performance. You always do your job and you do it well.

For many years, the legal arrangements governing the Panama Canal and the zone have been a source of contention and argument and dispute between the United States and Panama. Most people who looked at the situation agreed that some change, of some kind, was called for. I think most of you who live in the canal agree with that statement. We disagreed not about whether there should be changes, but what those changes ought to be.

As you know, my predecessors in the White House, President Ford, President Nixon, President Johnson, President Kennedy, understood that some changes had to be made. I know each of you has known you were defending American interests here in the Canal Zone, and I respect your convictions and your spirit and your loyalty to your country, even though we did not always agree about the best course to take.

The Senate of the United States has acted, and the treaties are now a fact. I'm not here to justify them, or to suggest that if you understood the treaties better that you would like them. I know that you understand them, because for you, they are not just a distant and impersonal foreign policy abstraction, but something that alters your lives in a direct and immediate way.

You know, as I do, that a great deal will change as a result of these treaties. A few of you will be leaving the only place on Earth you've ever called home. That's a hard and a painful thing to do. The adjustments and uncertainties that you now face will not be easy. I understand that.

I understand, too, why you love this place. Seventy-five years ago, Americans came here as builders. In quiet ways, often unrecognized, often unappreciated, we have been builders ever since. For all the rest of your lives, every one of you will be proud, and justifiably so, to have been part of this canal, proud of what you've built and protected and loved.

That is evident, not only from what you say but what you do. The care and affection which you continue to show in the operation of the canal is clear evidence of the deep feeling which you and the American people have for the canal. So, I come here today not to win you over to the decision made by me and the American Congress, but because there are two things that I want very much to say.

First, the American people and I appreciate what you are doing here and, secondly, the American people and I care what happens to you.

In the millions of words spoken and written about the treaties, our appreciation and our concern have not been clearly expressed. We've tried to demonstrate these sentiments in the treaties as well as in the separate agreements and the annexes.

The rights of American workers will be protected. The treaties guarantee to employees:

First, in general, terms and conditions of employees which are no less favorable than they are now; nothing will be done to decrease the quality of your status as employees; secondly, the right to collective bargaining and, as you know, for the next 22 years, the entity with which you will bargain will be a part of the United States Government; third, optional early retirement for those who desire it.

We hope that as you understand clearly the conditions under which you will be working and living, that you will decide to stay on as a constructive and a helpful and a dependable employee. But if there should be individual instances where you find this not to be true, then earlier retirement benefits will be made available to you so that you will not suffer under any circumstances.

The United States Government will be responsible to you for implementing the treaty provisions fully and fairly. We will continue to do so in the enabling legislation which the Congress will begin to consider later this year and next year.

We will see to it that this enabling legislation ensures government-wide job placement and liberalized retirement benefits, better than those that you have now. To the limit of our ability in an international agreement, our negotiations with Panama have sought to secure your rights and your welfare and your safety and your peace of mind.

For example, we've tried to preserve during the life of the treaty as many as possible of the civil liberties that Americans cherish. To ensure that they will be respected, I discussed them with the Panamanian officials yesterday and told them of the importance that we attach to these basic and important rights.

Everyone understands that we want to enter upon a new era of harmonious cooperation and good will between the people of Panama and the Americans associated with the canal and that there is no room for bad faith in that relationship. It requires a hospitable and a cordial attitude, not only on our part but Panama's as well.

I think all of you may have observed yesterday a tremendous outpouring of appreciation and friendship expressed by the Panamanian people. The largest crowd that I have ever seen came out in a spirit of appreciation and commitment to a good partnership in the future, based on mutual respect, a desire for peace and a realization that the operation of the canal without interruption is important not only to our two countries and our people but to the rest of the world. We know that Panama will show strict regard for all its responsibilities toward you.

We've also tried to carry out our obligation to you by ensuring that the terms and conditions of your employment will generally stay the same when the treaty goes into effect. We know that the circumstances under which you work matter a great deal, as do good schools, medical care, and other services. These have not been neglected in the long negotiations over the last 14 years.

According to the treaties, the canal will increasingly be a place of Panamanian employment. Some of you might leave very soon; others will remain for many, many years. I'm relying on all of you to help make this transition as smooth as possible. That is your duty, your responsibility, and the people of both nations expect nothing less. You've never disappointed our country in the past; I'm sure you will not do so in the future.

We are trying and we hope that you will help us to succeed to bring about a successful new chapter in the history of the canal that you've managed and cared for so long. You've brought credit to yourselves and to your country by operating the canal efficiently, honestly, and honorably for the benefit of all nations.

The time when this was America's job alone is now coming to an end. The treaties reflect that time, and in so doing, they help guarantee that the rest of the world will recognize our essential fairness and decency as a people.

The future of this waterway will depend upon the cooperation and the understanding of both Panamanians and Americans. I know that some day we will join in looking back with admiration and respect at the dedication and devotion of the thousands of employees, American and Panamanian, who made and continue to make the canal one of the supreme human achievements of all time.

That's part of the history of our great country. That's part of the future of our great country. In this time of change, as President of the United States, you can consider me to be a partner of yours.

I've instructed all the officials, both military and civilian, in this Canal Zone to contact me directly to alleviate any concerns, any maladministration, any differences between ourselves and the people of Panama as these changing times approach.

And to close my statements to you, I'd like to repeat again that as the leader of our great Nation, the greatest on Earth, I'm proud of what you have done in the past, what you are doing today. And I have complete confidence that you will continue to represent our Nation in the finest spirit of dedication, of competence, and of good will in the years to come.

Thank you everyone. God bless you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:40 a.m. at Jarman Field.

Following his remarks, the President went to the Miraflores Locks, where he operated the controls which allowed the passage of the container ship American Apollo to pass through the locks. He then went to a picnic site overlooking the locks, where he had a working luncheon with approximately 2 dozen residents of the Canal Zone.

Federal Emergency Management Agency

Remarks Announcing Reorganization Plan No. 3 of 1978. June 19, 1978

I have an important announcement to make this afternoon concerning how we might make our own Government better able to deal with the potential disasters that affect our Nation from both natural and manmade causes.

Responsibility for emergency preparedness concerning civil disasters rests primarily with the State governments. But obviously the Federal Government can and does assist in preparing for and dealing with the effects of natural and man-made disasters.

When I was Governor, I saw during several emergencies, several each year, how important it was for governments to cooperate in crisis situations. And I want to be certain that this ability to work together is increasingly clear and unobstructed. One of the problems that State and local officials have had to face is the complexity and confusion and the fragmented nature of Federal programs. The Governors have been vocal and unanimous in calling for reorganization.

Today, I'm submitting to Congress a proposal which meets their needs. It will consolidate five existing Federal agencies and six additional disaster-related responsibilities into a single structure. They will merge programs involved with preparedness, mitigation, and response to national emergencies.

We've been trying to accomplish several very important objectives. We want to make a single agency responsible for these efforts. This will make government more accountable and will provide increased cooperation among governments.

We also want to use emergency resources for both natural disasters and civil preparedness. This will reduce waste and inefficiency in government operations. We want to bring together for the first time programs aimed at preventing and mitigating the effects of potential national disasters, such as floods and fire, with those designated to deal with these disasters once they occur.

By consolidating emergency functions into a single agency, reporting directly to me, we will make our readiness programs more visible, and we can integrate these better with programs of the States and local governments, with private industry, and with volunteer organizations.

The Secretary of Defense, acting with the National Security Council, will provide oversight of the new agency's civil defense programs and policies. I'm pleased that we've already received endorsements for this reorganization proposal from the National Governors Association, the Fire Service Associations, the United States Civil Defense Council, the National Association of State Directors for Disaster Preparedness, as well as a coalition of voluntary associations active in disaster relief.

With this broad support from public and private sectors, I hope that our plan will be enthusiastically received by the Congress.

Thank you very much.

Jim.

REPORTER. Mr. President, are you a strong believer in civil defense now?

THE PRESIDENT. Now and before.

NOTE: The President spoke at 1:15 p.m. to reporters assembled in the Briefing Room at the White House. Following his remarks, James T. McIntyre, Jr., Director of the Office of Management and Budget, and Bardyl Tirana, Director of the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency, held a news conference on the reorganization plan.

Federal Emergency Management Agency

*Message to the Congress Transmitting
Reorganization Plan No. 3 of 1978.
June 19, 1978*

To the Congress of the United States:

Today I am transmitting Reorganization Plan No. 3 of 1978. The Plan improves Federal emergency management and assistance. By consolidating emergency preparedness, mitigation and response activities, it cuts duplicative administrative costs and strengthens our ability to deal effectively with emergencies.

The Plan, together with changes I will make through executive action, would merge five agencies from the Departments of Defense, Commerce, HUD and GSA into one new agency.

For the first time, key emergency management and assistance functions would be unified and made directly accountable to the President and Congress. This will reduce pressures for increased costs to serve similar goals.

The present situation has severely hampered Federal support of State and local emergency organizations and resources, which bear the primary responsibility for preserving life and property in times of calamity. This reorganization has been developed in close cooperation with State and local governments.

If approved by the Congress, the Plan will establish the Federal Emergency Management Agency, whose Director shall report directly to the President. The National Fire Prevention and Control Administration (in the Department of Commerce), the Federal Insurance Administration (in the Department of Housing and Urban Development) and oversight responsibility for the Federal emergency broadcast system (now assigned in the Executive Office of the President) would be transferred to the Agency. The Agency's Director, its Deputy Director, and its five principal program managers would be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

If the Plan takes effect, I will assign to the Federal Emergency Management Agency all authorities and functions vested by law in the President and presently delegated to the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency (in the Department of Defense). This will include certain engineering and communications support functions for civil defense now assigned to the U.S. Army.

I will also transfer to the new Agency all authorities and functions under the Disaster Relief Acts of 1970 and 1974 now delegated to the Federal Disaster Assistance Administration in the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

I will also transfer all Presidential authorities and functions now delegated to the Federal Preparedness Agency in the General Services Administration, including the establishment of policy for the National Stockpile. The stockpile disposal function, which is statutorily assigned to the General Services Administration, would remain there. Once these steps have been taken by Executive Order, these three agencies would be abolished.

Several additional transfers of emergency preparedness and mitigation functions would complete the consolidation. These include:

- Oversight of the Earthquake Hazards Reduction Program, under Public Law 95-124, now carried out by the Office of Science and Technology Policy in the Executive Office of the President.

- Coordination of Federal activities to promote dam safety, carried by the same Office.

- Responsibility for assistance to communities in the development of readiness plans for severe weather-related emergencies, including floods, hurricanes, and tornadoes.

- Coordination of natural and nuclear disaster warning systems.

- Coordination of preparedness and planning to reduce the consequences of major terrorist incidents. This would not alter the present responsibility of the Executive Branch for reacting to the incidents themselves.

This reorganization rests on several fundamental principles. First, Federal authorities to anticipate, prepare for, and respond to major civil emergencies should be supervised by one official responsible to the President and given attention by other officials at the highest levels.

The new Agency would be in this position. To increase White House oversight and involvement still further, I shall establish by Executive Order an Emergency Management Committee, to be chaired by the Federal Emergency Management Agency Director. Its membership shall be comprised of the Assistants to the President for National Security, Domestic Affairs and Policy and Intergovernmental Relations, and the Director, Office of Management and Budget. It will advise the President on ways to meet national civil emergencies. It will also oversee and provide guidance on the management of all Federal emergency authorities, advising the President on alternative approaches to improve performance and avoid excessive costs.

Second, an effective civil defense system requires the most efficient use of all available emergency resources. At the same time, civil defense systems, organization, and resources must be prepared to cope with any disasters which threaten our people. The Congress has clearly recognized this principle in recent changes in the civil defense legislation.

The communications, warning, evacuation, and public education processes involved in preparedness for a possible nuclear attack should be developed, tested, and used for major natural and accidental disasters as well. Consolidation of civil defense functions in the new Agency will assure that attack readiness programs are effectively integrated into the preparedness organizations and programs of State and local government, private industry, and volunteer organizations.

While serving an important "all-hazards" readiness and response role, civil defense must continue to be fully compatible with and be ready to play an important role in our Nation's overall strategic policy. Accordingly, to maintain a link between our strategic nuclear planning and our nuclear attack preparedness planning, I will make the Secretary of Defense and the National Security Council responsible for oversight of civil defense related programs and policies of the new Agency. This will also include appropriate Department of Defense support in areas like program development, technical support, research, communications, intelligence and emergency operations.

Third, whenever possible, emergency responsibilities should be extensions of the regular missions of Federal agencies. The primary task of the Federal Emergency Management Agency will be to coordinate and plan for the emergency deployment of resources that have other routine uses. There is no need to develop a separate set of Federal skills and capabilities for those rare occasions when catastrophe occurs.

Fourth, Federal hazard mitigation activities should be closely linked with emergency preparedness and response func- tions. This reorganization would permit more rational decisions on the relative costs and benefits of alternative approaches to disasters by making the Federal Emergency Management Agency the focal point of all Federal hazard mitigation activities and by combining these with the key Federal preparedness and response functions.

The affected hazard mitigation activities include the Federal Insurance Administration which seeks to reduce flood losses by assisting states and local governments in developing appropriate land uses and building standards and several agencies that presently seek to reduce fire and earthquake losses through research and education.

Most State and local governments have consolidated emergency planning, preparedness and response functions on an "all hazard" basis to take advantage of the similarities in preparing for and responding to the full range of potential emergencies. The Federal Government can and should follow this lead.

Each of the changes set forth in the plan is necessary to accomplish one or more of the purposes set forth in Section 901(a) of Title 5 of the United States Code. The Plan does not call for abolishing any functions now authorized by law. The provisions in the Plan for the appointment and pay of any head or officer of the new agency have been found by me to be necessary.

I do not expect these actions to result in any significant changes in program expenditures for those authorities to be transferred. However, cost savings of between $10-$15 million annually can be achieved by consolidating headquarters and regional facilities and staffs. The elimination (through attrition) of about 300 jobs is also anticipated.

The emergency planning and response authorities involved in this Plan are vitally important to the security and well-being of our Nation. I urge the Congress to approve it.

JIMMY CARTER

REORGANIZATION PLAN NUMBER 3 OF 1978

Prepared by the President and transmitted to the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled, June 19, 1978, pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 9 of Title 5 of the United States Code.

PART I. FEDERAL EMERGENCY MANAGEMENT AGENCY

SECTION 101. Establishment of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. There is hereby established as an independent establishment in the Executive Branch, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (the "Agency").

SECTION 102. The Director. The Agency shall be headed by a Director, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter prescribed by law for level II of the Executive Schedule.

SECTION 103. The Deputy Director. There shall be within the Agency a Deputy Director, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter prescribed by law for level IV of the Executive Schedule. The Deputy Director shall perform such functions as the Director may from time to time prescribe and shall act as Director during the absence or disability of the Director or in the event of a vacancy in the Office of the Director.

SECTION 104. Associate Directors. There shall be within the Agency not more than four Associate Directors, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two of whom shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter prescribed by law for level IV of the Executive Schedule, one of whom shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter prescribed by law for level V of the Executive Schedule and one of whom shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter prescribed by law for GS-18 of the General Schedule. The Associate Directors shall perform such functions as the Director may from time to time prescribe.

SECTION 105. Regional Directors. There shall be within the Agency ten regional directors who shall be appointed by the Director in the excepted service and shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter prescribed by law for GS-16 of the General Schedule.

SECTION 106. Performance of Functions. The Director may establish bureaus, offices, divisions, and other units within the Agency. The Director may from time to time make provision for the performance of any function of the Director by any officer, employee, or unit of the Agency.

PART II. TRANSFER OF FUNCTIONS

SECTION 201. Fire Prevention. There are hereby transferred to the Director all functions vested in the Secretary of Commerce, the Administrator and Deputy Administrator of the National Fire Prevention and Control Administration, and the Superintendent of the National Academy for Fire Prevention and Control pursuant to the Federal Fire Prevention and Control Act of 1974, as amended, (15 U.S.C. 2201 through 2219); exclusive of the functions set forth at Sections 18 and 23 of the Federal Fire Prevention and Control Act (15 U.S.C. 278 (f) and 1511).

SECTION 202. Flood and Other Matters. There are hereby transferred to the Director all functions vested in the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development pursuant to the National Flood Insurance Act of 1968, as amended, and the Flood Disaster Protection Act of 1973, as amended, (42 U.S.C. 2414 and 42 U.S.C. 4001 through 4128), and Section 1 of the National Insurance Development Act of 1975, as amended, (89 Stat. 68).

SECTION 203. Emergency Broadcast System. There are hereby transferred to the Director all functions concerning the Emergency Broadcast System, which were transferred to the President and all such functions transferred to the Secretary of Commerce, by Reorganization Plan Number 1.

PART III. GENERAL PROVISIONS

SECTION 301. Transfer and Abolishment of Agencies and Officers. The National Fire Prevention and Control Administration and the National Academy for Fire Prevention and Control and the positions of Administrator of said Administration and Superintendent of said Academy are hereby transferred to the Agency. The position of Deputy Administrator of said Administration (established by 15 U.S.C. 2204(c)) is hereby abolished.

SECTION 302. Incidental Transfers. So much of the personnel, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations and other funds employed, used, held, available, or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred under this Plan, as the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall determine, shall be transferred to the appropriate agency, or component at such time or times as the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall provide, except that no such unexpended balances transferred shall be used for purposes other than those for which the appropriation was originally made. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall provide for terminating the affairs of any agencies abolished herein and for such further measures and dispositions as such Director deems necessary to effectuate the purposes of this Reorganization Plan.

SECTION 303. Interim Officers. The President may authorize any persons who, immediately prior to the effective date of this Plan, held positions in the Executive Branch to which they were appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to act as Director, Deputy Director, and Associate Directors of the Agency, until those offices are for the first time filled pursuant to the provisions of this Reorganization Plan or by recess appointment, as the case may be. The President may authorize any such person to receive the compensation attached to the Office in respect of which that person so serves, in lieu of other compensation from the United States.

SECTION 304. Effective Date. The provisions of this Reorganization Plan shall become effective at such time or times, on or before April 1, 1979, as the President shall specify, but not sooner than the earliest time allowable under Section 906 of Title 5, United States Code.

Clifford R. Allen

Statement on the Death of the Representative From Tennessee. June 19, 1978

With the death of Congressman Clifford Allen, the Congress has lost a man of great integrity who dedicated his life to public service. He served the people of Tennessee in many capacities for 30 years and proved himself an earnest spokesman for our Nation's good in his all-too-brief tenure in the House of Representatives.

Congressman Allen well deserved his reputation as a champion of the common man. His concern for the welfare of all people is best exemplified by his successful effort to provide free textbooks for the schoolchildren of Tennessee.

He worked all his life for the things in which he believed and for the people of his State and country. I extend my own deepest sympathies to his family.

Veto of Bill To Reduce Federal Firefighters' Work Week

Message to the House of Representatives Returning H.R. 3161 Without Approval. June 19, 1978

To the House of Representatives:

I am returning, without my approval, H.R. 3161, a bill which would substantially reduce the work week for Federal firefighters, while maintaining their pay at nearly the present level. I have three principal objections to this bill. First, this measure would reduce firefighters' work week without reducing the premium pay which was designed for a longer standby schedule. In effect, it would raise firefighters' total hourly pay by more than 15%. If only the basic hourly pay is considered, without overtime pay, the increase is almost 30%. I do not believe this is justified, particularly in light of the 5.5% pay cap I have recommended for Federal employees as part of my efforts to hold down inflation. Moreover, the length of the work week for Federal firefighters must be considered in light of the nature of their duty. Fires tend to be less frequent at Federal installations than in urban areas. Comparatively, there is a very low incidence of fire and there are very few severe fires.

Second, H.R. 3161 would impair the ability of agency heads to manage the work force and regulate the work week.

Third, H.R. 3161 would require the Department of Defense alone to hire 4,- 600 additional employees, at an annual cost of $46.7 million, just to maintain existing fire protection. These additional personnel and payroll measures are unacceptable.

I am very proud of the superb record of Federal firefighters at our military installations. I know them to be hard-working and dedicated. The evidence is not compelling, however, that they are unfairly treated in matters of pay and length of work week. And in extending unwarranted advantages to them, H.R. 3161 offends the ideals of fairness that should guide this Administration. I am not prepared to accept its preferential approach.

JIMMY CARTER

The White House,

June 19, 1978.

NOTE: The text of the message was released on June 20.

The House of Representatives reconsidered H.R. 3161 on June 28, and the bill was referred to committee.

United States Space Activities

Announcement of Administration Review.
June 20, 1978

The President directed under a Presidential review memorandum that the NSC Policy Review Committee (PRC) thoroughly review existing policy and formulate overall principles which should guide our space activities. The major concerns that prompted this review arose from growing interaction among our various space activities.

This review examined and the resultant Presidential directive establishes:

- A Government policy oversight system to review and revise space policy as needed;
- Ground rules for the balance and interaction among our space programs to ensure achievement of the inter-related national security, economic, political, and arms limitation goals of the United States; and
- Modifications to existing policies, the appropriate extent of the overlapping technology, and product dissemination by the sectors.

This Presidential directive establishes an NSC Policy Review Committee to provide a forum to all Federal agencies for their policy views, to advise on proposed changes to national space policy, to resolve issues referred to the Committee, and to provide for rapid referral of issues to the President for decision as necessary. This Committee will be chaired by the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy, Frank Press. Recognizing that the civilian space program is at the threshold of change, the President has asked the PRC to assess the needs and aspirations of the Nation's civil space program. The United States has built a broad national base in space and aeronautics. At issue is how best to capitalize on prior investments and set the needed direction and purpose for continued vitality in the future.

Under the Presidential review memorandum the emphasis was to resolve potential conflicts among the various space program sectors and to recommend coherent space principles and national space policy. In focusing upon these issues, the Policy Review Committee concluded that our current direction set forth in the Space Act of 1958 is well founded and that the preponderance of existing problems was related to interactions and resultant stresses among the various space programs. For this reason, the classified portion of the recently signed Presidential directive concentrates on overlap questions. It does not deal in detail with the long-term objectives of our defense, commercial, and civil programs. Determining our civil space policy, outlined above, will be the next step.

As a result of this in-depth review, the President's directive establishes national policies to guide the conduct of United States activities in and related to space programs. The objectives are (1) to advance the interests of the United States through the exploration and use of space and (2) to cooperate with other nations in maintaining the freedom of space for all activities which enhance the security and welfare of mankind. The space principles set forth in this directive are:

—The United States will pursue space activities to increase scientific knowledge, develop useful commercial and Government applications of space technology, and maintain United States leadership in space technology.

—The United States is committed to the principles of the exploration and use of outer space by all nations for peaceful purposes and for the benefit of all mankind.

—The United States is committed to the exploration and use of outer space in support of its national well-being.

—The United States rejects any claims to sovereignty over outer space or over celestial bodies, or any portion thereof, and rejects any limitations on the fundamental right to acquire data from space.

—The United States holds that the space systems of any nation are national property and have the right of passage through and operations in space without interference. Purposeful interference with space systems shall be viewed as an infringement upon sovereign rights.

—The United States will pursue activities in space in support of its right of self-defense and thereby strengthen national security, the deterrence of attack, and arms control agreements.

—The United States will conduct international cooperative space activities that are beneficial to the United States scientifically, politically, economically, and/or militarily.

—The United States will develop and operate on a global basis active and passive remote sensing operations in support of national objectives.

—The United States will maintain current responsibility and management relationships among the various space programs, and, as such, close coordination and information exchange will be maintained among the space sectors to avoid unnecessary duplication and to allow maximum cross-utilization of all capabilities.

Our civil space programs will be conducted to increase the body of scientific knowledge about the Earth and the universe; to develop and operate civil applications of space technology; to maintain United States leadership in space science, applications, and technology; and to further United States domestic and foreign policy objectives within the following guidelines:

—The United States will encourage domestic commercial exploitation of space capabilities and systems for economic benefit and to promote the technological position of the United States; however, all United States Earth-oriented remote sensing satellites will require United States Government authorization and supervision or regulation.

—Advances in Earth imaging from space will be permitted under controls and when such needs are justified and assessed in relation to civil benefits, national security, and foreign policy. Controls, as appropriate, on other forms of remote Earth sensing will be established.

—Data and results from the civil space programs will be provided the widest practical dissemination to improve the condition of human beings on Earth and to provide improved space services for the United States and other nations of the world.

—The United States will develop, manage, and operate a fully operational Space Transportation System (STS) through NASA, in cooperation with the Department of Defense. The STS will service all authorized space users—domestic and foreign, commercial and governmental—and will provide launch priority and necessary security to national security missions while recognizing the essentially open character of the civil space program.

Our national security related space programs will conduct those activities in space which are necessary to our support of such functions as command and control, communications, navigation, environmental monitoring, warning and surveillance, and space defense, as well as to support the formulation and execution of national policies; and to support the planning for and conduct of military operations. These programs will be conducted within the following guidelines:

—Security, including dissemination of data, shall be conducted in accordance with Executive orders and applicable directives for protection of national security information. Space-related products and technology shall be afforded lower or no classification where possible to permit wider use of our total national space capability.

—The Secretary of Defense will establish a program for identifying and integrating, as appropriate, civil and commercial resources into military operations during national emergencies declared by the President.

—Survivability of space systems will be pursued commensurate with the planned need in crisis and war and the availability of other assets to perform the mission. Identified deficiencies will be eliminated, and an aggressive, long-term program will be applied to provide more assured survivability through evolutionary changes to space systems.

—The United States finds itself under increasing pressure to field an antisatellite capability of its own in response to Soviet activities in this area. By exercising mutual restraint, the United States and the Soviet Union have an opportunity at this early juncture to stop an unhealthy arms competition in space before the competition develops a momentum of its own. The two countries have commenced bilateral discussions on limiting certain activities directed against space objects, which we anticipate will be consistent with the overall U.S. goal of maintaining any nation's right of passage through and operations in space without interference.

—While the United States seeks verifiable, comprehensive limits on antisatellite capabilities and use, in the absence of such an agreement, the United States will vigorously pursue development of its own capabilities. The U.S. space defense program shall include an integrated attack warning, notification, verification, and contingency reaction capability which can effectively detect and react to threats to U.S. space systems.

Veterans Preference in Civil Service Reform

Letter to Chairman Robert N.C. Nix of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee. June 20, 1978

To Chairman Robert Nix

I understand that the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee will begin markup on Civil Service reform this week. As you know, the Civil Service reforms I have proposed to Congress include a number of critically important measures to reform the Civil Service system. Chairman Alan Campbell of the Civil Service Commission has sent you a separate letter outlining our positions on how the Committee has dealt with a number of these issues in its new Committee print. I look forward to the Committee's review of these comments.

I am pleased with the progress that has been made so far and I am confident that the Committee will move responsibly and expeditiously through the markup process.

I want to take this opportunity to reaffirm my commitment to changing the Veterans Preference System in Federal employment, and I urge the Committee to join me in this effort. We owe veterans our deep gratitude for serving their country, and they more than deserve special treatment from our government. However, veterans preference as it presently operates severely interferes with employment opportunities for women and other minorities, discriminates against younger veterans who are outnumbered by veterans who served before, and greatly hampers managerial flexibility.

Under my proposals, veterans preference would be focused where it is most needed: on Vietnam-era veterans and those who are disabled. Veterans preference would not be abolished. Rather, it would be brought into line with its original purpose, to help veterans readjust to civilian life. Let me point out that Congress itself ended veterans preference entirely for non-disabled veterans who entered the service on or after October 16, 1976.

On the Senate side, a compromise had been worked out with some Members of the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee which I supported, but which did not carry, but only by a narrow margin. Under this compromise, which I continue to support:

—Veterans preference would be available for one time use for a full 15 years following discharge from the armed forces.

—All veterans would be eligible for an absolute preference where Reductions in Force occur for their first 8 years of Federal employment.

—Veterans preference would be eliminated for retired military officers of field grade rank or above and limited for other military personnel who have retired after at least 20 years in service to 3 years following retirement.

As you know, my veterans preference proposals would not adversely affect disabled veterans. In fact, I also proposed steps to go beyond existing programs for disabled and Vietnam-era veterans. I have agreed that disabled veterans for the first time be permitted non-competitive appointment to Federal service if they either have a 30% or more service connected disability or are involved with a Veterans Administration prescribed job training course.

I have also proposed an extension as well as a significant expansion of the Veterans Readjustment Appointment Authority to aid employment of Vietnam-era and disabled veterans that has now been handled separately by the Veterans Affairs Committees of the House and Senate.

I very much hope that your Committee will be able to act favorably on these proposals in veterans Federal employment policy. Such changes will serve the public interest and are long overdue. They are a vital part of the effort to make government more efficient and responsive to the American people.

I am sending a copy of this letter to all members of the Committee.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER

[The Honorable Robert Nix, Chairman, House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C. 20515]

NOTE: The text of the letter was released on June 21.

Fourth of July

Statement by the President. June 21, 1978

The Fourth of July is a time of celebration for all Americans, as we commemorate the bold actions of those who brought our Nation into being 202 years ago today.

We celebrate on this day the benefits of freedom which Americans have struggled to establish and died to preserve. But since we are aware that not all people share our good fortune to live in a country founded on liberty, the Fourth of July is also an occasion to rededicate ourselves to the pursuit everywhere of the human rights for which our Nation has always stood.

In 1978, we face these responsibilities, proud of our heritage and confident that our belief in freedom will carry us forward in the years ahead.

National Commission for the Review of Antitrust Laws and Procedures

Remarks on Greeting Members of the Commission. June 21, 1978

One of the most challenging and gratifying experiences that I have had is to see the recruitment and the performance of both private citizens and Members of the Congress, members of our own administration, independent regulatory agencies, in dealing with some of the longstanding and historical problems of our Government.

This morning we're here to announce and to commence the work of the members of the National Commission on the Revision of the Antitrust Laws and Procedures.

Before I give just a very few remarks, I would like to read a list of these members who are assembled here behind me to give you some feeling of the quality of the group. They will begin their deliberations immediately, and they will make their report to me January of next year.

The Chairman of the group will be John Shenefield, who's the Assistant Attorney General of the Antitrust Division in the Department of Justice.

Mike Pertschuk, who's the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission; Alfred E. Kahn, who's the Chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board; Senator Edward Kennedy, who is the chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly; Senator Jacob Javits; Senator Howard Metzenbaum; Senator Robert Morgan; Senator Orrin Hatch; Congressman Peter Rodino, who's the chairman of the House Committee on the Judiciary; Congresswoman Barbara Jordan; Congressman Robert McClory; Congressman John Seiberling; Congressman Charles Wiggins of California;

Clyde Atkins, who's the U.S. District Judge from the Southern District of Florida; Chauncey Browning, who's the attorney general of West Virginia, and who's the president-elect of the National Association of Attorneys General; Maxwell Blecher, a trial practitioner and antitrust author from Los Angeles; Eleanor Fox, antitrust professor at New York University School of Law; John Izard, the former chairman of the Antitrust Law Section of the American Bar Association; James Nicholson, former Trade Commission member; Craig Spangenberg, fellow in the American College of Trial Lawyers; Gordon Spivack, who's the former Director of Operations for the Antitrust Division in the Department of Justice; Lawrence Sullivan, who's a professor at the University of California Law School, and he's an author of antitrust publications. And the Executive Director will be Tim Smith, Special Assistant to Mr. Shenefield.

I think everyone can see the extremely high quality of this group. And they've all proven by their past interest and, also, performance, a high degree of interest and expertise in this subject.

There's a great need for reform. I have seen a list of the previous study groups that have addressed this same question. Quite often, their reports have been interesting. Not much action has been taken because of a degree of study but without a melding of the executive leaders, Justice Department, regulatory agencies, the Congress, and private citizens.

I consider this study to go to the very heart of our free enterprise economic system. There is an inherent conflict in trying to protect the American public, the consumers, from abuse, in trying to have a stable economic system, and trying to enhance competition. Sometimes those three elements are in conflict, and it does require a great deal of study and judgment to bring about a resolution in the best interests of the public and our system itself.

There are two very important problems that they will address, among others. First, is how to resolve complex legal cases quickly. I mentioned this at some length in my speech to the Bar Association of Los Angeles County a month or so ago. We have cases that drag out almost indefinitely. They sap away the legal talent of our country that could be more productively used in other efforts. They delay a resolution of judgment and decision which works to the advantage of one party or the other, and quite often against the best interests of the public. So, how to deal with this question is one that I believe, if resolved, would have a greatly beneficial effect on the parties to the disputes and on the public itself.

The other one is to examine and recommend elimination of unwarranted exemptions from antitrust legislation and regulation. I believe that this study, the publication of their results, the acquaintance of the public and me and others with the needs for reform, will bring about a successful effort.

Some of the people behind me have already made great progress. I think the rulings that have come out of the Civil Aeronautics Board in this past 12 months have been an exciting thing, an innovative achievement which was feared greatly, originally, by the airline companies, but it's resulted in a great deal of reduction in unnecessarily high fares. The passengers have benefited substantially, and I think there's a growing feeling, almost unanimously, even among the airline industry executives, that this enhanced, competitive attitude within the airline industry has been beneficial.

I hope that soon we can move into other similar regulated industries. And I believe that the trend is to minimize, not to increase, unwarranted government intrusion into the regulatory process.

I hope that we'll have simplification of laws and regulations and a reduction in the total degree of regulation which, in the past, has almost inexorably trended toward a protection of the interest of the industries regulated, against the best interests of the American public. But we've had some innovative thoughts and actions in recent months which can serve as an inspiration and an example for this group behind me.

Well, in closing, let me say that I'm very grateful to these people for their willingness to serve. They bring a high degree of professional competence and experience to a very challenging and difficult and sensitive subject. And as President of our country, I wish them much success. And I believe that their study and their report will not only be substantial and profound, but that they will benefit from knowing that I, the Attorney General, and others will work with great enthusiasm and fervency to implement the recommendations that they make.

Thank you again for being willing to serve. I'm very proud of what I hope you will do, and I expect great things from you.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:50 a.m. in the Rose Garden at the White House.

Organization of American States

Remarks at the Opening Session of the Eighth General Assembly. June 21, 1978

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Secretary General, distinguished Foreign Ministers—I believe with 100-percent attendance—Ambassadors, delegates and observers to this General Assembly, and friends:

In the brief time that I have been President of our country, I have enjoyed a very close relationship with the Organization of American States. Historic events have occurred here in this building, and some have even suggested that I move my office over here because I visit so often. But the importance of your deliberations and the past actions that have occurred here are recognized throughout our own country.

I want to welcome you here to open the Eighth General Assembly of the Organization of American States.

Five days ago, I went to Panama. I went there to celebrate new treaties which permit the United States of America and the Republic of Panama to operate and to defend the canal on the basis of partnership and not paternalism. I went there to fulfill a pledge that I made before you in this Hall of the Americas a little more than a year ago. I went there to explain what the treaties mean to me and to other North Americans. More than simply a fulfillment of a pledge, they are the beginning of a new era of inter-American understanding, reflecting a new spirit of commitment and cooperation.

In the process of reaching agreement, our two nations—and the many others of you who supported us—breathed new life into some old principles: principles of nonintervention, mutual respect, partnership, and multilateral cooperation. What we have accomplished together will make it easier to apply these same principles to the overriding concern of our hemisphere: peace, human rights and dignity, and economic development.

Last year on Pan American Day, I outlined the approach which my own administration would take towards Latin America and the Caribbean. Slogans would no longer suffice to describe the diversity of the Americas, nor would a single formula be helpful when our individual and our common interests are so clearly global in scope. The problems of the world require that we in the Western Hemisphere think and act more broadly.

That is what I pledged to you last year on Pan American Day. That's what I committed our Nation to do. Our goals still remain the same: to promote world peace, to discourage international intervention and aggression, to foster an international environment in which human rights and dignity are respected by all, and to end repression and terrorism, and, finally, to move toward a more just and equitable international economic system.

These are the most basic goals of the community of nations throughout the world—and therefore of our hemisphere as well. No one nation can do this job alone—not the United States, nor any other. Only by cooperation among the nations of this hemisphere and throughout the world will we have a chance to see these goals fulfilled.

We can advance toward peace with many small steps, as we remove the causes of dispute which have plagued our hemisphere in the past.

The resolution of the Panama Canal issue should be a good omen that other disputes in our hemisphere can also be settled peacefully. Let us approach other problems, such as Bolivian access to the sea, the Honduras-El Salvador border dispute, the future of Belize, in the same spirit of accommodation and friendship.

Just as the nations of this hemisphere offered support to Panama and the United States during the canal negotiations, I pledge today my Government's willingness to join in the effort to find peaceful and just solutions to other problems.

In 1 year's time, it will be a century since the War of the Pacific. We should view this anniversary, this occasion, as an opportunity to reaffirm our commitment to harmony in this hemisphere and to avoid conflict.

The difficult decisions in their region can only be made by Bolivia, Peru, Chile. But we stand ready with the Organization of American States, the United Nations, and other countries to help find a solution to Bolivia's land-locked status that will be acceptable to all parties and will contribute to the permanent peace and development of the area.

In this same spirit, we should work together to bring into effect the farsighted Treaty of Tlatelolco, which bans nuclear weapons from Latin America. It was in this hall last year that I pledged to do my utmost to bring this treaty into effect and to sign Protocol I of that treaty. And on May 26 last year I signed it. Since then, due to the encouragement of the countries that pioneered the treaty, the Soviet Union has ratified Protocol II, and Argentina has now agreed to ratify the treaty.

All but one of the countries in the hemisphere eligible to sign have now signed the Treaty of Tlatelolco. This precedent-setting treaty represents a dramatic advance for the cause of nuclear nonproliferation, and we should not rest until it is complete. I also support the efforts of those who want to extend the spirit of Tlatelolco to other areas of the world and to conventional arms sales, as well.

I believe that restraint in conventional arms sales is also central to the cause of peace. The United States has adopted a policy, unilaterally, which seeks to reduce the overall sale of weapons each year, especially the most sophisticated, lethal, and expensive weapons. We will not introduce an advanced weapons system into a region. And we are encouraging the Soviet Union, the French, and others to join with us in a multinational control of the sale of conventional weapons throughout the world.

As a major arms salesman, the United States bears and accepts a heavy responsibility for limiting this trade, but we cannot succeed alone. Our efforts will depend upon the active participation of other arms sellers and, obviously, on the participation of those who buy weapons.

I might point out that we have a better record in this hemisphere than is generally recognized. Four other nations of the world sell more weapons in Latin America than does the United States. And we need your help and the help of other countries to continue this progress toward another example of hemispheric peace and the control of weapons of destruction that might be observed and emulated by other regions of the world.

Discussions among supplier nations and providing nations have already begun. As we make our efforts, we draw inspiration from the truly historic initiative that Venezuela and the other signatories of Ayacucho are making to remove the causes of insecurity from their region and thereby to reduce the pressures that make nations buy weapons, because they fear their neighbors.

As the Ayacucho nations prepare for another meeting this week, I reaffirm my own country's conviction that their work is bringing us closer to lasting peace, and I express my hope that their efforts can be expanded to other weapons, both purchasers and suppliers.

We can also reduce the pressure for armaments and for regional violence by ensuring that all nations respect the territorial integrity of others. The intrusion of foreign military forces into local disputes can only undermine this cause. We support improvements in the peacekeeping and dispute-settling machinery of the Organization of American States and the United Nations.

I'd like to say just a word about human rights. The rights and dignity of human beings concerns us all and must be defended and enhanced. I'm convinced that the peoples of the Americas want a world in which citizens of every country are free from torture, from arbitrary arrest and prolonged detention without trial, free to speak and to think as they please, free to participate in the determination of their own destiny.

My Government will not be deterred from our open and enthusiastic policy of promoting human rights, including economic and social rights, in whatever ways we can. We prefer to take actions that are positive, but where nations persist in serious violations of human rights, we will continue to demonstrate that there are costs to the flagrant disregard of international standards.

Above and beyond any actions we take ourselves, we believe multilateral action can be the most effective means of encouraging the protection of human rights. Last year's Organization of American States General Assembly demonstrated our common interest in this important commitment. It set the stage for this year's events.

During the past year, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, one of our region's most important instruments, has grown stronger. Its budget was tripled, and it was invited by more Governments to investigate and report on conditions. We consider this not an intrusion into the internal affairs of countries, but a mechanism by which those countries that stand condemned, perhaps erroneously, by the rest of the world, might clear their good name and prove to us and to the rest of the world that human rights indeed are not being violated.

This is a very good encouragement for us in the United States to set a good example, and I hope we'll retain our commitment to this principle so vividly that every day, every head of state in the whole world has before his or her consciousness a concern about "How are we doing to enhance human rights in our own country?"

We have had, I believe, good progress so far, and I commend the reports that have been submitted to this General Assembly and urge that their recommendations be fulfilled.

In the past year, six countries have joined Costa Rica and Colombia in ratifying the American Convention on Human Rights. Three more countries must ratify it for it to come into force. I signed the convention on June 1, a long overdue action on the part of the United States. I signed this while my wife was in San José, and I pledged my own efforts to bring about the United States ratification as soon as possible.

I hope that every nation represented around this table will make every effort expeditiously to sign and to ratify this American Convention on Human Rights without delay.

We should use this General Assembly to plan for the moment when the convention enters into force. We share the view that the present Commission will continue to carry out its mandate until a new Commission is functioning.

The governments whose leaders visited Panama for the ceremonies this past weekend have been at the forefront of the movement for human rights and democracy. A few weeks ago, several of our countries spoke out in support of the democratic election process in a neighboring country.

Now, we realize that the path from authoritarian rule to democratic rule can be difficult and demanding. During such a transition, and in the midst of the electoral process, my Government pledges not to intervene nor to show favoritism toward particular individuals or particular parties. But we will continually support and encourage political systems that allow their people to participate freely and democratically in the decisions that affect their lives.

This past year has seen a measure of progress. In many countries, political prisoners have been released, states of seige have been lifted, or constraints on freedom of the press have been loosened. In the coming year, we hope for more progress. For many in Latin America, the struggle has just begun. But the direction of history toward the expansion of human rights is clear. Where basic human rights are concerned, all of our governments must be accountable not only to our own citizens but to the conscience of the world.

The economic system: We must also devote our common energies to economic development and the cause of social justice. Benefits of the world's economy must be more fairly shared, but the responsibilities must be shared as well.

In many ways, economic issues will be our most important foreign policy concerns in the coming year. We plan to give increased emphasis, much more than we have in the past, to those economic issues which most directly affect the developing countries, particularly trade and aid.

We have not moved far enough or fast enough in the United States Government in the past. Many of you have not been aggressive enough in alleviating economic disparities and abuses in the system which we help to control. We've not spoken often enough nor candidly enough with each other. We must take every opportunity to work with all nations on these fundamental issues, and we must find new ways to discuss them, not through public confrontation, through the news media, but through quiet, substantive, determined negotiation to bring about steady progress designed to reach common goals.

Trade policy will become more and more important as your economies continue their transformation, which is inevitable, with manufactured goods making up a larger and larger proportion of your production and exports.

I have fought hard to resist protectionism, a subject which the President mentioned a few minutes ago, and I will continue to do so. Within the Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development, the OECD, we've urged the healthier economies to grow faster so as to expand markets for your exports. In the multilateral trade negotiations, we seek to reduce barriers to those exports. In return, we ask you to join with us in negotiating a reduction of tariff and non-tariff barriers.

Many of your countries whose voices could be heard and could be of great influence do not play an active role in negotiating the reduction of those very tariffs which work against the best interests of the people whom you represent. We ask you to join with us in negotiating a reduction in tariffs and nontariff barriers.

The middle-income developing countries, some of you, have a special responsibility, along with us, a very powerful, economically developed country, to help widen world trade by opening your markets to exports from other developing and industrial countries.

Some of your economies are now large and dynamic enough to provide for both domestic consumption and exports at the same time. By giving priority to creating jobs, you can alleviate poverty while stimulating your own economies.

The industrial countries should help to stimulate this growth. As one step to this end, we propose to create a foundation for technological collaboration, which will help to develop and share the skills which are needed for economic and social growth. The challenge of economic development is to help the world's poor lift themselves out of misery. We need to assist governments which find themselves in financial crisis, if and when they are willing to make sound measures of self-help.

We need to support regional and sub-regional cooperation and integration through such organizations as the Caribbean Group for Cooperation in Economic Development, which is meeting this week in Washington—I think 30 countries.

The recent decision by several Andean countries to establish a balance-of-payments support fund is a welcome contribution to regional financial stability. The little-noticed increase in intraregional trade credits and cooperation among central banks testifies to the maturity and the integration of Latin America.

Finally, let me say this: We set for ourselves an ambitious program last year. Much has been accomplished, but much more remains to be done.

The Organization of American States can play an important role in addressing and solving our common problems. It's become particularly effective in the areas of human rights and the keeping of the peace. It can and must become still more effective as its internal administrative and financial structure comes to reflect the greater equality in our relationships.

I believe that the mutual respect which characterized the negotiations, debate, and conclusion of the Panama Canal treaties can become the basis for new relations in this hemisphere and the world. With trust and cooperation, even the most difficult and serious disputes can be settled.

The other nations in this hemisphere, all of you, are increasingly important to my country and to the world. I do not expect that our views will always coincide, but I know that we do share the same basic values. Working together in a spirit of mutual respect and trust, we can achieve our common goals: a more just economic system, enhanced human rights and dignity, and permanent peace for us all.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 11:24 a.m. in the Hall of the Americas at the Pan American Union Building.

The provisional Chairman and President of the session was Indalecio Liévano Aguirre, Foreign Minister of Colombia. Alejandro Orfila is Secretary General of the Organization of American States.

Legislative Vetoes

Message to the Congress. June 21, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In recent years, the Congress has strengthened its oversight of Executive Branch decisions. I welcome that effort. Unfortunately, there has been increasing use of one oversight device that can do more harm than good—the “legislative veto.”

In the past four years at least 48 of these provisions have been enacted—more than in the preceding twenty years. This proliferation threatens to upset the constitutional balance of responsibilities between the branches of government of the United States. It represents a fundamental departure from the way the government has been administered throughout American history. Unnecessary and unwarranted legislative veto procedures obstruct the efforts of my Administration and most members of Congress to make the administrative process quicker and simpler and divert attention from our common task of improving Federal programs and regulations.

Since taking office, I have several times expressed my deep reservations about legislative veto provisions in bills presented to me for signature. Herbert Hoover and every subsequent President have taken this position. The purpose of this message is to underscore and explain the concern and to propose alternatives.

The legislative veto was first used in the 1932 statute which authorized the President to reorganize the Executive Branch. The provision was repeated in subsequent reorganization acts, including the statute in effect today. This kind of legislative veto does not involve Congressional intrusion into the administration of on-going substantive programs, and it preserves the President's authority because he decides which proposals to submit to Congress. The Reorganization Act jeopardizes neither the President's responsibilities nor the prerogatives of Congress.

As employed in some recent legislation, however, the legislative veto injects the Congress into the details of administering substantive programs and laws. These new provisions require the President or an administrator of a government agency to submit to Congress each decision or regulation adopted under a program. Instead of the decision going into effect, action is blocked for a set time—typically 60 congressional working days—while Congress studies it. A majority of both Houses, or either House, or even a single committee, is authorized to veto the action during that period.

Such intrusive devices infringe on the Executive's constitutional duty to faithfully execute the laws. They also authorize Congressional action that has the effect of legislation while denying the President the opportunity to exercise his veto. Legislative vetoes thereby circumvent the President's role in the legislative process established by Article I, Section 7 of the Constitution.

These are fundamental constitutional issues. The Attorney General is seeking a definitive judgment on them from the courts, but no immediate resolution is in prospect. Pending a decision by the Supreme Court, it is my view, and that of the Attorney General, that these legislative veto provisions are unconstitutional.

Moreover, the legislative veto raises serious, practical policy problems.

Federal agencies issue thousands of complex regulations each year. Many are adopted after months or years of hearings and are based on many volumes of evidence. To act responsibly under a typical legislative veto provision, Congress would have to examine all of this evidence, hold its own hearings, and decide whether to overrule the agency—all in a few weeks. This task would add an additional burden to Congress' legislative agenda.

The regulatory process is rightly criticized for being slow and for creating uncertainty which cripples planning by business, state and local governments, and many others. The legislative veto greatly compounds both problems. At best, it prolongs the period of uncertainty for each regulation by several months. At worst, it can mean years of delay. Under the legislative veto procedure, Congress can only block an agency's rules, not rewrite them. If the House and Senate agree that a regulation is needed but disagree with the agency or each other on the specifics, exercise of the veto can lead to indefinite deadlock.

This danger is illustrated by the regulations concerning President Nixon's papers. Three versions of these regulations were vetoed, and it took three years to reach agreement on them. Whatever the merits of the issues, this is clearly an unsatisfactory way to decide them. Such lengthy, expensive procedures could easily become commonplace under legislative veto statutes.

In addition to causing delay, legislative veto provisions can seriously harm the regulatory process. Regulators operating under such laws would seek to avoid vetoes. They would therefore tend to give more weight to the perceived political power of affected groups and less to their substantive arguments. Meetings of regulatory commissions could degenerate into speculation about how to write rules so they would escape future disapproval of future Congressional reviewers who are not present nor represented when the rules are being drafted. Many regulations would be evolved in negotiations between agency officials and Congressional staff members, subverting requirements in present law for public notice and comment and for decisions based on the record. Parties to regulatory proceedings, never knowing when a decision might be vetoed, would have to reargue each issue in Congress.

These problems would lead many regulators to reverse the constructive trend toward adopting uniform rules. They would revert to acting on a case-by-case basis, because the legislative veto cannot be applied to such decisions. This lack of uniformity would not reduce the scope of regulation, but it would reduce clarity and certainty. Those affected would have to determine how dozens of decisions on individual fact situations might apply to their own cases, instead of abiding by a single rule.

The most troubling problem, however, is that the legislative veto treats symptoms, not causes. The vast effort required to second-guess individual regulatory decisions could impede the crucial task of revising the underlying statutes.

Agencies issue regulations because Congress passes laws authorizing them, or—frequently—mandating them. Many of these laws have not been seriously re-examined for years and need change. This year, Congress is working on key bills to reform airline regulation, encourage public participation in the regulatory process, require lobbyists to work more openly, and adopt “sunset” procedures. Next year’s agenda may be even fuller. We need legislation to speed up and simplify regulatory procedures, and we must reform a number of individual regulatory programs. We must deregulate where appropriate, make regulation easier to understand and to honor, and control the costs which regulations impose on our economy.

The President and the agency heads are responsible for improving the management of regulation, and we are doing so by administrative action encouraged by my Executive Order on improving the regulatory process. Only Congress through regulatory reform can deal with the underlying problems caused by a multitude of individual legislative mandates.

Regulation provides just one example of the problems caused by legislative vetoes; similarly severe problems arise in other areas of government. Thus, excessive use of legislative vetoes and other devices to restrict foreign policy actions can impede our ability to respond to rapidly changing world conditions. Reasonable flexibility is essential to effective government.

In sum, for both constitutional and policy reasons I strongly oppose legislative vetoes over the execution of programs. The inclusion of such a provision in a bill will be an important factor in my decision to sign or to veto it.

I urge Congress to avoid including legislative veto provisions in legislation so that confrontations can be avoided. For areas where Congress feels special oversight of regulations or other actions is needed, I urge the adoption of "report-and-wait" provisions instead of legislative vetoes. Under such a provision, the Executive "reports" a proposed action to Congress and "waits" for a specified period before putting it into effect. This waiting period permits a dialogue with Congress to work out disagreements and gives Congress the opportunity to pass legislation, subject to my veto, to block or change the Executive action. Legislation establishing "report-and-wait" procedures has been introduced. Even these procedures consume resources and cause delays, however, so they should be used sparingly.

As for legislative vetoes over the execution of programs already prescribed in legislation and in bills I must sign for other reasons, the Executive Branch will generally treat them as "report-and-wait" provisions. In such a case, if Congress subsequently adopts a resolution to veto an Executive action, we will give it serious consideration, but we will not, under our reading of the Constitution, consider it legally binding.

The desire for the legislative veto stems in part from Congress' mistrust of the Executive, due to the abuses of years past. Congress responded to those abuses by enacting constructive safeguards in such areas as war powers and the budget process. The legislative veto, however, is an overreaction which increases conflict between the branches of government. We need, instead, to focus on the future. By working together, we can restore trust and make the government more responsive and effective.

Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under Law

*Remarks at a White House Reception.
June 21, 1978*

First of all, let me say that I'm very proud to welcome you to the White House and to have you here with me. It's always gratifying and very rare for a President to be associated with success, and you all have proven a remarkable degree of success in one of the finest and most idealistic and successful endeavors, I think, that our country has seen.

I know that 15 years ago, here in this White House, many people, Bernie Segal, the late Harrison Tweed, Lloyd Cutler, and others, came together to form the Lawyers' Committee for Civil Rights Under the Law. At that time our Nation faced an almost hopeless prospect of transforming the ideals and the dreams of many people who were suffering from deprivation and discrimination into the realization of those hopes. And you had confidence that this challenge could be met successfully.

You've been a great help, not only to my predecessors here in the White House, and to me, but more importantly, you've helped those who were least able to help themselves. And as a southerner, one who's seen the remarkable transformation, not only among those who were previously deprived but among those who were reluctant to see the changes made, I can express to you from the bottom of my heart the appreciation of a grateful nation.

We've had an opportunity to expand a few dedicated, competent professionals who work full time at the enhancement of basic civil rights into literally thousands of volunteers from some of the most prominent law firms in our country and, of course, some small independent lawyers as well.

This has obviously been helpful to the furthering of civil rights for those who need legal assistance. But it's also provided an avenue backward—or perhaps it would be better to say in the other direction—because it has made the establishment figures, the wealthy, the secure, the blessed, the influential citizens of many communities around our country become personally acquainted with the deprivations that they would otherwise never have understood. And I believe that there has been an arousing of the consciousness of our Nation about a challenge that was potentially crippling to our societal structure and which has proven, under your leadership and with your dedication, to be so successful.

We brought several of your active members into my administration. I won't try to name them all. Drew Days is obviously one, Eleanor Holmes Norton, Cyrus Vance, Joe Califano, and others. I hate to go down the list. But I think that this is a credit to our Government, that there could be a climate here wherein they felt they could continue their good work from a varied series of perspectives, from the Secretary of State to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, and in agencies in between, whose motivation and purpose is benevolent in character.

I know that you've also extended your influence in a beneficial way overseas, providing help for those who suffer from racial discrimination, for instance, in South Africa.

I've had a chance to triple the amount of money that we spend for the enhancement of civil rights. We are trying to reorganize the structure so that there would be a clearer assignment of responsibility and also a clearer identification of the reasons for delay or failure. And Eleanor Holmes Norton is one who has the background and experience and the dedication, the tenacity, the reputation and esteem to make this transformation be felt in the way in which it has been intended.

We'll continue with these efforts, and I come here, to summarize, to first of all thank you for the great work that you have done in the past, to express my gratification at being a present part of it, to recognize from the perspective of the Presidency itself what it has meant to our entire country, and perhaps even to the world, and to express my belief and confidence that your achievements in the future will, if possible, be even greater for those who need us most.

Thank you very much.

National Earthquake Hazards Reduction Program

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. June 22, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

Throughout its history, the human race has faced the threat of earthquakes, but in the last few years advances in science and technology have taught us more about earthquakes, and reduced the mystery of their origin and effects. These advances now permit us to anticipate earthquakes and to mitigate their potentially disastrous consequences. Today there is hope that we may eventually be able to predict earthquakes reliably.

Through the Earthquake Hazards Reduction Act of 1977 (Public Law 95-124), the Congress seeks to apply these advances by "the establishment and maintenance of an effective earthquake hazards reduction program." I am transmitting today a plan for a National Earthquake Hazards Reduction Program. This program is designed to meet the objectives of the important legislation you have passed. It deals with: predicting and preparing for earthquakes; ways in which government, industry, and the public can apply knowledge of seismic risk when making land-use decisions; and achieving earthquake-resistant design and construction.

As this program emphasizes, the Federal Government must set a strong example in developing guidelines and standards for its own facilities. But Federal effort alone is not enough; to succeed in this effort, we must have the cooperative efforts of State and local governments, industry and business, professional and volunteer organizations, and the public.

The Cyprus Conflict

*Message to the Congress Reporting on Progress Toward a Negotiated Settlement.
June 23, 1978*

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by Public Law 94-104, this report describes the progress that has been made during the past sixty days towards a negotiated settlement on Cyprus.

On April 13 representatives of the Turkish Cypriot community presented to U.N. Secretary General Waldheim a description of the proposals that they intend to put on the table once the Cyprus intercommunal talks, in recess since April 1977, are reconvened. After examining these proposals, the Secretary General issued a public statement characterizing them as "concrete and substantial" yet cautioning at the same time that he had reached no judgment on their merits. On April 19 the Secretary General travelled to Nicosia, where he explained the new Turkish Cypriot proposals to the Government of Cyprus. Later that day President Kyprianou declared to a press conference that the proposals were "entirely inadmissible" and totally inadequate as a basis for resuming intercommunal negotiations. At the same time, however, he did not completely close the door to a new round of talks.

These new Turkish Cypriot proposals represent a limited advance over the positions that the Turkish Cypriots have assumed in previous negotiating sessions. Reflecting earlier ideas, the new constitutional proposal stresses substantial self-government for each of the two zones and the concept of equality of representation for the two communities in the future central government of Cyprus. Yet it is substantially more developed and detailed than the brief and sketchy paper tabled by the Turkish Cypriot representative at the last round of talks in Vienna in April 1977. Our understanding, moreover, is that the Turkish Cypriots have in fact prepared an entire draft constitution for consideration once negotiations commence. As far as the territorial issue is concerned, the Turkish Cypriots have designated six general areas in the vicinity of the present demarcation line whose transfer to Greek administration they would be prepared to negotiate, and they have not ruled out discussing other areas that the Greek Cypriots may wish to raise. The Turkish Cypriots refrained from specifying ing the percentage of territory that they would be prepared to transfer to the Greek Cypriot side on the grounds that this would deprive them of the negotiating flexibility they were seeking to preserve. While this territorial proposal is not as concrete as some would have hoped, it does represent an advance in that for the first time the Turkish Cypriots have clearly agreed to sit at the table and discuss territorial concessions. In a separate proposal on Varosha (New Famagusta), the Turkish Cypriots indicated that they would be prepared to permit Greek Cypriot inhabitants to return to their homes and properties in the city, which is now almost totally uninhabited but behind the Turkish line.

The Government of Cyprus has justified its rejection of the Turkish Cypriot proposals on the grounds that they provide not for the creation of a federation, as called for in the Makarios-Denktash understanding of February 1977, but rather for partition of the island into two separate states. Clearly there is a broad conceptual gap between the two sides on the constitutional issue. A second Greek Cypriot contention is that the April 13 proposals envisage the return of only a very small portion of the territory of the Republic of Cyprus to Greek Cypriot control and that Greek Cypriot resettlement of Varosha under Turkish Cypriot administration would be unacceptable.

The Turks and Turkish Cypriots have repeatedly stressed both in public and in private that they are fully prepared to be flexible and to negotiate in earnest once the talks are reconvened. They have underscored that the April 13 proposals represent only a starting-point and should not be construed as the final Turkish Cypriot position. Recently, more substantial indications of Turkish flexibility have emerged. In a press conference in Bonn on May 11 Prime Minister Ecevit gave assurances that the political framework of Varosha is open to negotiation; the Turks have authoritatively stated that as many as 35,000 Greek Cypriots will be allowed to return to Varosha; and they have specified that this return can commence as soon as the talks are resumed. At the same time, however, the Turkish side has made it clear that no new proposals will be developed in advance of actual negotiations, which they have called upon Secretary General Waldheim to schedule without further delay.

On May 2 Secretary General Waldheim issued a statement noting that a significant gap continued to exist between the two Cypriot parties and announcing his intention to hold further consultations in order to clarify their positions regarding a resumption of the negotiating process. The Secretary General has recently met with President Kyprianou and Turkish Cypriot leader Denktash as well as with Prime Ministers Ecevit and Caramanlis. We understand that Special United Nations Representative on Cyprus Galindo Pohl will be undertaking further consultations in the area.

On May 22 Turkish Cypriot leader Denktash issued a statement which clarified and to a certain extent reformulated the Turkish Cypriot position on resumption of the intercommunal talks. This was in many respects a positive and encouraging statement. First, Mr. Denktash reaffirmed Turkish Cypriot readiness to enter into "sustained, intensive good-faith negotiations" with the Greek Cypriots, and he noted that he had made a commitment to Secretary General Waldheim to enter into these negotiations "with an open mind and in a spirit of conciliation and flexibility." Second, with respect to the territorial issue, Mr. Denktash declared that he was prepared to consider "significant geographical readjustments" which would enable "a considerable number of Greek Cypriots to resettle." Third, Mr. Denktash spoke of important concessions on Varosha, including the return of some 35,000 Greek Cypriot inhabitants in the course of negotiations. And fourth, Mr. Denktash stated that the Turkish Cypriots were eager to discuss with the Greek Cypriots other steps for healing the wounds of the past, such as the reopening of Nicosia airport and joint economic projects. It should be possible to build on these ideas, and on the proposals put forward by the two sides, to move towards an early resolution of the Cyprus problem.

In his May 24 address to the U.N. Special Session on Disarmament, President Kyprianou put forward a proposal for the complete demilitarization of Cyprus and for the creation of a mixed Greek Cypriot-Turkish Cypriot police force, in proportion to population, under the guidance and supervision of the United Nations.

The Administration has fully supported the efforts of the Secretary General to reconvene productive intercommunal negotiations. We will continue to do so. It is our conviction that this is a crucial moment in the history of Cyprus. If talks are not resumed at an early date, opportunities for progress on the issue may well be delayed for some time to come, and as a consequence the unfortunate de facto division of the island could further solidify. It is for this reason that every effort must now be made to bring the parties together for sustained, good-faith, and productive negotiations.

Digest of Other White House Announcements

The following listing includes the President's daily schedule and other items of general interest as announced by the White House Press Office during the period covered by this issue. Events and announcements printed elsewhere in the issue are not included.

June 17

The President had breakfast with Brig. Gen. Omar Torrijos Herrera, Chief of the Government and Commander of the National Guard of Panama, at the El Panama Hotel, prior to the second multilateral discussion with other Latin American and Caribbean leaders.

Following the departure ceremony at Tocumen International Airport, which was attended by General Torrijos and President Lakas of Panama, the President left Panama and returned to the White House.

June 18

The President and Mrs. Carter hosted a buffet supper and jazz festival, featuring 40 American jazz artists, on the South Lawn of the White House. The event was in honor of the 25th anniversary of the Newport Jazz Festival.

June 19

The President met at the White House with:

- Zbigniew Brzezinski, Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs;
- the Cabinet;
- Vice President Walter F. Mondale.

At the invitation of the President of the Federal Republic of Germany, Walter Scheel, the President and Mrs. Carter will make a state visit to the Federal Republic of Germany on July 14–15. While in Germany, they also intend to visit Berlin.

The President has designated Joseph O. Parker and William R. Alberger as Chairman and Vice Chairman, respectively, of the United States International Trade Commission, for terms expiring June 16, 1980.

June 20

The President met at the White House with:

- Dr. Brzezinski;
- Representatives Lester L. Wolff of New York and Glenn English of Oklahoma;
- members of the National Council of Churches Full Employment Mobilization Group;
- Hamilton Jordon, Assistant to the President, Robert R. Bowie, Deputy Director, National Intelligence, Central Intelligence Agency, and Dr. Brzezinski;
- Jay Solomon, Administrator of the General Services Administration;
- James T. McIntyre, Jr., Director of the Office of Management and Budget.

The President participated in a foreign policy briefing for Members of Congress at the White House. Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance, Secretary of Defense Harold Brown, and Dr. Brzezinski also participated in the discussions.

June 21

The President met at the White House with:

- David L. Aaron, Deputy Assistant for National Security Affairs;
- Danny C. Tate and William H. Cable, Deputy Assistants for Congressional Liaison;
- the Democratic congressional leadership;

- Mrs. Carter, for lunch;
- business and trade association representatives, who were meeting to discuss civil service reform.

June 22

The President met at the White House with:

- Dr. Brzezinski;
- a group of Senators and Representatives, to discuss the Bonn summit meeting;
- Senator Russell B. Long of Louisiana and several other Members of Congress, and a group of administration officials, to discuss sugar imports and prices;
- Sayed Marei, Speaker of the People's Assembly of Egypt;
- representatives of the Greek American community.

The President transmitted to the Congress the annual report of the National Institute of Building Sciences.

June 23

The President met at the White House with:

- Vice President Mondale, Secretary Vance, Dr. Brzezinski, and Mr. Jordan;
- Frank B. Moore, Assistant to the President for Congressional Liaison.

The President departed the White House for a trip to Texas.

Fort Worth, Texas

Remarks and a Question-and-Answer Session at a Luncheon Sponsored by Fort Worth Civic Organizations. June 23, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Senator Bentsen, Majority Leader Jim Wright, Mayor Parmer, Mr. Tinsley, distinguished officials, and other citizens of this beautiful part of the world:

I'm glad to be back in Fort Worth. When John Kennedy came here 15 years ago, he said, "I'm glad to be in Jim Wright's city." It's the way I feel.

I have to work daily with the top leaders of Congress. Jim Wright occupies one of those top positions. He's a man of sound judgment, sensitivity, knowledge of our country and, above all, represents the epitome of what is the spirit of Texas, and you can't be any better than that.

It's good to come to Fort Worth to be with the Chamber of Commerce and all the guests who have welcomed me here. You have a 3.4 percent unemployment rate. You must be doing something right. You've got the tremendous metropolplex area here—Dallas, Fort Worth—the second largest community in the world not on a major waterway, and Jim Wright is trying to work on that. [Laughter]

Jim Wright mentioned the word "courage," and it kind of describes the way I feel today to come here among westerners who are interested in unlimited water projects, farmers who are concerned about beef imports, oil and gas producers who are concerned about energy legislation. I feel about like Proposition 13 at a bureaucrat's picnic. [Laughter]

This noon, I'm going to make just a few remarks and then spend what time we have available answering your questions. As a Georgian, I would want to point out the Dallas and Fort Worth airport is the fourth largest in the world. The second largest happens to be in Atlanta.

Bob Strauss is helping me, as you know, with inflation, and we are concerned about the value of the dollar overseas. On the airplane, he came up to my cabin and said, "I've got a good idea on how to make sure that the foreign currency doesn't improve its value faster than the American dollar." He said, "I think we ought to get the German deutsche marks, the Japanese yen, and run them through the change machine at the airport over here at Dallas and Fort Worth. [Laughter]"

It's exciting for me to come to a State that has 25 percent of all our oil, 35 percent of all our natural gas. If it was an independent nation—and thank God it's not—it would be the fifth greatest energy producer on Earth, a State that's number one in cattle production, number one in cotton production, number one in grain sorghum production, a State that stands for the essence of what America is.

I've tapped very heavily in Texas to help me with some of my most important questions, and quite often at a Cabinet meeting, Bob Strauss will look around and remind me that Texas outnumbers Georgia 2 to 1 when the Cabinet meets with me.

I'm committed to a strong defense, and Charles Duncan from Texas, the Deputy Secretary of Defense, is there at my right hand constantly to deal with problems of increasing the power of NATO to maintain peace. I'm interested in preserving peace in the Middle East. Sam Lewis, Ambassador to Israel, happens to be a Texan.

We're trying to deal with inflation. Bob Strauss is helping me there—happens to be a Texan. We're dealing with the Federal bureaucracy. One of the most important goals that we have is to bring about more efficiency with civil service reform. The leader of this effort, the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, is Scotty Campbell—happens to be a Texan.

We're dealing with some of the sensitive human issues, immigration, naturalization laws. The man in charge of this, Leonel Castillo, happens to be a Texan.

A year ago my biggest problem domestically was an extremely high unemployment rate. We've brought it down now 2 percent. We have 5 million more Americans at work today than we did when I came in office. The man responsible for that to a major degree is the Secretary of Labor, Ray Marshall, who happens to be from Texas.

I think last year the Congress passed the best farm bill of all time. It's starting to turn around some serious problems in agriculture. The Deputy Secretary of Agriculture who helped marshal this bill through the Congress was John White, who happens to be from Texas.

I could take all my time talking about others who helped me in Washington. But I think you can see very clearly that what we are doing there represents accurately, with strong leadership from your State, what Texans want and expect from government.

I'd like to mention just two particular items before I answer questions. One of them is agriculture, because I know this is the center of one of the major producing areas of the country, even the world. We have had some improvement since last August when the new farm bill went into effect. Farm prices are up 25 percent; wheat, 30 percent; soybeans, 30 percent; corn, 40 percent; cattle, 40 percent.

I'll discuss in a few minutes the problems with beef, because I know that's so important to you. But even by increasing beef imports to a very tiny degree, compared to total production, we'll still have in our country this year 1 billion pounds more beef consumed than we can or will produce.

We've had net farm income go up. Last year net farm income was about $20 billion. We anticipate now a 25-percent increase, to more than $25 billion this year.

And we've concentrated on exports, as well. Last year we set an all-time record for farm exports, $24 billion, and we'll increase that this year with a total tonnage of farm exports, even with a better price, up about 10 percent.

The other item I'd like to discuss briefly, and I'll talk about it more in Houston this evening, is energy. Our national will is being tested. We are the only developed nation in the world that has not cut back on energy consumption since the oil embargo and the rapid increase in price brought about by OPEC in 1973. Oil imports have doubled in the last 6 years.

In 1977, we imported $10 billion more oil than we did the year before. And we have not yet come to grips with one of the greatest and most complicated challenges that any government has ever faced. We must conserve scarce energy. We must provide adequate incentives for increased exploration and increased American production. And we must search out also alternatives, permanent alternatives, to the depleting fossil fuels on which we are so heavily dependent.

The present energy policy of our country encourages consumption; it discourages exploration and production. The Congress so far has made good progress; they've been dealing with this question now since April of 1977. And I look forward to this chance today and tonight and tomorrow to discuss these two major issues with you and others—agriculture, trade, exports, inflation, and how they are tied in directly with the energy question.

This is a job, the Presidency of the United States, that is sometimes lonely. I represent what our Nation is to other people around the world. And it grieves me at times not to be able to put forward a demonstration of accomplishment, a willingness for us to deal with those crucial questions that are of importance to us all. I've had remarkable cooperation from Jim Wright, Lloyd Bentsen, the congressional delegation, other Members of the Congress, in this first 17 months.

In spite of the transient concerns that we have about unemployment, which is improving, inflation, which is still a serious question, our Nation is still strong, able, dedicated, idealistic. It's solid in its permanent commitment to the ideals that have made our country great.

We stand for something all over the world—decency, freedom, democracy, human rights, growth, vigor—and as long as I'm in the White House, I'll represent you in these commitments.

I'd like to close by saying this: Every time I've ever come to Texas, every time my wife or my family have ever come to Texas, even in those months long ago when I was a lonely candidate whom very few people knew or cared about, we have not only been well received with typical Texas hospitality, but you've given me a chance to speak my piece, to make my views be known, and you showed confidence in me. I thank you for it.

I feel personally a compatibility with the people of Texas. We share a lot, and as President of the United States, I feel a great compatibility with what you are, people who believe in patriotism in its finest form, people who have shown in the past an ability to provide great leadership, with Lyndon Baines Johnson and many others, and those who are always willing to face the future, not with fear or timidity or trepidation, but with courage, anticipation, and confidence that our great Nation and your great State will be even greater in the years to come.

Thank you very much.

And now, I'd like to answer some questions.

QUESTIONS

U.S.-SOVIET RELATIONS

Q. Mr. President, my name is Hal Ray, Jr., and I'm from Wichita Falls. Your National Security Adviser, Mr. Brzezinski, and Secretary of State Vance seem to have differing views on the United States relations with the Soviet Union. Would you tell us what you think of the relationship between our two nations and the seeming to be cooling off attitude between us and the Russians?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes. I'd like to say first of all that there is an overwhelming cooperation and compatibility between Secretary Vance, Dr. Brzezinski, Harold Brown, who heads the Defense Department, and others who help me shape foreign policy.

Unfortunately in our country, quite often special interest groups who don't like what I decide—and I'm President, and I make the final decisions—always look for a scapegoat or someone they can attack without attacking me personally. And I don't think it's fair. It's certainly not right for the Soviet Union and Cuba to jump on Dr. Brzezinski when I'm the one who shapes the policy after getting advice from him and others.

We want to get along with the Soviet Union. We are determined to stay strong. We're not going to let the Soviet Union push us around. We're not going to be second—[applause]. We're not going to be second ever in the principles on which our Nation stands. We're not going to be second to anyone in our economic status, the political strength of our country, the dependence upon what our people individually are, our commitment to human rights, nor militarily. And I want to be sure that in all of our dealings with the Soviet Union and other countries, that this is clearly understood.

I believe that the best way to get along with the Soviet Union, to emphasize friendship and cooperation and peace, is for our country to be consistent, is for our country to be strong. I'm determined to have a SALT agreement with the Soviet Union without unwarranted delay. We're making good progress. I'm determined to have an agreement with the Soviet Union on a comprehensive test ban to stop the spread of atomic weapons among our two countries and around the world. And I would like to see improved trade with the Soviet Union, to give our farmers and others a better market for our products. And we are proceeding with those in an unconstrained, uninterrupted way.

So, I would say that we shape our foreign policy in complete harmony. I make the final decisions. And I believe that we are dealing from a basis of strength. And I think the Soviets in the long run respect that strength. We've not been pushed into a corner by artificial deadlines on SALT negotiations. We're doing it slowly, carefully, and methodically. And I want to be sure when we do have a SALT agreement—which I expect, as I say, without further delay—that it will be based upon adequate strength for our own country, compared to the Soviets; a good verification procedure, so we can ensure that the agreement is carried out to maintain the strategic balance, so neither country will have an advantage over the other. And I believe that we will be successful.

I have complete assurance that our relationship with the Soviet Union is stable. And I reserve the right, when they make an unwarranted intrusion, for instance in Africa, to speak for our country and deplore their threat to the good attitude that American people would like to have with the Soviet Union that demonstrates its desire to have peace, which is what we want.

NATIONAL HEALTH CARE

Q. Mr. President, other dignitaries, and guests, I'm Eve Schultz from Mansfield, Texas. My question is, do you have any new ideas or information that you might wish to expand on regarding a national health policy?

THE PRESIDENT. As you presently know, our Nation is laboring under an inadequate health program. The cost of health care is growing at more than twice the nationwide inflation rate. We've had a rapid increase in the total financial burden of Americans for health care. We have dozens of Federal agencies now responsible for administering our health laws. What I want to see evolved is a comprehensive health care plan that will give Americans good health care, primarily emphasizing prevention of disease at the lowest possible cost, with an emphasis on outpatient care instead of inpatient care, an increased use of immunization programs, non-medical-doctor care, when it's appropriate under the supervision of medical doctors, and a tough anti-inflation component.

We are trying to evolve this in such a way that we will not have a major increase in the cost of health care in our country. And I want to be sure that when we do put a health care program into effect, whenever the Congress decides to do so, that the cost of a given level of health care will not be higher, but lower.

The exact rate of implementation of such a health care plan will have to depend upon budget constraints and the change, which might be slow, in the Federal bureaucracy. But we are working very carefully on it, and within the next few weeks, I will present to the Congress—rather, to the Secretary of HEW, a set of principles in more detail than I've just described to you.

Secretary Califano will then consult with Members of Congress, the medical care community, doctors, hospitals, and others, and make a recommendation publicly later on this year. But those are some of the principles that I see as being needed—careful attention to cost, better preventive care, outpatient care, immunizations, and a broader use of health care professionals and less cost for Americans for a given level of care. I believe we can do all those things within the constraints I've set.

NUCLEAR POWER

Q. Mr. President, my name is Joe Cook, and I'm from Dallas. First, I'd like to preface my question by saying that I welcome you to our area and that I certainly am proud of the many accomplishments which you've stated today, although on occasion I have disagreed with you.

My question concerns one of your campaign promises to reduce our country's dependence on nuclear power as the primary energy source for the future. Your reasons at that time, which I wholeheartedly agreed with, concern the environmental and health dangers from operation of the plants, and especially lack of safe ways to dispose of nuclear wastes, some of which have a half-life of some 250,000 years.

Your administration's energy policy under, I presume, substantial influence from Secretary Schlesinger, seems to be moving in the opposite direction. Why is that? And specifically, what will you do to deemphasize nuclear power and stimulate rapid development of safe alternative energy sources, such as solar, for the future?

THE PRESIDENT. Dr. Schlesinger is here. [Laughter] But I'll answer the question.

I think we've got a very good and sound policy evolving concerning nuclear power. My own background in graduate work is in nuclear physics and nuclear power, and I think I understand both the limitations and the capabilities of nuclear power as a layman and also as President.

We've tried to emphasize as best we can the shift toward permanent fuel sources—Texas has taken a leadership role in that—more use of coal, decreased waste, more conservation, and the use of nuclear power in such a way that it will be safe, that waste products can be disposed of as they have not been in the past, in a safe fashion, and a predictable fashion, and to stop the spread of nuclear explosives around the world.

The Congress has now passed legislation ensuring a nonproliferation policy by the end of this year.

For the first time in 30, 35 years, we'll have a proposal to make on waste disposal. We've tried to expedite the licensing of nuclear powerplants which are needed, to be sure they'll be located in safe places and to be sure they're environmentally acceptable.

So, I would say that our position is balanced. I have never said, nor do I believe, that we should not use nuclear power. But we ought to have conservation, permanent sources used, like solar power, long-term sources like coal, and have nuclear power, when it is used, be safe.

INFLATION

Q. Mr. President, my name is P. L. Jones. I'm from Arlington, Texas. And my question is, do you think there is a chance of a decrease in the inflation rate in the near, foreseeable future?

THE PRESIDENT. No. [Laughter] I think the underlying inflation rate has now gone up about a half of 1 percent. We did have an extraordinary inflation rate for the first 3 months of this year. That will not be maintained; it will go down, I think, some. But our first goal is just to stabilize the inflation rate and not let it keep going up. This is not an easy thing to do. It's going to require tough government action, and I intend to do all I can to prevent unnecessary spending. I'll use the veto, if necessary, to stop any attack on holding down the budget deficit.

The Federal Government can also set a limit on how much unnecessary regulation costs on the inflation rate. Airline deregulation has been a good example of that. We are trying to get industry and labor to cooperate. But you have to remember that we have very fine special interest groups, each one of which wants everybody else to control inflation. Everybody wants to build water projects. The veterans want more payments. Farmers want higher prices. We want to have as much increase in wages among labor unions. Business doesn't want to have their own profit margins or prices constrained. Teachers want more money for education, and so forth.

Every one of those groups has a good argument, and somebody has got to stand up and say, no, inflation has got to come first. And that person is me.

Since I mentioned teachers, let me say, "That person is I." [Laughter]

EMPLOYMENT OF MINORITIES

Q. Hello, Mr. President, my name is Guinevere Bradley. I'm from Sweetwater, Texas. I'm representing the Mayor's Council on Youth Opportunity, and my question is, with rising prices and inflation at its highest, what do you see in the future for better hiring practices, more and better jobs for minorities?

THE PRESIDENT. As I said a few minutes ago, a year ago the overriding question that was on my shoulders, as the number one domestic problem, was unemployment. We had about 8 percent unemployment when I came in office. Because of the good action of the Congress and also the private sector, we've improved that substantially. We've had a net increase of about 5.5 million jobs in the last 17 months. Among adult male minority Americans the unemployment rate has dropped substantially. Among all Americans the unemployment rate has dropped substantially.

In Texas, for instance, the unemployment rate has dropped over 2½ percent. You've had more than 500,000 net jobs added in Texas in the last year. But we still have a very serious problem among minority young people and minority women.

My guess is that these focused Federal programs that are already on the books and already financed, the comprehensive education training programs, local public works, and so forth, can now be focused much more accurately upon those minority citizens who have not yet benefited, because they are ordinarily the last ones hired and the first ones fired. And as the general economy improves, that competition for scarce jobs goes down, and the Federal programs, which I hope will be temporary and not needed in the future, can be channeled much more accurately to the people about whom you asked.

Thank you.

U.S. POLICY IN AFRICA

Q. Mr. Carter, I'm Lloyd Gite, presently living in Dallas. There's been a lot of talk in the last year or so about the situation in southern Africa. The United States Government has expressed an interest in seeing that majority rule comes to Rhodesia, Zimbabwe, better known as South Africa, and also Namibia, better known as South West Africa.

I'd like to know just how far the United States Government is willing to go to see that majority rule comes to those three countries, especially South Africa. Just how committed is the United States Government?

THE PRESIDENT. I understand this will have to be the last question, but let me try to answer this as briefly as I can.

I think all of you would agree that our Nation's interest in the tremendous continent of Africa has only been aroused in the last few years. We have a uniform policy, both publicly and privately, to encourage majority rule in the nations of southern Africa.

We have a new friendship, I believe, with major African leaders, those who are the frontline states around Rhodesia, the leaders of Nigeria and others. We have combined our efforts with those of the British, primarily, who have a legal right in Rhodesia to try to bring about majority rule there.

Secretary Vance, myself, and our constant efforts through our delegations, ambassadors, and so forth, are trying to bring together the so-called internal government leaders, four of them, as you know, and those comprising the so-called Patriotic Front. We want to do this in such a way that the interests of the minority groups there, who are white, are protected, and so that there can be free elections and unlimited registration. These are the principles that we have put forward.

The arguments at this point are about the transition period. What will be the role played by the United Nations? Who will control the police? How will the two armies be merged after a settlement comes? Who can qualify to run for public office?

In Namibia, we represent the United Nations with four other major Western countries—Canada, Great Britain, France, and Germany. We're trying to bring about a situation where South Africa will withdraw from Namibia and permit free elections to be held, based on those same principles of majority rule.

We are down to just a few, mostly two, remaining issues. One is the status of Walvisbaai, which is a seaport there in Namibia. The other one is how many South African troops will be left in Namibia during the election period, and where they will be located.

We're making progress. I think it's accurate to say that we have let our views be known much more freely the last year and a half than before. The South Africans know very clearly that we stand for those principles that I have described to you. And we will not change those commitments at all.

This is a very troubled part of the world, and it would be a mistake for us to lose the trust of people in our good intentions and in the integrity of what we say. But I believe everyone involved understands that what I've outlined to you very briefly is our constant, unchanging public and private policy. We intend to pursue it with tenacity; we will do the best we can to bring about our hopes there; we will not get militarily involved on the continent of Africa.

Let me say again how deeply grateful I am to come to meet with you. You've received me well again. It makes me feel proud to be President, to come and see such a large group who are interested in our Government. And I ask you to give me your support, your confidence, your criticisms when you disagree with me, and at all times, your prayers.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 1:16 p.m. at the Tarrant County Convention Center. In his opening remarks, he referred to Mayor Hugh Parmer of Fort Worth and Jack Tinsley, executive editor of the Fort Worth Star-Telegram and an organizer and master of ceremonies for the event.

Ellington Air Force Base, Texas

Remarks on Arrival. June 23, 1978

Thank you very much for coming out to make me feel so much at home. Mayor McConn, Senator Bentsen, Congressman Bob Gammage, Congressman Bob Eckhardt, other members of the Texas congressional delegation, NASA guests, and Texas friends, thank you very much.

First of all, I want to express my deep appreciation to all of you for coming out this afternoon to make me feel welcome again to one of the greatest States in the country and a State which exemplifies in the finest possible way all the characteristics that make our Nation the greatest nation on Earth.

I arrived at Carswell Air Force Base this morning and had a meeting with about 6,000 people in Fort Worth for a short speech and a question-and-answer period. This afternoon, as you may know, I'll be making a speech to a group in Houston, and I hope some of you will come to hear me. Tomorrow I go to Beaumont and then on to Fort Hood.

I think all of us who leave Washington and who come to Texas have the same reaction. It's big, it's open, it's progressive, it's friendly, and the people are patriotic and have always been good partners of mine, and I thank you for that.

Ellington Air Force Base is certainly the embodiment of all these characteristics. The people of the United States have a sentimental attachment to Ellington. From its early days as an air base during World War I, long before aviation played a very significant role in the defense of our country, to its latest role as a training site for the most advanced astronauts on Earth, working to make the space shuttle a success, Ellington has made a significant contribution to our Nation's security.

I know that you've been concerned about the future of Ellington. The General Services Administration and the Office of Management and Budget, my own staff, and others have been carefully studying this problem ever since the Air Force decided that it no longer needed to use Ellington on a full-time basis as an air base. Bob Gammage has kept this issue constantly before us all. [Laughter]

As a result of this study, I'm pleased to be able to announce today that GSA, the United States Government, will not be releasing Ellington for public sale.

There were two significant factors that we had to consider in making this decision. First was my concern about any possible adverse effect on NASA's space program, which is so important to our country and to the world.

NASA has occupied, as you know, an enclosure at the southern end of the Ellington flightline since the time that the site for the nearby Johnson Air Space Center was first selected in the early 1960's. NASA uses those facilities primarily for flight operations, to support the Johnson Center, and for the astronauts proficiency training program. This is a program that our Nation needs to maintain the strength of our country in the space program, and the decision to retain Ellington will allow this important work to continue.

Second is that we need more time to determine the best future use of this very valuable property. Many interests are involved in that decision—the Federal Government and many agencies of the Federal Government, the State, local governments, and also the people of this area, and we must do careful, patient work to plan how best to accommodate all these varying needs.

I've asked the General Services Administration to develop a long-range plan for the proper use of this facility. I've asked that in reaching their decision, they take into consideration not only Federal, State, and local government needs but also the economic and commercial needs of the surrounding community.

I suspect that many of you have been giving this problem some consideration. Bob Gammage, Senator Lloyd Bentsen in particular, have been fighting so hard for your interests and the interests of the Nation in maintaining this base. They join me in asking you to communicate your views, through them, about how this valuable property might best be used.

In the interval, I've asked Jay Solomon, who's the Administrator of the General Services Administration, to manage and to maintain this base.

In my remarks a few hours ago at Fort Worth, I mentioned some of the economic forces that make our Nation strong. Tomorrow, at Fort Hood, where I, as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces, will see a demonstration of American firepower, I will review some of the superb military capability that protects our place and our peace in the world. The people of this State, this region, and of this base, have always proudly served in that same cause, defending our Nation's interests and our principles whenever they may be threatened.

I'm glad to know that in different ways Ellington Base will continue to serve our country.

Again, I'd like to express my thanks for your presence, my admiration for the great State of Texas, and my hope that I will see many of you this evening. But for the time being now, I'd like to come and shake hands with some of you, to let you know how much I think of you.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 3:33 p.m. In his opening remarks, he referred to Mayor James McConn of Houston.

Houston, Texas

*Remarks at a Democratic Fundraising Dinner.
June 23, 1978*

Governor Dolph Briscoe, Governor Edwin Edwards, Mayor McConn, Majority Leader Jim Wright, Congresswoman Barbara Jordan, Congressmen Eckhardt, Gammage from this area, and others in the great Texas political delegation in Washington, Attorney General John Hill, Lieutenant Governor Hobby, fellow

Democrats that I've met already tonight from Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, New Mexico, Florida, California, Arkansas, Mississippi, and other States:

I'm glad to be here with you. Thank you for the wonderful welcome. It's a wonderful night for Democrats.

It would be difficult to single out all the brilliant Democratic political leaders who are here tonight. But I would like to comment on two Texans whom I've gotten to know well and who mean a lot to me. One of them is Senator Lloyd Bentsen, a man who's difficult to describe in adequate superlatives, who is a fiscal conservative, who's a social progressive in a very courageous way, who has a strong national defense commitment, who's a statesman on foreign affairs, and within this framework of brief description, is one of the strongest advocates for Texas and what you stand for that I've ever met.

When we agree, he's a valuable ally; when we disagree, he's a fair and a formidable adversary. He is a man who's completely qualified to serve not only in the United States Senate but in the very highest office of our land. And since I never found an appropriate occasion to say this during the Texas Presidential primary in 1976, I wanted to say it tonight. [Laughter]

The other Texan is not quite so well known, and before I say a few comments about him, I'd like to give a little background.

Right after I was elected President, Helen Strauss called me on the phone, and she said, "President Carter, I would like to ask a favor of you." I said, "I'd be glad to do anything for you, Helen." She said, "I'd like for you to give my husband a job." [Laughter] And I said, "Well, you've been a friend of mine for a long time, and I care a lot about you. I know you as a superlative American leader. Who is your husband?" [Laughter]

She said, "My husband's name is Bob Strauss. He has been the chairman of the Democratic Party." And I said, "Yes, I believe I've heard of him, although I don't know him well." [Laughter] I said, "Can you tell me something about his qualifications?" And she said, "Well, we are old friends, are we not?" And I said, "Yes, we are." She said, "Well, it would suit me better if we didn't discuss qualifications." [Laughter]

I said, "Well, why, since you all have lived in Washington, would you want to get your husband a job to stay in the Capital City?" She said, "Well, in the first place, he's exhausted from helping with the campaigns of Lloyd Bentsen and Scoop Jackson." [Laughter] "He would like to have a job where he can stay home every night and get some rest. He's become accustomed to beautiful clothing styles and the Washington night life. He hates to go back to Texas and get his fancy Italian shoes messed up with cow manure." [Laughter]

I understand now that he's on a Federal salary with a pay freeze in, that he's buying his shoes from South Korea and Taiwan and Hong Kong. [Laughter]

But to make a long story short, Bob Strauss has come to work for me, and he does an absolutely superlative job. Not only does he represent our Nation well in international economic circles, but he very often gives me sound advice, seriously speaking.

He pointed out to me that in Texas he had been quite successful and that one of the reasons for political success was that there has to be an intimate trust and interrelationship between the top political officeholder and those who serve in important positions, that one of those ways to guarantee this is have a blood relationship. He made two recommendations, one of which I did not follow, and the other one

I did. He recommended by brother, Billy, as Ambassador to the Vatican. [Laughter] I couldn't take this advice for several reasons that I won't describe tonight.

But when he made the second recommendation, I decided to take it. He said he had a first cousin who was quite knowledgeable about Europe, and when I began my trip in January to the Eastern European countries, he said his cousin spoke excellent Polish and would be—[laughter]—

Well, you can see the reason for the sound relationship that I have formed with Bob Strauss, a great Texan. [Laughter] And he represents our country well. He doesn't create much problem overseas. Prime Minister Fukuda did come by to see me the last time he was in Washington and said that Bob Strauss was causing him some problems, that he had gotten the majority of the members of the Japanese Diet to vote for the Japanese state patrolmen to leave their Hondas and ride Harley-Davidson motorcycles. [Laughter]

But I think all of you would agree that in the finest sense of the word, that Bob Strauss represents Texas and the United States and the Democratic Party in a superlative way.

I hate to go to the next Cabinet meeting, because I'm just getting him back for the last few that I've been to with him—he always gets the best end of the deal.

The first time I met Bob Strauss and had a chance to talk with him, he said that the Democratic Party was a crumbling coalition held together by two things—its debts and Texans. [Laughter]

The last part might still be true, but I can tell you that Bob Strauss and John White have done a great deal to remove the ties that bind us together because of overwhelming debts. We have now re-forged historic old alliances, and our party has been reinvigorated because we are a party with plans, with programs, and with unchanging ideals. Our country might be able to get along without Texas oil or Texas agricultural products, even for a while without Texas income taxes, but we could never get along without Texas brainpower and Texas political leadership.

Democrats from your State in this century have been remarkable for their superb leadership qualities—two great Speakers of the House, John Nance Garner and Sam Rayburn; two Vice Presidents, one of whom was John Nance Garner; and the hardest working President and one of the most successful Presidents that the United States has ever known, Lyndon Baines Johnson.

Since I began my work in the Oval Office I've made a point to study in my spare time the history, the biographies of those who have served our country in the same position. In some ways, this is a lonely job. And as I've analyzed the place in the evolution of our country that different predecessors of mine will fill, I've been increasingly impressed with what President Johnson did in a time of great upheaval, sorrow, division. The strength of his leadership held our country together. And he was able, from the most powerful position on Earth, to reach his hand and his heart effectively to those who were poor, who were black, who didn't speak English well, who were not well educated, who were inarticulate, who had little power or little prestige or little influence, and he aroused the conscience of a great nation.

He pointed out to us our failures and our defects and, through his concerted and effective work, did not only arouse the American people but aroused the Congress, had passed into law the civil rights acts, the voting act that has given Americans a final realization of what our Constitution long guaranteed, but for a long time did not see fulfilled. And as a President now, I feel a sincere debt of gratitude to this great Texan, this great American.

Emerson said that the two national parties have always been divided: one, the party of memory, and the other one, the party of hope. Our party, the oldest political party in the world, is still the party of hope, of youth, and of vitality. That's why I'm convinced that John Hill will be Texas' next Governor. And that's why I'm convinced that Bob Krueger will go to the United States Senate, and to replace almost 200 years of congressional seniority, why eight bright, energetic Texans running for the seats of retired Texas Representatives in the House will win this fall.

And Texans will not be the only winners. We have other winners here tonight. New Mexico's Bruce King will go back in as Governor. And one of the brightest young American politicians, Bill Clinton, will be the new Governor in Arkansas.

Our candidates will win, because the Democratic Party is the party of hope. But it's also the party of leadership and compassion. The Texas party and the national party work together. Texas Democrats don't waste time fighting other Democrats after the primaries. And I would particularly like to cite Joe Christie as a wonderful example of this attitude.

The Texas party and the Oklahoma, Arkansas, New Mexico, and the national parties share the same basic goals—fairer taxes, lower taxes, more money in American workers' pockets.

Last year, the Democratic Congress reduced income taxes $6 billion. This year, I hope to see the Congress reduce income taxes another $15 or $20 billion. We believe in work, fewer handouts for those able to work, more jobs for them, more able Americans off the dole, onto the payroll.

We're considering welfare reform to accomplish this purpose, and we believe that jobs primarily ought to come in the private sector of our economy, with the government filling in those areas for people that are the last to be hired and the first to be fired and who need to be introduced to what it means in this great country to hold a job, to have one's own capability realized in productive effort.

We believe in balanced budgets, we believe that public officials ought to be eagle-eyed and tight-fisted about government expenditures, that we ought to be prudent trustees of the taxpayers' money. We believe that government waste ought to be eliminated, that mismanagement should be corrected. We believe in putting merit back in the merit system and to give managers the ability to manage. We're going to do all these things if we work together.

And the Democrats believe in the free enterprise system. Sometimes our party doesn't get credit for the depth of this belief. We do believe in tough competition, which is part of the essence of our economic system. We believe that excessive government interference in business ought to be eliminated.

A year and a half ago, we inherited a horrible conglomeration of not only regulations but increasing regulations. In 1 day last year, we got rid of 1,100 OSHA regulations at one sweep. And we are now committed to writing regulations that are necessary, simply, in plain English, and we are giving the authors of those regulations the opportunity to sign them when they get through writing.

We believe in American cities, and we inherited a deteriorating condition, not only in the older cities in the North but the newer, more vigorous cities throughout the Sunbelt. We believe that we ought to form a new partnership between government at all levels, private enterprise, volunteers, neighborhood groups who work together to revitalize that center of growth and culture and exchange of ideas. We believe that we need to attract back to the central, deteriorating parts of our cities new growth, new investment, new courage, new confidence in the future.

We believe that American agriculture ought to be strong, and we recognize that it is the greatest single strategic advantage that this country has over all others. We are the breadbasket of the world, and we're going to stay that way.

These issues are part and parcel of our commitment to global peace, to prosperity, not only for ourselves but for others: where men and women might be free to make their own decisions; where democracy and democratic principles might be enhanced; free markets might be guaranteed for the exchange of goods that we ourselves as Americans exemplify; our rededication to the United States Constitution, its principles, and the Bill of Rights. And as long as I'm in the White House, our country will stand for the pursuit without ceasing to establish and to maintain basic human rights throughout the whole world.

Now, I know that Democrats don't always agree. We are sometimes a contentious bunch. We always fight among ourselves at times, and we probably always will. But it's kind of a family fight. Like families, we know how to kiss and make up, and we also know how to multiply. [Laughter]

I want to talk tonight, in wrapping up my speech, about two basic issues, issues that this Nation cannot afford to ignore: energy and inflation. Energy is our most urgent legislative priority, one in which our very security as a nation is at stake. And I'm going to go into it tonight in some depth, because I have some points I want to make to you. Inflation is our most serious domestic problem at this moment. Let me talk about inflation first.

The United States is not the only nation struggling with this problem. Nearly every country on Earth is battling the twin problems—and they are interrelated—of inflation and unemployment. And we are doing better than almost anyone else.

We are beating down unemployment in this country. We put more people back to work in the first 18 months of this administration than any other administration in United States history. There are now 5½ million more people holding jobs today than there were 18 months ago.

And we intend to beat inflation, too, and without sacrificing our steady growth and our economic expansion. We will do it without throwing people out of work. We'll do it without sowing the seeds of another severe recession. We're going to put an end to the cycle of boom and bust that has plagued the American economy—American business, American farmers, American consumers—for the last decade or two.

To achieve our first objective, which is to stop inflation from rising any further, I've set some very tight limits on Government expenditures. We will reduce Federal spending as a percentage of the gross national product for the first time in this generation.

We will continue to use personal and corporate tax cuts to promote that economic growth and investment so that we can have a stable and a more prosperous America.

It won't be easy. The administration and the Congress will have to resist very heavy pressure from strong interest groups—highway contractors, defense contractors, homebuilders, dambuilders, even from farmers, educators, veterans, local officials, State officials. I'm prepared to use the full powers of my office—every resource at my command, including the veto—to hold the line on the Federal budget.

Now, all these are good groups, and it's never pleasant or popular to say no to a useful program. The budget that was proposed to the Congress is a bountiful budget, it's an adequate budget, it's a Democratic budget. But each of the proposals for increased Federal spending, I realize, has great appeal. But there comes a time when a nation must draw the line. There comes a time when we must look beyond each narrow interest, no matter how beneficent it might be, to the overriding interests of our Nation. And that time has come.

I'm prepared to draw the line. I will be the one to say no. I ask you for your support, even when you have to be the one to make a sacrifice.

In every way that government can influence inflation, we will do it—through reorganization of the Government bureaucracy itself, through civil service reform, which I hope the Congress will pass without delay, through tax reform, and, wherever possible, for safe and appropriate deregulation. I'm personally trying to make regulation as efficient and economical and as minimal as possible.

Together, all these measures together and others will reduce that portion of inflation that government has caused and set an example to help us all stop the rise in the inflation rate.

But our long-term task is not just to stop the rise in the inflation rate but to push the inflation rate back down. We've set a very specific deceleration target to make sure that prices and wages rise less each year than the average for the 2 preceding years. Inflation, therefore, must be lower in 1979 than it is in 1978, and lower in 1980 than it will be in 1979.

We've set an example at the Federal level. We've frozen the salaries of our senior people and cut the cost-of-living increase for all other Federal employees to 5½ percent. We're waiting for the Congress to act on this. I believe they will. We've asked Governors, mayors, and others to follow our example.

In every sector of the economy there is a need to adopt this deceleration standard each year and, therefore, to make steady progress. These inflationary pressures have taken many years to develop. The causes are complicated, difficult to discern, and multitudinous. They will take many years to overcome. But we can overcome them through patient and persistent attack so long as we work together and exercise mutual restraint, sometimes mutual sacrifice in our common interest.

The other subject I want to talk about in closing is energy. And if there is any applause in the next 5 minutes, I want you to know that I will consider it the moral equivalent of hospitality. [Laughter]

If ever we have faced a test of our national will, it's now. America has lived high on low-cost energy. We've consumed ever increasing amounts of oil and gas at prices well below their replacement cost. Despite the lessons of 1973, we still have no national program to bring energy demand in line with energy supply. We are the only industrial nation on Earth that has not cut energy consumption since the OPEC oil embargo. We are the only industrial nation on Earth without an effective energy plan.

In the last 6 years, our oil imports have doubled. Americans used more gasoline last summer than ever before in history. And this year, we will set another all-time high for gasoline consumption, and all this despite the fact that we now have lighter cars and better gas mileage.

We created with superb congressional work a new Department of Energy, and we've failed to give it the tools that it needs to do the job. For the past 14 months, we've been talking energy policy, and while we've been talking, America has suffered economically. Talk is cheap; energy is not.

We imported $10 billion more oil last year than we did the year before. Despite the lessons of 1973, we are more dependent on the whims of foreign oil producers today than ever before in our history. The economic and military security of the United States is seriously jeopardized when we rely on foreign sources for almost half of our petroleum needs. The heart of our defense policy is the longstanding mutual commitments between the United States of America and our NATO Allies and Pacific allies. To protect our interests, we need steady and reliable supplies of all vital raw materials.

We have no feasible alternatives to the petroleum reserves of the 13 OPEC nations, nor to the inescapable linkage and interrelationship between international politics and the oil trade. We lose credibility with our allies when our national energy policies do not reflect this reality.

Our influence, our prestige in the global economic community are tarnished, and United States leadership is seriously weakened without a policy to reduce waste and to bring energy costs in line with the cost of replacement.

Each time I talk to my colleagues—Prime Minister Fukuda from Japan, or Chancellor Schmidt from the Federal Republic of Germany, Prime Minister Callaghan from Great Britain, or others, they make this point to me. In their view, a conservation and conversion program, aided by aligning domestic and global prices of crude oil over an orderly period of time, is the most important single step that the United States can take. It is absolutely vital to them.

The energy bill before Congress provides this alignment fairly and effectively, and on a schedule that minimizes economic disruption.

Next month I will travel to Bonn, Germany, for the economic summit meeting. The subject of the meeting is global economic recovery. Each day it is clearer and clearer to me that United States action on an energy policy is absolutely crucial to that goal of global economic recovery. There's an inescapable connection between our energy policy, the domestic economy, and the world economy.

Our $45 billion oil import bill last year was a major factor in the huge United States current account deficit. And the different growth rates among nations increases this deficit. Other nations are unwilling to stimulate their own economy until they are convinced that we will check the waste of oil in our extremely high and rapidly increasing level of oil imports.

Concern about our deficit, which is growing every year, almost every month, drives down the value of the dollar, which is the basis, as you know, of the world economic or monetary system. The weakness of the dollar adds more inflationary pressure at home and arouses protectionist sentiment abroad, which in turn fuels new inflation and further weakens economic recovery.

In 1976, the current account deficit for our country was $1½ billion. One year later, in 1977, it was $20½ billion. More than half of that $19 billion increase reflects the increase in our oil imports.

Our determination to enact a strong, comprehensive national energy policy reflects our willingness to end this self-indulgence, this waste, once and for all. It's time for us to become responsible caretakers of the bounteous world that God gave us.

Today we have an uncommon opportunity to tackle some fundamental problems which we've had to push aside while tending to more urgent crises like civil rights a few years ago, or Watergate, or the war in Vietnam.

Energy is one of these persistent problems that we now have to deal with. Like inflation, it's not a problem that we created, it's one that we inherited.

As America entered this decade, our per capita energy consumption was already nearly double that of the United Kingdom and West Germany, triple that of France and Japan, more than quadruple that of the rest of the developed world. Each year our appetite for imported oil has grown. We would need a new North Slope or a new North Sea every year or 15 months just to keep up with the present rate of growth in energy consumption. Although we differ on the exact date, there is no doubt that at some point in this century, central global petroleum demand is going to exceed global petroleum supply.

Our strategy for change, controversial, is now being considered by the Congress, is focused and fair. It's based on three elementary and essential principles: first is conservation—stop wasting. The second one is to encourage exploration and production and give incentives to do so. And third is to develop alternatives to fossil fuels.

I want to emphasize just one aspect of conservation that is sometimes overlooked. We waste in this country almost half of the energy we use. Fuel economy must be a primary consideration in the design of our industrial plants, our homes, our vehicles, our splendid array of large and small appliances.

The second element of the energy program provides incentives for new production and exploration. The energy legislation will make sure that American oil commands as high a price as any in the world. New natural gas supplies will get generous price increases immediately and full deregulation in 1985.

Now, these rewards, which don't suit everyone—I realize that—are balanced by essential safeguards to protect consumers here in Texas and elsewhere in the country.

Our third and final strategy is speeding the conversion to more abundant existing fuels. This State, Texas, set an example for the Nation with your pioneering 1975 statewide conversion program to coal. Texas will continue to be a major energy State long after you have exhausted the major portion of your petroleum reserves. You have geothermal steam, geopressurized methane sources to tap. You have substantial lignite reserves you're now beginning to use in large quantities. You're the Nation's third largest producers of uranium, and you're working hard to advance the day when such renewable resources as the Sun, wind, and biomass will relieve some of the demand for oil and gas and coal.

These alternative fuels are critical to the continuing economic growth of your State and the Nation, and they are equally vital to our continuing strong national defense.

It's essential that we pass this energy legislation. It's been thoroughly debated. All viewpoints have been considered. Compromises have been made for 14 months. Each day that we continue without a national energy policy further erodes our domestic economy and also our international image.

In fact, and unfortunately, we do have an energy policy now. It's a policy by default, a mass of confusing and conflicting legislative and regulatory restrictions. It does precisely the opposite of what we want. It encourages consumption and discourages exploration and production. It rewards those who use the most of our least abundant fuels.

It's time to end this folly that we've inherited. If we are to attain the peaceful and prosperous world we seek, we have to meet—and beat—this serious challenge now.

The energy bill buys us critical time that we need to plan for the future. The bill is before the Congress now, as you know. Now is the time for us to act.

Here in Texas and neighboring States—and particularly, I would say, here in Houston—is the center of the United States petroleum industry. I come, as President of the greatest nation in the world, to ask you for help to do what is best for our Nation, what's best for Texas, and what I'm convinced is best for you.

Now, I know that no acts of Congress, no program of our Government, no Executive order of mine as President can by itself achieve these major goals of controlling inflation and the interrelated problem of meeting our future energy needs. It will require a change from our preoccupation with self and a willingness to sacrifice for the common good.

We Democrats have never been timid nor fearful in the face of any challenge to our Nation. We will not betray the trust of leadership which you and I share together. Together we can create an even greater United States of America.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 10:07 p.m. in the Imperial Ballroom at the Hyatt Regency Hotel. In his opening remarks, he referred to Gov. Dolph Briscoe, Jr., of Texas, Gov. Edwin W. Edwards of Louisiana, Mayor James McConn of Houston, Texas Attorney General John L. Hill, and Lt. Gov. William P. Hobby of Texas.

Beaumont, Texas

Remarks at Dedication Ceremonies for the Jack Brooks Federal Building. June 24, 1978

Mayor Myers, Senator Lloyd Bentsen, my good friend Congressman Jack Brooks, Congressmen Corman and Charlie Wilson, Mrs. Brooks, Jay Solomon, and distinguished guests and friends:

The first thing I want to do is to thank all of you and others who live in this district for giving me an enormous victory here when I ran for President. I thank you. You're my friends. I'll never forget it.

Twenty-five years ago, when I was leaving the Navy to come home to Plains, Georgia, to be a farmer, a young freshman Congressman was leaving Beaumont to go to Washington. In that quarter of a century, the Ninth District has garnered more Federal projects than ever before: the Intracoastal Canal, the Nation's first strategic storage facility for oil, a whole host of Federal works projects too numerous to name this morning, research grants for your district colleges and universities, and a wide variety of miscellaneous Federal contracts and awards.

I don't recall a single major Federal program in Plains in the last 25 years. [Laughter] One reason I came here was to get Jack Brooks to help me in the future. If he brings down to Beaumont more than you can handle, I want Plains to be the first spillover point for things that you reject.

I think it's accurate to say that the simultaneous presence of Jack Brooks in Washington and so many Federal projects coming into the Ninth District was not just a coincidence. But I have to point out as well that it takes more than a respected and an influential Member of Congress to bring these kinds of projects to a district. There must be a fertile ground present among the people who live here, a belief in our Nation, an element of patriotism, a willingness to work with your own government and dedicated employees who, when given an opportunity to do a job, do a good job. And you have demonstrated this in many ways, and that's really the reason that you've been able to work with such a good partnership with Jack Brooks, your Congressman.

As this building suggests, your relationship with the Federal Government is clear and it's constant. Since this building was first erected, I believe 44 years ago, the expansion of Federal services in this area has required an expansion and a modernization of the building itself. In addition to Congressman Brooks' office, it now houses representatives from 10 different major Federal agencies.

I hope that bringing them together under one roof will symbolize the coordinated approach and the better management that we are taking to delivery of Federal services. And I know that the name that we are placing over the door today will represent the commitment to lean, competent, efficient government that Jack Brooks has fought for throughout his career.

The General Accounting Office, not given to compliments—much more inclined toward criticism—has said that this one man has been responsible for saving for the Federal Government billions of dollars—not millions, but billions of dollars—and I want to thank Jack Brooks, as President.

I'm sure that you are thankful to have Jack in Washington, but you're no more thankful than I am to have him there.

When I was first elected President, with your help, one of the things I promised was to reorganize the bureaucracy, to bring some order out of chaos, to institute reforms that would make the delivery of services to you, with your tax money, more efficient.

I was told by many people that there was one man in the Congress with whom I would have to work closely, because he would be the key to improving those Federal Government organizations. It was Jack Brooks. And I asked Jack Brooks to come down to Plains to talk to me about it. He came down—he was the only Congressman who came in that group—to tell me what he thought ought to be done. I told him what I thought ought to be done. We were mostly in agreement, but I have to confess to you that there were some differences. I knew that I was going to be the new President of the United States, and I was sure that in a showdown with just one Congressman, that the President could win the argument.

I hear many of you laughing, because you know already that I'm going to tell you that I was mistaken. [Laughter] But I have to say that the changes that Jack Brooks recommended in the reorganization bill that did pass under his leadership were good. I'll just give you one example, if you're interested. When I submit a reorganization plan to the Congress, it automatically goes into effect after a certain period of time, unless the Congress rejects it. Jack Brooks said that in the past about two-thirds of reorganization plans submitted were rejected because they couldn't be changed. And if there was a tiny error in the proposal after the Congress investigated it, there was no way to correct that error, and the whole thing had to be thrown out.

So, he suggested that after it goes to his committee, that if there are modifications, and if I agreed, that they can be made in the committee, and then the Congress can vote to accept or reject.

I'll knock on wood, but so far all the plans that we have submitted have been accepted by the Congress, because of the wisdom of Jack Brooks, to begin with, and because of his leadership qualities after he gets my plan to improve the Government.

As chairman of the House Government Operations Committee, he's at the center of one of the most important undertakings in our country today. It's his support and his understanding that will enable us to streamline these Federal programs, to cut down on redtape, to restore the emphasis on merit to the civil service.

Last year I set a task force at work, a hundred different people, top qualified people in the civil service itself, to work out ways whereby the civil service could be more effective. They came up with the most sweeping reforms to civil service since it was initiated more than 100 years ago. And in March, I began to send these proposals to the Congress.

It'll make it easier to weed out incompetents or those who don't want to work once they get a job. These proposals will let managers manage. They make it easier to reward excellence and dedicated service, and they would provide a more rapid hearing to workers who do have grievances. All in all, they go a long way to restoring competent, efficient, and responsive government to our country.

A month ago I sent the second and the final part of the civil service reform package, the reorganization plan itself. It went to a very important committee. You can guess whose committee it is. This plan safeguards the rights of Federal employees. It protects employees who blow the whistle and point out defects in our Government. It sets up an office of personnel management to bring to our Government the same kind of modern, up-to-date personnel practices that are followed by our best private corporations. And it provides a fairer and a more efficient way to resolve differences of opinion between employers and those who are employed.

I count very heavily on Jack Brooks to help me in these efforts, and I want to carry out my campaign promise that we will have a government as good and as competent and as understanding and compassionate as other people who elect Jack Brooks, me, Senator Bentsen, and others to serve you.

We are lightening the burden of Federal regulations on business, on State and local governments, and on ordinary citizens. We've got too much government regulation. It has got to be cut down.

We're beginning to eliminate the worst nitpicking regulations in agencies like the occupational safety and health agency, OSHA. And I can tell you that Ray Marshall and the new administrators of OSHA agree completely. In 1 day last year, 1,100 different regulations were wiped off the books. And the ones that we do have are being written in clear English so a peanut farmer can understand them. And we are now making sure that the person that writes the regulations has to sign them, so we'll know who to go to if they are mistaken or confused or nobody can understand them.

We've opened up—I'll just use one example—the airline industry to deregulation. When we first started doing that, we knew that it would help consumers to have cheaper air fares. But we have now found that not only do we help with greatly reduced air fares, but the airline industry is benefiting as well. We are helping cities and States cut down on paperwork. But the major problem I want to talk to you very briefly about, in closing, in our Nation today is inflation.

All the things that I've described to you to make government better will help to cut down on inflation. We know what caused it originally—the huge cost of the Vietnam war, the large increases in worldwide oil prices, and our huge and growing oil imports. All these things contribute to inflation. And deficit spending by the Federal Government contributes to it also.

The first thing I mentioned is out of our control. We can't undo the Vietnam war. We can't change worldwide oil prices. But the third one, the huge oil imports, will bring to us a much better control of inflation when we have a national energy policy.

And the last one, Government spending, is something that we must attack right now on many different points. We are simply spending too much money in the Federal Government, more than we take in in taxes. We have got to cut down the Federal budget, and I'm determined to do so.

Now, the budget that we prepared last winter predicted a large deficit. By proposing a lower tax reduction, we now hope to cut that down by $7 billion, but the deficit is still too high. And even reduction in the deficit that I've outlined is threatened by recent spending moves in the Congress. These proposed increases come in very attractive areas. It's not easy to refuse additional funds for such things as veterans, or those who build roads, water projects, farmers, defense, education, for example. But somebody has to hold the line on spending and I'm willing to do so, even if it means that I have to take the political consequences.

Still, my own efforts will only be a small part of the job. Congress must help, private industry must help, labor must help, and all of you in your daily lives must help. Short-sighted selfishness can lead to a spiral of inflation that nobody will be able to stop. Only self-discipline, some sacrifice in the public interest can slow that spiral.

I call on each of you today, and I call on each Member of Congress to help create a climate of mutual sacrifice that alone can curb inflation.

I know I can count on Jack Brooks, I know I can count on Senator Bentsen, I know I can count on Texas, I know I can count on the American people to control inflation and to make our great Government an even better one.

Thank you very much. God bless all of you.

Where did Ray Starnes go? I want to introduce you all to somebody.

When I was a new graduate of the Naval Academy at Annapolis in 1946, I went to the U.S.S. Wyoming as electronics officer. I had a fine young man who worked with me and under me named Starnes. And he was a superb public servant as a young eager petty officer in the Navy. He made petty officer after 6 months, and I helped him a little bit.

I left the Wyoming and went to another ship. And I haven't seen Ray Starnes now in 30 years. He's a member of the community here in Beaumont. And for the first time in 30 years I want to shake hands with a young man who meant a lot to me, who's a very close friend of mine. It's an honor for me to meet him.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 11:36 a.m. at the Jack Brooks Federal Building—U.S. Post Office and Courthouse. In his opening remarks, he referred to Mayor Maurice Myers of Beaumont and General Services Administrator Joel W. Solomon.

Fort Hood, Texas

Informal Exchange With Reporters.
June 24, 1978

REPORTER. Mr. President, what's the message here today?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, one of the responsibilities that I have, perhaps, potentially the most important, is to be the Commander in Chief of all the Armed Forces. And it's important for me to know what our military forces can do, to see the efficiency that they can demonstrate when I am present, the planning that they go into to show their capabilities to defend our country when I am coming.

I think it's also important for them to know that I appreciate their ability and for our friends and allies and our potential adversaries to know that I have this intense interest in maintaining the level of training and the capability of which our Armed Forces are obviously capable.

I might say that I thought the exercise this morning was both impressive in its execution and also in its planning. And I'm very proud of what this group has been able to do. This is General Patton's old division, and they showed that they've upheld the standards that he set for them in the last great war.

Q. You know, a lot of people have seen this in Vietnam, and over there it didn't work. Is there a danger that a field exercise might be a little distorted, because it isn't real battlefield conditions?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, you have to plan for all different kinds of terrain. When I was in Panama last weekend, that intense jungle just north of the Panama Canal is where we trained for jungle warfare. And I think that this would be very close to the kind of terrain that you would find in some open areas. And I think the coordination of the operation among the helicopters, the tanks, the personnel carriers, the guided missiles, and other weapons is a very important test, no matter what the terrain might be.

These men who are in this division also go to other places in our country which would be similar to the different kinds of terrain that they might face throughout the world. But I think the most important thing is for them to know that the President is interested in them and appreciates the high level of training that they've shown and also that I, most of the time confined to my duties in Washington, am able to learn what these men can do, what our equipment can do, as I have already done with the nuclear aircraft carriers, the submarines, the strategic command airplane, and the SAC Base out in Omaha.

I'm very interested in it, and I want the Nation and the world to know about my interest. So, it's a very good exercise for me, I think a good exercise for these men and women, and also a good exercise for our country.

Q. Mr. President, what about the cost? Do you think it's justified?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I think it's completely justified. These men have maneuvers to perform. They have to stay at a high level of training. Each one of them has to be familiar with the actual firing of live ammunition and operating under those kinds of circumstances, and the fact that I could be here during the time when they have a major maneuver or exercise is a very good conjunction. It's certainly worth the expenditure of funds just for my own education, because I'm faced every day with the requirement to either approve or disapprove the expenditure of funds for these kinds of weapons or others that might replace them.

I need to know the level of operation capability of them. And it gives me a chance also to learn the special attitude of the Secretary of Defense and Secretary of the Army and, also, the generals and others who command these forces. So, I would say it's a very important requirement of my job, a very important requirement of the jobs of the military, and whatever expenditure of funds was involved is well worth it.

NOTE: The exchange began at 3:05 p.m. at Blackwell Mountain, site of the Army's firepower demonstration.

International Communication Agency

Nomination of R. Peter Straus To Be An Associate Director. June 26, 1978

The President today announced the nomination of R. Peter Straus, of Riverdale, N.Y., to be Associate Director for Broadcasting of the International Communication Agency.

Straus, 55, has been Director of the Voice of America since last summer. Before becoming Director of VOA he was president of Straus Communications, Inc. He is a former Assistant Administrator for Africa of the Agency for International Development.

National Commission on Air Quality

Appointment of Edwin D. Dodd and Tom McPherson as Members. June 26, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of two persons as members of the National Commission on Air Quality. They are:

Edwin D. Dodd, of Toledo, Ohio, president and chief executive officer of Owens-Illinois, Inc. Dodd has served on the board of governors of the National Council of Paper Industry for Air and Stream Improvement, and has been a member of the President's National Industrial Pollution Control Council.

Tom McPherson, of Fort Lauderdale, Fla., a Florida State representative and chairman of the house committee on community affairs.

William M. Ketchum

Statement on the Death of the Representative From California. June 26, 1978

With the death of Congressman William Ketchum of California, the Nation has lost a fine public servant who ably served his district in Congress.

Since he was first elected to the Congress in 1972, Representative Ketchum led the important fight for responsible public spending and a balanced Federal budget. His efforts on behalf of the elderly earned the respect not only of the voters of his district but of senior citizens across the Nation.

I extend my own deepest sympathies to his family.

THE PRESIDENT'S NEWS CONFERENCE OF JUNE 26, 1978

TAX REDUCTION

THE PRESIDENT. At the beginning of this year, I proposed to Congress substantial tax relief for almost every taxpayer in our country. I also asked that some important and long-overdue reforms be made in our unfair and very complicated tax laws.

Last week it became clear that the Congress is seriously considering a tax bill that contains no major reforms at all. That's bad enough, but this new congressional proposal is even worse. It actually attempts to take a step backward through some version of the so-called Steiger capital gains amendment. This proposal would add more than $2 billion to the Federal budget deficit. Eighty percent of its tax benefits would go to one-half of 1 percent of the American taxpayers, who make more than $100,000 a year. Three thousand millionaires would get tax reductions averaging $214,000. The other 99½ percent of our taxpayers would not do quite so well.

For instance, a middle-income family making between $20,000 and $30,000 a year would get a tax reduction from this proposal of less than $1. And the working man or woman who makes $20,000 or less a year would get no more than 25 cents.

The American people want some tax relief from the heavy burden of taxation on their shoulders, but neither they nor I will tolerate a plan that provides huge tax windfalls for millionaires and two bits for the average American. That underestimates the intelligence of the American people.

My proposals to reduce the taxes paid by large and small businesses so that they can invest in new investments, new businesses, new equipment, new jobs, is a much more fair and effective approach than providing huge tax giveaways to millionaires. Both businesses and also American working families deserve a real tax cut this year, and our tax code barely needs to be made simpler, fairer, and more effective.

I'm working hard for tax reduction and tax reform, but only Congress can pass laws. I'm still confident that in response to the obvious desires of the American people, the Congress will act responsibly on the tax package I have submitted. The American people expect and deserve no less.

Thank you very much.

Mr. Cormier [Frank Cormier, Associated Press].

QUESTIONS

THE MIDDLE EAST

Q. Mr. President, could you give us your current assessment of Middle East peace prospects at this time, when Israel and Egypt are again apparently at an impasse?

THE PRESIDENT. My experience in dealing with the Mideast peace proposals leads me not to be surprised when we have temporary setbacks or rejections from one side or the other.

I thought the Israeli Cabinet response to our two basic questions was very disappointing. And I notice that this weekend the Israeli Cabinet rejected an Egyptian proposal that has not even yet been made. It's not in final form, I understand. It certainly has not been presented to us to present to the Israelis. It's already been rejected.

Our commitment to pursuing a comprehensive and effective peace agreement in the Middle East is constant and very dedicated. We will not back off on this. After we receive the Egyptian proposal when it's put in final form, we will be sure to relay it to the Israelis, as the Egyptians will request, and then both proposals, the Israeli proposal, the Egyptian proposal, will be on the table.

At that time it might be appropriate, if the Israelis and Egyptians agree, for a meeting between their Foreign Ministers, perhaps, and our own Secretary of State. I would hope that at that point we could make real progress toward searching out the common ground on which they might stand and alleviating the differences that still remain. But I can't predict the rate of progress. It obviously will require good faith and some flexibility on both sides.

U.S.-SOVIET RELATIONS

Q. Mr. President, in the current war of words you've said you are not going to let the Russians push us around, and Mr. Brezhnev says that you're pursuing a dangerous policy by playing the Chinese card.

My question is, are they pushing us around and are you playing the Chinese card?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we're too strong and powerful and deeply committed a nation to be pushed around. Our economic, military, political strength, the basic principles on which our Nation is founded, are too strongly held and preserved by the American people to permit us to be weak enough to be pushed around.

As I said in Annapolis, and as we've had as a constant policy, we want to be friends with the Soviet Union. We want to have rapid progress made on the SALT negotiations, the comprehensive test ban, increased trade, better communication. Some of the things the Soviets do cause us deep concern. The human rights questions within the Soviet Union in violation of the Helsinki agreement, their intrusion, along with the Cubans, into Africa, these things do cause us some concern and create in the American people some doubt about the Soviets' good and peaceful intentions. But I have a deep belief that the underlying relationship between ourselves and the Soviets is stable and that Mr. Brezhnev, along with myself, wants peace and wants to have better friendship.

We are not trying, nor will we ever try, to play the Soviets against the People's Republic of China, nor vice versa. We have some very important relationships with the Chinese that need to be pursued. There are worldwide common hopes that we share with the Chinese. We have bilateral relations that we want to expand—trade, exchange of science and technology, and so forth—and at the same time, we want to have peace with the Chinese, almost a billion people. These are the goals that we have maintained during my own administration, the same identical goals as were evoked clearly by President Nixon and President Ford.

So, we won't let any temporary disharmonies or disputes about transient circumstances delay our pursuit of peace with the Soviet Union, nor our ability nor commitment toward better relationships with the People's Republic of China.

Q. Mr. President, to follow that up, you are consciously not linking the progress in the strategic arms negotiations to Soviet behavior either in Africa or the dissident problem. There is a suggestion made by a member of the National Security Council staff that there should be linkage, however, between trade with the Soviet Union and the transfer of technology to the Soviet Union and their actions throughout the rest of the world.

Do you favor using trade and economic incentives as a means of moderating Soviet behavior?

THE PRESIDENT. I've not heard that proposal that you describe. As you know, the Soviets have arrested an American businessman.<sup>1</sup> We've had a very hard time trying to determine if there is any grounds for his arrest, and the Soviet press, which is a spokesman for the Soviet Government, has already condemned him without a trial or even without thorough investigation. This kind of an episode naturally causes concern among the American business community, who does look upon the Soviet Union, as do I, as a good place for the sale of American manufactured products, American farm and agricultural products, and other things. But we've never tried to threaten the Soviet Union, we've never held out the prospect of increased or decreased trade if they did or did not do a certain thing that we thought was best.

We try to pursue peace as the overwhelming sense of our goals with the Soviet Union, and I think that's shared in good faith by President Brezhnev.

So, I think the word "linkage" is sometimes inappropriately used. It's obvious that there is a good factor in progress with the Soviet Union if the American people, the Congress, the business community feel that they are acting in good faith toward us, that they have friendly attitudes toward us, they treat our citizens over there, trying to enhance trade, with respect and with fairness. And all of these things are tightly interrelated. But I think the word "linkage" is one that's inappropriately used.

TAX REDUCTION LEGISLATION

Q. Mr. President, in your opening remarks on the tax legislation and the Steiger amendment, the implication is strongly there, but you stop short of actually saying you would veto legislation with the Steiger amendment. Will you veto such legislation if it comes to your desk?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I said neither the American people nor I will tolerate a plan that does what the Steiger amendment does. I think that's clear enough. I don't see any way that I could accept a major tax proposal of this kind that did cost the Federal Treasury $2 billion, and increase the budget deficit that much, and channel almost all of the money to the very rich people. So, I don't see any possibility of my approving such a plan.

CIVIL RIGHTS PROSECUTIONS

Q. Mr. President, your Justice Department has set up a dual prosecution policy in cases of police brutality where the victims' civil rights may have been violated.

But there seems to be some confusion over when the dual prosecution policy should be used. I wonder if you could clarify.

THE PRESIDENT. I doubt it, but I'll try. When I came in office and when Griffin Bell became the Attorney General, there was a concern that we shared about the mistreatment of minority citizens in this country—blacks, those who speak Spanish, and others. I believe that at the present time, we are investigating about 192 cases of that sort. Each case has to be assessed on its own merits.

There is a duality in culpability among those who commit some crime. I'm speaking in generalities now. One is the actual criminal case where you punish someone for abusing another person. Sometimes the abuse extends to the death of the victim. Another element of criminality is the violation of the American civil rights act, where a person's rights are deprived, even the loss of life.

If in the judgment of the Attorney General—and he makes the judgment, I don't—the original case is not adequately pursued, nor the punishment, if meted out, adequate for the crime, if there's a gross abuse of that, then the Attorney General reserves the right to enter the case and try the perpetrator of the crime on the basis of a civil rights violation.

This has been historically the case, but we've revived that issue. And without referring to a specific case, this is our policy. As I said, to repeat myself, each case has to be decided on its own merits, though, and the Attorney General makes that ultimate decision.

Q. If I could follow up on that for a minute, in the Rodriguez case in Dallas it's been reported that Drew Days at the Justice Department decided not to prosecute that case, and that you talked to some Mexican Americans while you were down in Texas and promised that Attorney General Bell would go ahead and look into it himself personally.

Why was that decision made? Why was it decided that Bell would go ahead and prosecute when Days had decided not to?

THE PRESIDENT. There was an erroneous press report, which sometimes occurs in our Nation, which indicated that Drew Days had made a decision and that he had recommended to Mr. Civiletti, who pursues criminal cases, that this case not be pursued further.

We inquired of Mr. Days about the accuracy of that report. He has not yet made a decision about whether he would recommend any further Justice Department involvement. And I asked the Attorney General, which is appropriate, to look into the case himself. This is a case of high interest to the Spanish-speaking community in the Southwest, and again, his decision would be made on the basis of the merits of the case. But Mr. Days has not made any decision on his own. He has not made any recommendation to Mr. Civiletti, which was erroneously reported by the press.

DAVID G. GARTNER

Q. Mr. President, it's been reported that you've asked David Gartner to resign from the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, and it's been rumored that he has told you that he wouldn't. Are these things true? And if so, what are you going to do about them?

THE PRESIDENT. I might say I don't know Mr. Gartner. He's one of the roughly 700 people that we recommended to the Congress be appointed to positions of importance. In assessing the factors in his case during the last week or so, both I and my staff members, after consultation with the Vice President, who does know Mr. Gartner well, we have decided Mr. Gartner ought to resign.

He has not committed a crime, he has not violated the law, but the image of impropriety, resulting from the acceptance by his children of a substantial gift, leads me to think that it would be better if he did resign. I understand that Friday, Mr. Gartner called my staff members and said that he did not intend to resign.

So, the description that you made is substantially correct. I do not have authority to remove Mr. Gartner from office once he has been confirmed by the Senate. But I think he should resign. The decision now is up to him.

Q. Mr. President, so there's no further step that you feel you can take at this point?

THE PRESIDENT. No, except to encourage him to reconsider and resign.

Q. Well, sir, it was my impression at your last news conference here that you had already assessed the case, because you seemed at that time to indicate that you saw nothing wrong with the circumstances surrounding all of this. What has caused you to change your mind?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I have looked into it much more thoroughly than I had before I came to the last press conference. The report I made last time was basically accurate, that he had reported voluntarily the acceptance of the gift to his children, that the Senate Agriculture Committee had been thoroughly conversant with this fact, and that the Senate committee and the Senate itself had confirmed him, that he had not committed any crime. I believe, though, in light of the fact that there is an allegation of impropriety on his part, with which I agree, that he should resign.

EUROPEAN TROOP REDUCTIONS

Q. Mr. President, along with the recent tougher rhetoric from Moscow, there's also reportedly been an important concession by the Soviets that the talks over reducing the number of NATO and Warsaw Pact troops faced off in Europe, I wonder, in light of that, what are the prospects now for an agreement of those talks?

THE PRESIDENT. The prospects now are much better than they were a month ago. We, along with our NATO Allies, have been pursuing what we call the mutual and balanced force reductions in the European theater for a number of years in the talks at Vienna. And the Soviets, this past 2 weeks—I think within the last 2 weeks—replied in a very affirmative way. Over the weekend President Brezhnev made a speech, I think at Minsk, where he said that this was a major reply on the part of the Soviet Union. He thought that we should assess it very carefully. So, I don't know what the future results should be.

There is a difference in estimate of the number of Soviet forces in the Warsaw Pact region, Eastern Europe, compared to what we think they have there. We think the Soviets have a superior force in the number of men, the number of tanks, to us. The Soviets' estimates are considerably lower.

We are negotiating now with the Soviets to see where the disparity lies. And what we want is to have a balanced reduction, so that at the end of this reduction the two forces will be roughly equivalent to each other and that they will be at a lower level than before. So, I would say it's a step in the right direction, and we will pursue it.

CRITICISM OF FOREIGN POLICY

Q. Mr. President, last week in Texas, in the course of defending Mr. Brzezinski, you criticized the Soviet Union and Cuba for attacking him, and you also criticized special interest groups, which presumably are domestic organizations. Many people think that you had reference to the Jewish community, which has been critical of Mr. Brzezinski.

Could you explain, sir—there are two parts to this question—who or what special interest groups do you mean, and what limits, if any, do you think there ought to be on the criticism of officials like Mr. Brzezinski involved in the making of foreign policy?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, it's open season on me or officials in the Government, as you well know, and I think that's part of the American system, which I don't deplore. I didn't have any particular special interest group in mind. I said "special interest groups" and then following that specifically referred to the Cubans, the Soviets, and their apologists. And that is an adequate example, I think, of special interest groups to whom I refer.

The point is that I make the ultimate decisions in foreign policy. There is a minimum of disagreement between the National Security Council and the State Department. I do get advice from various sources, both in and out of Government. And obviously, in a complicated issue, I get recommendations that sometimes are at variance with one another. But when I make the final decision, then I want to be and am the one responsible. I make the judgment and neither the Secretary of State nor Dr. Brzezinski makes those judgments.

I think it's easy for someone who disagrees with a decision that I make to single out Dr. Brzezinski as a target, insinuating that I'm either ineffective or incompetent or ignorant, that I don't actually make the decisions, but that my subordinates make them for me. And it gives an easy target for them without attacking the President of the United States.

But I've noticed that President Brezhnev, Mr. Castro, and others always single out Dr. Brzezinski as their target. It's not fair to him. I think it overly exaggerates any possible disagreement that the State Department and the National Security Council have, even in the formative stages of a decision. And it takes away from the fact that in this country I'm the President, I make the decisions, and I want to be responsible for those decisions once they are made.

U.S.-SOVIET RELATIONS

Q. Mr. President, what precisely is our position with relation to the Soviets? It isn't always easy for us to discern the precise position. Is it hard-nosed or is it conciliatory or is it somewhere in between? I wonder whether you could refine your answer on this a bit.

THE PRESIDENT. I don't know any clearer way to express it than I did in the speech I made in Annapolis a few weeks ago, which I very carefully wrote myself, and a speech that I went over with my advisers, almost every word in it.

We want to be friends with the Soviets. We want to improve our relationship with the Soviets. We want to make progress, and I might say we are making progress on a SALT agreement, on a comprehensive test ban agreement, the prohibition against attacks on one another's satellites, the reduction in the level of forces in Eastern and Western Europe, which I've already discussed, and so forth. These discussions, these negotiations, are going along very well. We're making good progress. And as I said in my speech in Annapolis, I believe that Mr. Brezhnev wants the same thing I do. He wants peace between our country and theirs.

We do, however, stay in a state of competition. This is inevitable. I think it's going to be that way 15, 20 years in the future. We want to have accommodation when we can mutually benefit from that accommodation. We are willing to meet the Soviets in competition of a peaceful nature.

When the Soviets commit some act with which we disagree, I have to make a judgment whether to be quiet about it or to speak out openly and acquaint the American people with the facts so that Americans can understand the interrelationship between us and the Soviet Union.

As I said, I think in an interview with a Dallas newspaper a couple of weeks ago, though, our relationship with the Soviet Union overall is stable. It's not in danger. There is no present threat to peace.

The negotiations are proceeding in good faith. There's no cause for alarm. And I think this is pretty much a normal circumstance. I would hope that when we conclude the SALT and the comprehensive test ban negotiations, hopefully without too much delay, that Mr. Brezhnev and I might meet personally and to ratify the agreement that's basically been hammered out.

We are much closer to an agreement than we were a few weeks ago. We've made good progress.

Q. No chance of a meeting before then?

THE PRESIDENT. I have extended an almost standing invitation to Mr. Brezhnev to come over and meet with me. My belief, however, is that he will not meet until the prospect for an agreement is quite imminent. But I welcome this. And I feel quite at ease about our relationship with the Soviet Union, although there are public debates, public disputes, sometimes public disagreements.

ANGOLA

Q. Secretary of State Vance has said that we want to cooperate with the Neto government in Angola, and we just sent a diplomat over to Angola to do just that, talk to them. But a few weeks earlier, the CIA Director had been up on Capitol Hill trying to get approval from the Senate for a plan to back-door weapons to the rebels in Angola. What is the consistency in these two positions, and would you have approved that plan?

THE PRESIDENT. There was never any plan put forward to send back-door weapons to the rebels, because that would have been in violation of the American law. And I don't believe any responsible person in my administration would have violated the so-called Clark amendment, which prevents us from either direct or indirect involvement in the internal affairs in Angola.

Our relationship with the Angolan officials has been a fairly consistent one. Ever since I've been in office, we have had negotiations or consultations directly with Angolan officials. This is important, first of all, because we want to have peace in southern Africa. And Mr. Neto, who is the leader of the Angolan Government, has some influence on other African leaders, particularly the leaders of SWAPO, where we want an agreement in Namibia. Also, we have wanted to hold the Angolan leaders responsible for any future possible invasions into the Shaba Province in Zaire.

I also would like to see the Cubans begin to remove their troops from Angola. And a few weeks ago in New York, their Foreign Minister, the Angolan Foreign Minister, met with our Secretary of State and suggested additional consultations, which is a continuation of what we've done all the time.

We have no desire at this point, no plans to normalize our relationship with Angola. But we have never contemplated getting militarily involved in Angola, directly nor indirectly, and this present visit by Mr. McHenry<sup>2</sup> to Angola is part of a series of consultations with them.

Q. Mr. President, if I may follow that up. I'm not quite sure what you are saying when you say there was no plan presented to the Senate. The CIA Director, Mr. Turner, did present a document, a written plan, to Senator Clark to try to see if Senator Clark thought that this would be acceptable, and would not violate the Clark amendment. The plan called for sending arms through a third country to the rebel forces in Angola.

Did you know about that meeting? Did you know about that document? And since others around the administration did, would you have approved it?

THE PRESIDENT. I didn't have any idea that the CIA Director had even talked to Senator Clark about it. My impression of it from the news reports and from subsequent information was that he went to consult with Senator Clark to see within the bounds of the law what involvement would be possible in Angola. But I had no knowledge of that, nor have I ever intended to send weapons to Angola, either directly nor indirectly.

TAX REDUCTION LEGISLATION

Q. Mr. President, to get back to the opening statement on capital gains tax policy, as you know, Mr. President, the House Ways and Means Committee is considering the so-called compromise proposal advanced by Congressman Jones of Oklahoma, which would set capital gains, I believe, at a 35-percent maximum rate and also eliminate the so-called alternative tax.

My question is, is the Jones compromise equally unacceptable as the Steiger proposal to you?

THE PRESIDENT. When I referred to the Steiger amendment or proposal, I was also referring to the Jones proposal, which is a version of the Steiger amendment.

Both these proposals apply basically to the desire of some Members of the Congress to remove part of the income of very wealthy taxpayers from the minimum tax.

A few years ago, the Congress very wisely said that if there were loopholes or provisions in the tax law that let a wealthy person avoid paying any tax, they would at least have to pay some tax under the new minimum tax laws. And the Steiger amendment and the Jones amendment, part of it, refers to that basic principle. I disagree with the Steiger and Jones proposal.

Ms. Woodruff [Judy Woodruff, NBC News].

Q. If these proposals, if these plans, the Steiger bill and the Jones bill, are as onerous as you suggest, then why have so many Members of Congress, including so many Democrats, come around in support of them?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, we don't have any clear indication of that. They do have enough support to cause me concern. My guess is that when the Congress becomes acquainted with which taxpayers in our country benefit—that is, the very wealthy taxpayers—and how they give no relief to the average and middle-income families, my guess is that the Congress will reject this proposal.

Q. Mr. President, are you satisfied that your tax cut and your tax reform plan were sufficiently fair for middle-income taxpayers?

THE PRESIDENT. Yes, I think they were eminently fair, and my preference, of course, is that my original proposal would be adopted. My guess is that the Congress will not adopt my tax reform proposals in their entirety.

WHITE HOUSE VISITORS

Q. Mr. President, sir, you've extended White House hospitality to a variety of people, including jazz musicians and prizefighters. Could you tell us why you haven't invited Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn or, in another category, Howard Jarvis or, in another category, your fellow Southern Baptist Convention speaker, Anita Bryant, or do you approve of—disapprove of the positions of these people?

THE PRESIDENT. Well, I don't have any inclination now to say whether I approve or disapprove of what they do. I'm sure they've all done things of which I do approve and they probably have all done things of which I disapprove. But there are—

Q. You wouldn't subscribe to original sin, then. [Laughter]

THE PRESIDENT. There are 220 million people in America, and there's a limit to how many we can invite. [Laughter] But we'll continue our invitations in the future and maybe someday get around to those whom you offer as a possibility.

Q. Anita Bryant said to the Southern Baptist Convention that Midge Costanza came down and intruded herself into the Dade County ordinance struggle.

Was that at your direction or was that Midge's kind of spontaneity?

THE PRESIDENT. I didn't know that she went to Dade County. If she did, it was not at my direction.

NATIONAL HEALTH CARE

Q. Mr. President, given the seriousness of the inflation problem, do you still plan to offer a comprehensive national health program, and if so, when? What's your current thinking on that problem?

THE PRESIDENT. Within the next few days I will direct the Secretary of HEW to comply with principles that I outlined to him in the preparation of a national health proposal. The implementation of it, and the passage of it by Congress before it's implemented, will have to accommodate budget constraints and the attitude of both the Congress and the American people.

I do favor a comprehensive health proposal. Now at this time, the high inflation rate and the very tight budget constraints would not permit immediate implementation of it. It might take many years before the final plan is completely put into effect.

After I give these instructions to Mr. Califano, then he will be consulting with Members of the Congress who are particularly interested and will be consulting with Governors and interest groups like the hospital administrators, doctors, and so forth, to work out not only the specifics of the proposal but also the rough time schedule that we would follow in their implementation.

MR. CORMIER. Thank you, Mr. President.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you, Mr. Cormier.

NOTE: President Carter's thirty-fourth news conference began at 4 p.m. in Room 450 of the Old Executive Office Building. It was broadcast live on radio and television.

Interagency Committee on Emergency Medical Services

Appointment of Thomas R. Jones and Sylvia H. Micik as Members. June 27, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of two persons as members of the Interagency Committee on Emergency Medical Services. They are:

THOMAS R. JONES, of Peoria, Ill., project director for the St. Francis Hospital-Medical Center and director of the Remote Coronary Care Monitoring Project and the Tri-County Emergency Service Center Dispatch System;

SYLVIA H. MICIK, of La Jolla, Calif., medical director of the Orange County Emergency Medical Services Program, director of the San Diego Poison Information Center, and a consultant on emergency medical services.

United States Delegation's Visit to the People's Republic of China

White House Statement on the Mission To Discuss Science and Technology Matters. June 27, 1978

Dr. Frank Press, the adviser on science and technology to the President and the Director of the White House Office of Science and Technology Policy, will lead a 14-member delegation of U.S. Government science policy makers and administrators to China from July 6-10.

Dr. Press is undertaking this mission at the request of the President. The trip was first discussed with the Chinese during Dr. Brzezinski's May 20-23 trip to Peking.

While in the People's Republic, the delegation will be hosted by Peking's pertinent science and technology organizations.

Dr. Press and his group will be in Peking for 4 days of discussions with Chinese counterparts.

Dr. Press's visit is in keeping with the Shanghai Communiqué of February 1972, in which the United States and the People's Republic agreed that "It is desirable to broaden the understanding between the two peoples . . . in such fields as science and technology." Both sides undertook to facilitate the further development of such contacts and exchanges. It is our hope that Dr. Press's delegation will lead to a broader program with China in science and technology.

A delegation list follows:

FRANK PRESS, Director, Office of Science and Technology Policy, and science and technology adviser to the President;

ROBERT A. FROSCH, Administrator, National Aeronautics and Space Administration;

RICHARD C. ATKINSON, Director, National Science Foundation;

In 1974 and 1975, she was Consul General in Port Moresby. Since 1975 she has been Ambassador to Papua New Guinea.

Task Force on Women Business Owners

Remarks on Receiving the Report of the Task Force. June 28, 1978

During one speech while I was campaigning for President, I said that when Amy grows up, I'd like for her to have just as clear a vision of being a medical doctor as a nurse, or a lawyer as a secretary, or to be President as to be a President's wife. I know when I was a child, I was an entrepreneur at a very early age, selling boiled peanuts when I was 5 years old and later graduating to hamburgers and homemade ice cream. [Laughter] Amy has already started in the lemonade business, as you may have noticed during the halcyon days when I was a nominee and before I had any responsibilities as President.

And I think that last year, the testimony that Juanita Kreps gave to the Congress about the problems with women being entrepreneurs and business executives inspired me to call on this Task Force to meet to investigate the present

United States Ambassador to the Solomon Islands

Nomination of Ambassador Mary S. Olmsted. June 27, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Mary S. Olmsted, currently U.S. Ambassador to Papua New Guinea, to serve concurrently as Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States to the Solomon Islands.

Olmsted, of Signal Mountain, Tenn., was born September 28, 1919, in Duluth, Minn. She received a B.A. from Holyoke College in 1941 and an M.A. from Columbia University in 1945.

Olmsted joined the Foreign Service in 1945 and served in Montreal, Amsterdam, Reykjavik, and Vienna. She was detailed to the Fletcher School of Law and Di-problems and to give me advice on what I might do as President heading the executive branch of Government and having influence in the business community and, perhaps, some limited influence in the higher education institutions to help with the problem.

There is a definite problem. Although women enjoy a major role in the ownership of stock in businesses, sometimes earned by themselves, sometimes inherited after the death of a husband, there's an alarmingly small portion of women ownership of active businesses in the financial structure of our country. Less than one-half of 1 percent—as a matter of fact, I think three-tenths of 1 percent of gross business receipts in this country are derived from businesses owned by women.

This is an alarmingly small percentage. And it certainly is not related to either the need or the inclination or ambition of women who want to be at the management level in the free enterprise system of our country.

Women have the same motivations as men for wanting to own and control and to manage the business life of our country. They desire, obviously, to earn a living, to make money, to take what talents or ability they have and to let that talent be expressed in productive contribution to society and to exercise management, judgments, and to shape the communities within which they live, to set an example for others to enter the competitive world that makes our country a great one.

Women also have the same problems that men do in becoming entrepreneurs, particularly in a small business environment, inadequate capital, the need to build a reputation that would encourage lending institutions to invest in that person. These opportunities and problems are shared. But women suffer from discrimination.

I don't think there's any doubt that a Federal agency or a private lending institution, an institution of higher education has an almost innate feeling that a business investment would best be made through a man than a woman. It's not fair. It's not deserved. There's no reason for it. But it exists.

I've looked over the outline of the recommendations of this Task Force. And I think there have been some very clear delineations of the reasons for this problem, and I have a responsibility along with all of you to correct those problems.

Almost every agency of the Federal Government, from the Internal Revenue Service, the Commerce Department, the Agriculture Department, obviously the Treasury Department, the Small Business Administration, can take administrative actions without the requirement of congressional action or law change to help resolve some of the problems that have been identified.

There's a greatly expanding women's work force; almost half the women in our country now have jobs outside their own homes. But in even middle- and upper-level management positions, only 1 woman in 20 enjoys this opportunity or privilege or responsibility, less than third the rate of that enjoyed by men.

Well, I'll do all I can to help alleviate this problem and to remove the discriminatory aspects of our society both in government and outside of government.

And to close, I might say that I have this motivation not just to please women or to honor women but because of the best interests of our country, because when we lose a tremendous reservoir of talent, innovation, sensitivity, competence that we are presently losing, it hurts our country. And I want to be sure that we don't suffer any further from this deprivation, not just of women but of the American system.

So, I considered myself a partner with the women of America when I asked the Task Force to perform this work. I hope that you will continue to look upon me as a partner as we carry out the recommendations that have been made.

At the next Cabinet meeting, this will be on my agenda. I'll go down the list of recommendations with the Cabinet members, the heads of the major agencies, and perhaps we'll have an immediate indication to you of tangible results. And I would like to be sure that this report does not gather dust on the shelves of those involved, but becomes a working document that would yield benefits not only to you but to Amy and others in whom I have confidence for the future.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 11:45 a.m. in the Rose Garden at the White House. Prior to his remarks, the President received the report from Charlotte A. Taylor, Executive Director of the Task Force.

The 221-page report is entitled "The Bottom Line: (Un)equal Enterprise in America—Report of the President's Interagency Task Force on Women Business Owners."

International Year of the Child, 1979

Remarks on U.S. Participation in the Program. June 28, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. This afternoon, as far as the United States of America is concerned, we're beginning to emphasize and hopefully even to dramatize our own commitment to making the International Year of the Child a success.

In December of 1976, the United Nations passed a resolution setting aside a special period for a worldwide assessment of the problems, the needs, the opportunities of children. There are 1½ billion children in the world. And although our own country has been blessed with, I'd say, at least adequate material needs to make our lives certainly more pleasant and more prosperous than most, even in the United States we have serious problems among our children.

We had, last year, a million children whose rights were abused, who suffered physical abuse from their parents. And I don't think there's an adequate understanding yet in our societal structure of this devastating demonstration of carelessness or cruelty, quite often perpetrated against a young person who has very little voice to express pain or suffering or displeasure.

In our rich country, we have 10 million children who have never had any medical care at all, and about half the children in this country have never seen a dentist.

I believe that most Americans are unaware of these few statistics. And I would hope that next year, as the world focuses its attention upon children, that all of us could become much more knowledgeable about the need, much more willing to assume responsibility for correcting and meeting those needs, and that we might in a positive way assess the unique opportunity to broaden the horizon of growth and enjoyment and the productivity of our children's lives, both now and in the future.

I've asked Jean Young, Mrs. Andrew Young, to be the chairman of the American committee for the International Year of the Child. She's in a special place, associated intimately with the families of representatives of almost every nation on Earth. She's a mother herself. Her husband and she have been involved in the correction of a very serious deprivation of rights because of racial discrimination. And I think she has both the knowledge, the influence, the prestige, the courage, and the commitment to lead our own effort here in the United States well and effectively.

I'll be working closely with this group and hope to add the prestige and the influence of the Presidency itself to making this a successful effort.

We will be eager to help others, children in nations not quite so blessed with the material benefits of life in this next year. This effort will encompass almost every aspect of humanitarian service. Working through UNICEF and other

United Nations agencies, through the leaders of other nations, I think we can enhance the opportunity for better clothing, housing, food, medical care, education, and the protection against suffering on the part of children in all nations.

So, I'm very eager to be a part of it. It's a sobering prospect to know that perhaps once in a lifetime we have an opportunity to focus attention on such a neglected group in the world's population.

And I for one, along with Jean Young, the Commission members, and, I hope, you and all the people in our Nation, will help the United States to set an example of a country whose actions can be equal to the bigness of our hearts and whose minds will be attuned to the analysis of problems and the resolution or solution of them.

I want to thank all of you for coming here this afternoon to begin preparations to make 1979 a successful period in the study and enhancement of the lives of children everywhere.

Thank you very much.

MRS. YOUNG. Mr. President, distinguished guests and visitors:

We are gathered here representing many facets of America. Our common bond is our love and concern for children. During International Year of the Child, we want to affirm children. The needs that you have so vividly portrayed are diverse and intense within the world arena. Within our own Nation, the needs are complex and difficult. But if we affirm children, we are on the road to effecting change.

Children are resilient, tenacious, and adaptable. Many survive in the most deplorable conditions. They are also vulnerable, defenseless, and powerless. With a little help from us, they can develop into the beautiful, loving, confident, contributing human beings they were meant to be.

Mr. President, the commitment and sensitivity that you have expressed can help this to happen, along, of course, with the cooperation of all the concerned organizations, the governmental agencies, and the dedicated private citizens throughout this Nation.

Certainly, if we mustered the mighty forces of this great Nation to protect the tiny snail darter, certainly our court systems can protect our most valuable natural resource, our children. As the entire world is focusing on children, we call on all the voices of concern in every community throughout this Nation to examine itself, determine the needs of its children, and seek remedies through all resources available—whether private, corporate, or governmental.

As we affirm children, enjoy them, listen to voices of concern, seek solutions, we must not forget the most important voice in all, the voice of our children themselves. Regina and Scott, please come forward and share with us a couple of the thousands of letters expressing the concerns of the children of this country.

Mr. President, would you come forward?

SCOTT HIGELL. "Dear Sir, I am just saying one thing. I wish that all the children in the whole world would have a good parent and a nice home and have peace. Sincerely yours, Chucky D. Perry."

REGINA HIGGINS. "Dear Sir, our class is talking a lot about the world and peace. We want to know how to get it. Your friend, Roxanna Floris."

MRS. YOUNG. Thank you very much.

THE PRESIDENT. I want all of you to go to work, too. We can't do it just for the Commission. So, we're all in the same boat. We're all partners in a very worthy concern—[inaudible]—for our country and for a better life throughout the world.

Senator Sparkman just came in. I wanted to recognize him. Senator, would you stand up? Virginia—thank you very much—and Congresswoman Virginia Smith. We are very eager and pleased to have the Members of Congress participate thoroughly, because there could not possibly be a more representative group. And their voice can be heard almost immediately over the country collectively, and they can also give us what these children have just given us, a very good feedback from the children around the Nation. We're not just teachers but we are also students.

Both these letters, I notice, express the children's hope for peace, which is obviously the prime hope of all of us.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 1:35 p.m. in the Rose Garden at the White House.

National Advisory Committee on Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention

*Appointment of Seven Members.
June 28, 1978*

The President today announced the appointment of seven persons as members of the National Advisory Committee on Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. They are:

- C. JOSEPH ANDERSON, a Terre Haute, Ind., attorney and former judge of the Vigo County (Ind.) circuit court. He is a former high school teacher, deputy prosecutor, and State legislator;
- KENNETH MCCLINTOCK-HERNANDEZ, of San Juan, P.R., a law student at Tulane Law School, who has been active in civic and political activities relating to youth in Puerto Rico;
- RON LEFLORE, a centerfielder for the Detroit Tigers and author of the autobiography "Breakout";

D. LAVERNE PIERCE, of Salem, Oreg., a consultant to the Marion-Polk-Yamhill Council on Alcoholism, where she is designer of a community alcohol education plan. She is former executive director of a free medical clinic and is the chairperson of the Oregon Juvenile Justice Advisory Committee;

KENNETH F. SCHOEN, commissioner of the Minnesota State Department of Corrections and a former parole agent and psychiatric social worker;

DAVID TULL, of the Bronx, New York City, a student at State University College at Buffalo, a former youth gang leader, and president of the Third World, a coalition of gangs working to improve living conditions;

ALICE UDALL, a juvenile court referee in Pima County, Ariz., and member of the Arizona Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Advisory Committee.

National Security Information

*Statement on Issuing Executive Order 12065.
June 29, 1978*

I am pleased to sign the Executive order revamping the Government's security classification system.

The public is entitled to know as much as possible about the Government's activities. Classification should be used only to protect legitimate national security secrets and never to cover up mistakes or improper activities.

While some material must be classified, the Government classifies too much information, classifies it too highly and for too long. These practices violate the public's right to know, impose unnecessary costs, and weaken protection for truly sensitive information by undermining respect for all classification.

The new order will increase openness in Government by limiting classification and accelerating declassification. At the same time, it will improve protection for information that needs to be kept secret.

The standard for classification has been tightened. No document is to be classified unless its release reasonably could be expected to cause identifiable damage to the national security. Insignificant damage is not a basis for classification. In addition, the number of agencies and officials with classification authority is being reduced. Delegation of such authority shall be held to a minimum.

All documents should be declassified as early as national security permits. Under the new order, most documents will be declassified after no more than 6 years. Only agency heads and officials with "Top Secret" classification authority may classify for a longer period and only by indicating why classification will remain necessary despite the passage of time. With a few exceptions, the documents given extended classification will be declassified after no more than 20 years. The millions of documents classified under prior orders that are over 20 years old will be reviewed and—in almost all cases—released as quickly as possible.

I expect all officials to follow these procedures and the others set out in the new order. But experience has taught us that strong oversight is needed, both to make the classification system as open as possible and to safeguard properly classified documents. Each agency that handles classified information should take care to ensure that its personnel understand and follow the new procedures.

In addition, I have created an Information Security Oversight Office to provide overall supervision. This Office will have authority to review agencies' procedures and files. It can overrule their regulations and their decisions on classification of individual documents, subject to appeal to the National Security Council. The Office will report regularly to the NSC and to me on compliance with the order. The Office is a key element to the new classification system, and it will have my strong support.

In a break from precedent, this order was drafted in consultation with several congressional committees and private groups. I particularly wish to thank Senators James Abourezk, Joseph Biden, Edmund Muskie, and Representatives Edward Boland and Richardson Preyer for their valuable assistance.

National Security Information

Executive Order 12065. June 28, 1978

By the authority vested in me as President by the Constitution and laws of the United States of America, in order to balance the public's interest in access to Government information with the need to protect certain national security information from disclosure, it is hereby ordered as follows:

SECTION 1. ORIGINAL CLASSIFICATION.

1-1. Classification Designation.

1-101. Except as provided in the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, this Order provides the only basis for classifying information. Information may be classified in one of the three designations listed below. If there is reasonable doubt which designation is appropriate, or whether the information should be classified at all, the less restrictive designation should be used, or the information should not be classified.

1-102. "Top Secret" shall be applied only to information, the unauthorized disclosure of which reasonably could be expected to cause exceptionally grave damage to the national security.

1-103. "Secret" shall be applied only to information, the unauthorized disclosure of which reasonably could be expected to cause serious damage to the national security.

1-104. "Confidential" shall be applied to information, the unauthorized disclosure of which reasonably could be expected to cause identifiable damage to the national security.

1-2. Classification Authority.

1-201. Top Secret. Authority for original classification of information as Top Secret may be exercised only by the President, by such officials as the President may designate by publication in the FEDERAL REGISTER, by the agency heads listed below, and by officials to whom such authority is delegated in accordance with Section 1-204:

The Secretary of State
 The Secretary of the Treasury
 The Secretary of Defense
 The Secretary of the Army
 The Secretary of the Navy
 The Secretary of the Air Force
 The Attorney General
 The Secretary of Energy
 The Chairman, Nuclear Regulatory Commission
 The Director, Arms Control and Disarmament Agency
 The Director of Central Intelligence
 The Administrator, National Aeronautics and Space Administration
 The Administrator of General Services (delegable only to the Director, Federal Preparedness Agency and to the Director, Information Security Oversight Office)

1-202. Secret. Authority for original classification of information as Secret may be exercised only by such officials as the President may designate by publication in the FEDERAL REGISTER, by the agency heads listed below, by officials who have Top Secret classification authority, and by officials to whom such authority is delegated in accordance with Section 1-204:

- The Secretary of Commerce
- The Secretary of Transportation
- The Administrator, Agency for International Development
- The Director, International Communication Agency

1-203. Confidential. Authority for original classification of information as Confidential may be exercised only by such officials as the President may designate by publication in the FEDERAL REGISTER, by the agency heads listed below, by officials who have Top Secret or Secret classification authority, and by officials to whom such authority is delegated in accordance with Section 1-204:

- The President and Chairman, Export-Import Bank of the United States
- The President and Chief Executive Officer, Overseas Private Investment Corporation

1-204. Limitations on Delegation of Classification Authority.

(a) Authority for original classification of information as Top Secret may be delegated only to principal subordinate officials who have a frequent need to exercise such authority as determined by the President or by agency heads listed in Section 1-201.

(b) Authority for original classification of information as Secret may be delegated only to subordinate officials who have a frequent need to exercise such authority as determined by the President, by agency heads listed in Sections 1-201 and 1-202, and by officials with Top Secret classification authority.

(c) Authority for original classification of information as Confidential may be delegated only to subordinate officials who have a frequent need to exercise such authority as determined by the President, by agency heads listed in Sections 1-201,

1-202, and 1-203, and by officials with Top Secret classification authority.

(d) Delegated original classification authority may not be redelegated.

(e) Each delegation of original classification authority shall be in writing by name or title of position held.

(f) Delegations of original classification authority shall be held to an absolute minimum. Periodic reviews of such delegations shall be made to ensure that the officials so designated have demonstrated a continuing need to exercise such authority.

1-205. Exceptional Cases. When an employee or contractor of an agency that does not have original classification authority originates information believed to require classification, the information shall be protected in the manner prescribed by this Order and implementing directives. The information shall be transmitted promptly under appropriate safeguards to the agency which has appropriate subject matter interest and classification authority. That agency shall decide within 30 days whether to classify that information. If it is not clear which agency should get the information, it shall be sent to the Director of the Information Security Oversight Office established in Section 5-2 for a determination.

1-3. Classification Requirements.

1-301. Information may not be considered for classification unless it concerns:

- (a) military plans, weapons, or operations;
- (b) foreign government information;
- (c) intelligence activities, sources or methods;
- (d) foreign relations or foreign activities of the United States;
- (e) scientific, technological, or economic matters relating to the national security;

(f) United States Government programs for safeguarding nuclear materials or facilities; or

(g) other categories of information which are related to national security and which require protection against unauthorized disclosure as determined by the President, by a person designated by the President pursuant to Section 1-201, or by an agency head.

1-302. Even though information is determined to concern one or more of the criteria in Section 1-301, it may not be classified unless an original classification authority also determines that its unauthorized disclosure reasonably could be expected to cause at least identifiable damage to the national security.

1-303. Unauthorized disclosure of foreign government information or the identity of a confidential foreign source is presumed to cause at least identifiable damage to the national security.

1-304. Each determination under the criterion of Section 1-301(g) shall be reported promptly to the Director of the Information Security Oversight Office.

1-4. Duration of Classification.

1-401. Except as permitted in Section 1-402, at the time of the original classification each original classification authority shall set a date or event for automatic declassification no more than six years later.

1-402. Only officials with Top Secret classification authority and agency heads listed in Section 1-2 may classify information for more than six years from the date of the original classification. This authority shall be used sparingly. In such cases, a declassification date or event, or a date for review, shall be set. This date or event shall be as early as national security permits and shall be no more than twenty years after original classification, except that for foreign government information the date or event may be up to thirty years after original classification.

1-5. Identification and Markings.

1-501. At the time of original classification, the following shall be shown on the face of paper copies of all classified documents:

(a) the identity of the original classification authority;

(b) the office of origin;

(c) the date or event for declassification or review; and

(d) one of the three classification designations defined in Section 1-1.

1-502. Documents classified for more than six years shall also be marked with the identity of the official who authorized the prolonged classification. Such documents shall be annotated with the reason the classification is expected to remain necessary, under the requirements of Section 1-3, despite the passage of time. The reason for the prolonged classification may be stated by reference to criteria set forth in agency implementing regulations. These criteria shall explain in narrative form the reason the information needs to be protected beyond six years. If the individual who signs or otherwise authenticates a document also is authorized to classify it, no further annotation of identity is required.

1-503. Only the designations prescribed by this Order may be used to identify classified information. Markings such as "For Official Use Only" and "Limited Official Use" may not be used for that purpose. Terms such as "Conference" or "Agency" may not be used in conjunction with the classification designations prescribed by this Order; e.g., "Agency Confidential" or "Conference Confidential."

1-504. In order to facilitate excerpting and other uses, each classified document shall, by marking or other means, indicate clearly which portions are classified, with the applicable classification designation, and which portions are not classified. The Director of the Information Security Oversight Office may, for good cause, grant and revoke waivers of this requirement for specified classes of documents or information.

1-505. Foreign government information shall either retain its original classification designation or be assigned a United States classification designation that shall ensure a degree of protection equivalent to that required by the entity that furnished the information.

1-506. Classified documents that contain or reveal information that is subject to special dissemination and reproduction limitations authorized by this Order shall be marked clearly so as to place the user on notice of the restrictions.

1-6. Prohibitions.

1-601. Classification may not be used to conceal violations of law, inefficiency, or administrative error, to prevent embarrassment to a person, organization or agency, or to restrain competition.

1-602. Basic scientific research information not clearly related to the national security may not be classified.

1-603. A product of non-government research and development that does not incorporate or reveal classified information to which the producer or developer was given prior access may not be classified under this Order until and unless the government acquires a proprietary interest in the product. This Order does not affect the provisions of the Patent Secrecy Act of 1952 (35 U.S.C. 181-188).

1-604. References to classified documents that do not disclose classified information may not be classified or used as a basis for classification.

1-605. Classification may not be used to limit dissemination of information that is not classifiable under the provisions of this Order or to prevent or delay the public release of such information.

1-606. No document originated on or after the effective date of this Order may be classified after an agency has received a request for the document under the Freedom of Information Act or the Mandatory Review provisions of this Order (Section 3-5), unless such classification is consistent with this Order and is authorized by the agency head or deputy agency head. Documents originated before the effective date of this Order and subject to such a request may not be classified unless such classification is consistent with this Order and is authorized by the senior official designated to oversee the agency information security program or by an official with Top Secret classification authority. Classification authority under this provision shall be exercised personally, on a document-by-document basis.

1-607. Classification may not be restored to documents already declassified and released to the public under this Order or prior Orders.

SECTION 2. DERIVATIVE CLASSIFICATION.

2-1. Use of Derivative Classification.

2-101. Original classification authority shall not be delegated to persons who only reproduce, extract, or summarize classified information, or who only apply classification markings derived from source material or as directed by a classification guide.

2-102. Persons who apply such derivative classification markings shall:

(a) respect original classification decisions;

(b) verify the information's current level of classification so far as practicable before applying the markings; and

(c) carry forward to any newly created documents the assigned dates or events for declassification or review and any additional authorized markings, in accordance with Sections 2-2 and 2-301 below. A single marking may be used for documents based on multiple sources.

2-2. Classification Guides.

2-201. Classification guides used to direct derivative classification shall specifically identify the information to be classified. Each classification guide shall specifically indicate how the designations, time limits, markings, and other requirements of this Order are to be applied to the information.

2-202. Each such guide shall be approved personally and in writing by an agency head listed in Section 1-2 or by an official with Top Secret classification authority. Such approval constitutes an original classification decision.

2-3. New Material.

2-301. New material that derives its classification from information classified on or after the effective date of this Order shall be marked with the declassification date or event, or the date for review, assigned to the source information.

2-302. New material that derives its classification from information classified under prior Orders shall be treated as follows:

(a) If the source material bears a declassification date or event twenty years or less from the date of origin, that date or event shall be carried forward on the new material.

(b) If the source material bears no declassification date or event or is marked for declassification beyond twenty years, the new material shall be marked with a date for review for declassification at twenty years from the date of original classification of the source material.

(c) If the source material is foreign government information bearing no date or event for declassification or is marked for declassification beyond thirty years, the new material shall be marked for review for declassification at thirty years from the date of original classification of the source material.

SECTION 3. DECLASSIFICATION AND DOWNGRADING.

3-1. Declassification Authority.

3-101. The authority to declassify or downgrade information classified under this or prior Orders shall be exercised only as specified in Section 3-1.

3-102. Classified information may be declassified or downgraded by the official who authorized the original classification if that official is still serving in the same position, by a successor, or by a supervisory official of either.

3-103. Agency heads named in Section 1-2 shall designate additional officials at the lowest practicable echelons to exercise declassification and downgrading authority.

3-104. If the Director of the Information Security Oversight Office determines that information is classified in violation of this Order, the Director may require the information to be declassified by the agency that originated the classification. Any such decision by the Director may be appealed to the National Security Council. The information shall remain classified until the appeal is decided or until one year from the date of the Director's decision, whichever occurs first.

3-105. The provisions of this Order relating to declassification shall also apply to agencies which, under the terms of this Order, do not have original classification authority but which had such authority under prior Orders.

3-2. Transferred Information.

3-201. For classified information transferred in conjunction with a transfer of functions—not merely for storage purposes—the receiving agency shall be deemed to be the originating agency for all purposes under this Order.

3-202. For classified information not transferred in accordance with Section 3-201, but originated in an agency which has ceased to exist, each agency in possession shall be deemed to be the originating agency for all purposes under this Order. Such information may be declassified or downgraded by the agency in possession after consulting with any other agency having an interest in the subject matter.

3-203. Classified information transferred to the General Services Administration for accession into the Archives of the United States shall be declassified or downgraded by the Archivist of the United States in accordance with this Order, the directives of the Information Security Oversight Office, and the agency guidelines.

3-204. After the termination of a Presidential administration, the Archivist of the United States shall review and declassify or downgrade all information classified by the President, the White House Staff, committees or commissions appointed by the President, or others acting on the President's behalf. Such declassification shall only be undertaken in accordance with the provisions of Section 3-504.

3-3. Declassification Policy.

3-301. Declassification of classified information shall be given emphasis comparable to that accorded classification. Information classified pursuant to this and prior Orders shall be declassified as early as national security considerations permit. Decisions concerning declassification shall be based on the loss of the information's sensitivity with the passage of time or on the occurrence of a declassification event.

3-302. When information is reviewed for declassification pursuant to this Order or the Freedom of Information Act, it shall be declassified unless the declassification authority established pursuant to Section 3-1 determines that the information continues to meet the classification requirements prescribed in Section 1-3 despite the passage of time.

3-303. It is presumed that information which continues to meet the classification requirements in Section 1-3 requires continued protection. In some cases, however, the need to protect such information may be outweighed by the public interest in disclosure of the information, and in these cases the information should be declassified. When such questions arise, they shall be referred to the agency head, a senior agency official with responsibility for processing Freedom of Information Act requests or Mandatory Review requests under this Order, an official with Top Secret classification authority, or the Archivist of the United States in the case of material covered in Section 3-503. That official will determine whether the public interest in disclosure outweighs the damage to national security that might reasonably be expected from disclosure.

3-4. Systematic Review for Declassification.

3-401. Classified information constituting permanently valuable records of the Government, as defined by 44 U.S.C. 2103, and information in the possession and control of the Administrator of General Services, pursuant to 44 U.S.C. 2107 or 2107 note, shall be reviewed for declassification as it becomes twenty years old. Agency heads listed in Section 1-2 and officials designated by the President pursuant to Section 1-201 of this Order may extend classification beyond twenty years, but only in accordance with Sections 3-3 and 3-402. This authority may not be delegated. When classification is extended beyond twenty years, a date no more than ten years later shall be set for declassification or for the next review. That date shall be marked on the document. Subsequent reviews for declassification shall be set at no more than ten year intervals. The Director of the Information Security Oversight Office may extend the period between subsequent reviews for specific categories of documents or information.

3-402. Within 180 days after the effective date of this Order, the agency heads listed in Section 1-2 and the heads of agencies which had original classification authority under prior orders shall, after consultation with the Archivist of the United States and review by the Information Security Oversight Office, issue and maintain guidelines for systematic review covering twenty-year old classified information under their jurisdiction. These guidelines shall state specific, limited categories of information which, because of their national security sensitivity, should not be declassified automatically but should be reviewed item-by-item to determine whether continued protection beyond twenty years is needed. These guidelines shall be authorized for use by the Archivist of the United States and may, upon approval of the issuing authority, be used by any agency having custody of the information. All information not identified in these guidelines as requiring review and for which a prior automatic declassification date has not been established shall be declassified automatically at the end of twenty years from the date of original classification.

3-403. Notwithstanding Sections 3-401 and 3-402, the Secretary of Defense may establish special procedures for systematic review and declassification of classified cryptologic information, and the Director of Central Intelligence may establish special procedures for systematic review and declassification of classified information concerning the identities of clandestine human agents. These procedures shall be consistent, so far as practicable, with the objectives of Sections 3-401 and 3-402. Prior to implementation, they shall be reviewed and approved by the Director of the Information Security Oversight Office and, with respect to matters pertaining to intelligence sources and methods, by the Director of Central Intelligence. Disapproval of procedures by the Director of the Information Security Oversight Office may be appealed to the National Security Council. In such cases, the procedures shall not be implemented until the appeal is decided.

3-404. Foreign government information shall be exempt from automatic declassification and twenty year systematic review. Unless declassified earlier, such information shall be reviewed for declassification thirty years from its date of origin. Such review shall be in accordance with the provisions of Section 3-3 and with guidelines developed by agency heads in consultation with the Archivist of the United States and, where appropriate, with the foreign government or international organization concerned. These guidelines shall be authorized for use by the Archivist of the United States and may, upon approval of the issuing authority, be used by any agency having custody of the information.

3-405. Transition to systematic review at twenty years shall be implemented as rapidly as practicable and shall be completed no more than ten years from the effective date of this Order.

3-5. Mandatory Review for Declassification.

3-501. Agencies shall establish a mandatory review procedure to handle requests by a member of the public, by a government employee, or by an agency, to declassify and release information. This procedure shall apply to information classified under this Order or prior Orders. Except as provided in Section 3-503, upon such a request the information shall be reviewed for possible declassification, provided the request reasonably describes the information. Requests for declassification under this provision shall be acted upon within 60 days. After review, the information or any reasonably segregable portion thereof that no longer requires protection under this Order shall be declassified and released unless withholding is otherwise warranted under applicable law.

3-502. Requests for declassification which are submitted under the provisions of the Freedom of Information Act shall be processed in accordance with the provisions of that Act.

3-503. Information less than ten years old which was originated by the President, by the White House Staff, or by committees or commissions appointed by the President, or by others acting on behalf of the President, including such information in the possession and control of the Administrator of General Services pursuant to 44 U.S.C. 2107 or 2107 note, is exempted from the provisions of Section 3-501. Such information over ten years old shall be subject to mandatory review for declassification. Requests for mandatory review shall be processed in accordance with procedures developed by the Archivist of the United States. These procedures shall provide for consultation with agencies having primary subject matter interest. Any decision by the Archivist may be appealed to the Director of the Information Security Oversight Office. Agencies with primary subject matter interest shall be notified promptly of the Director's decision on such appeals and may further appeal to the National Security Council through the process set forth in Section 3-104.

3-504. Requests for declassification of classified documents originated by an agency but in the possession and control of the Administrator of General Services, pursuant to 44 U.S.C. 2107 or 2107 note, shall be referred by the Archivist to the agency of origin for processing in accordance with Section 3-501 and for direct response to the requestor. The Archivist shall inform requestors of such referrals.

3-505. No agency in possession of a classified document may, in response to a request for the document made under the Freedom of Information Act or this Order's Mandatory Review provision, refuse to confirm the existence or non-existence of the document, unless the fact of its existence or non-existence would itself be classifiable under this Order.

3-6. Downgrading.

3-601. Classified information that is marked for automatic downgrading is downgraded accordingly without notification to holders.

3-602. Classified information that is not marked for automatic downgrading may be assigned a lower classification designation by the originator or by other authorized officials when such downgrading is appropriate. Notice of downgrading shall be provided to holders of the information to the extent practicable.

SECTION 4. SAFEGUARDING.

4-1. General Restrictions on Access.

4-101. No person may be given access to classified information unless that person has been determined to be trustworthy and unless access is necessary for the performance of official duties.

4-102. All classified information shall be marked conspicuously to put users on notice of its current classification status and, if appropriate, to show any special distribution or reproduction restrictions authorized by this Order.

4-103. Controls shall be established by each agency to ensure that classified information is used, processed, stored, reproduced, and transmitted only under conditions that will provide adequate protection and prevent access by unauthorized persons.

4-104. Classified information no longer needed in current working files or for reference or record purposes shall be processed for appropriate disposition in accordance with the provisions of Chapters 21 and 33 of Title 44 of the United States Code, which governs disposition of Federal records.

4-105. Classified information disseminated outside the Executive branch shall be given protection equivalent to that afforded within the Executive branch.

4-2. Special Access Programs.

4-201. Agency heads listed in Section 1-201 may create special access programs to control access, distribution, and protection of particularly sensitive information classified pursuant to this Order or prior Orders. Such programs may be created or continued only by written direction and only by those agency heads and, for matters pertaining to intelligence sources and methods, by the Director of Central Intelligence. Classified information in such programs shall be declassified according to the provisions of Section 3.

4-202. Special access programs may be created or continued only on a specific showing that:

(a) normal management and safeguarding procedures are not sufficient to limit need-to-know or access;

(b) the number of persons who will need access will be reasonably small and commensurate with the objective of providing extra protection for the information involved; and

(c) the special access controls balance the need to protect the information against the full spectrum of needs to use the information.

4-203. All special access programs shall be reviewed regularly and, except those required by treaty or international agreement, shall terminate automatically every five years unless renewed in accordance with the procedures in Section 4-2.

4-204. Within 180 days after the effective date of this Order, agency heads shall review all existing special access programs under their jurisdiction and continue them only in accordance with the procedures in Section 4-2. Each of those agency heads shall also establish and maintain a system of accounting for special access programs. The Director of the Information Security Oversight Office shall have non-delegable access to all such accountings.

4-3. Access by Historical Researchers and Former Presidential Appointees.

4-301. The requirement in Section 4-101 that access to classified information may be granted only as is necessary for the performance of official duties may be waived as provided in Section 4-302 for persons who:

(a) are engaged in historical research projects, or

(b) previously have occupied policy-making positions to which they were appointed by the President.

4-302. Waivers under Section 4-301 may be granted only if the agency with jurisdiction over the information:

(a) makes a written determination that access is consistent with the interests of national security;

(b) takes appropriate steps to ensure that access is limited to specific categories of information over which that agency has classification jurisdiction;

(c) limits the access granted to former Presidential appointees to items that the person originated, reviewed, signed or received while serving as a Presidential appointee.

4-4. Reproduction Controls.

4-401. Top Secret documents may not be reproduced without the consent of the originating agency unless otherwise marked by the originating office.

4-402. Reproduction of Secret and Confidential documents may be restricted by the originating agency.

4-403. Reproduced copies of classified documents are subject to the same accountability and controls as the original documents.

4-404. Records shall be maintained by all agencies that reproduce paper copies of classified documents to show the number and distribution of reproduced copies of all Top Secret documents, of all documents covered by special access programs distributed outside the originating agency, and of all Secret and all Confidential documents which are marked with special dissemination and reproduction limitations in accordance with Section 1-506.

4-405. Sections 4-401 and 4-402 shall not restrict the production of documents for the purpose of facilitating review for declassification. However, such reproduced documents that remain classified after review must be destroyed after they are used.

SECTION 5. IMPLEMENTATION AND REVIEW.

5-1. Oversight.

5-101. The National Security Council may review all matters with respect to the implementation of this Order and shall provide overall policy direction for the information security program.

5-102. The Administrator of General Services shall be responsible for implementing and monitoring the program established pursuant to this Order. This responsibility shall be delegated to an Information Security Oversight Office.

5-2. Information Security Oversight Office.

5-201. The Information Security Oversight Office shall have a full-time Director appointed by the Administrator of General Services subject to approval by the President. The Administrator also shall have authority to appoint a staff for the Office.

5-202. The Director shall:

(a) oversee agency actions to ensure compliance with this Order and implementing directives;

(b) consider and take action on complaints and suggestions from persons within or outside the Government with respect to the administration of the information security program, including appeals from decisions on declassification requests pursuant to Section 3-503;

(c) exercise the authority to declassify information provided by Sections 3-104 and 3-503;

(d) develop, in consultation with the agencies, and promulgate, subject to the approval of the National Security Council, directives for the implementation of this Order which shall be binding on the agencies;

(e) report annually to the President through the Administrator of General

Services and the National Security Council on the implementation of this Order;

(f) review all agency implementing regulations and agency guidelines for systematic declassification review. The Director shall require any regulation or guideline to be changed if it is not consistent with this Order or implementing directives. Any such decision by the Director may be appealed to the National Security Council. The agency regulation or guideline shall remain in effect until the appeal is decided or until one year from the date of the Director's decision, whichever occurs first.

(g) exercise case-by-case classification authority in accordance with Section 1-205 and review requests for original classification authority from agencies or officials not granted original classification authority under Section 1-2 of this Order; and

(h) have the authority to conduct on-site reviews of the information security program of each agency that handles classified information and to require of each agency such reports, information, and other cooperation as necessary to fulfill his responsibilities. If such reports, inspection, or access to specific categories of classified information would pose an exceptional national security risk, the affected agency head may deny access. The Director may appeal denials to the National Security Council. The denial of access shall remain in effect until the appeal is decided or until one year from the date of the denial, whichever occurs first.

5-3. Interagency Information Security Committee.

5-301. There is established an Interagency Information Security Committee which shall be chaired by the Director and shall be comprised of representatives of the Secretaries of State, Defense, Treasury, and Energy, the Attorney General, the Director of Central Intelligence, the National Security Council, the Domestic Policy Staff, and the Archivist of the United States.

5-302. Representatives of other agencies may be invited to meet with the Committee on matters of particular interest to those agencies.

5-303. The Committee shall meet at the call of the Chairman or at the request of a member agency and shall advise the Chairman on implementation of this order.

5-4. General Responsibilities.

5-401. A copy of any information security regulation and a copy of any guideline for systematic declassification review which has been adopted pursuant to this Order or implementing directives, shall be submitted to the Information Security Oversight Office. To the extent practicable, such regulations and guidelines should be unclassified.

5-402. Unclassified regulations that establish agency information security policy and unclassified guidelines for systematic declassification review shall be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

5-403. Agencies with original classification authority shall promulgate guides for security classification that will facilitate the identification and uniform classification of information requiring protection under the provisions of this Order.

5-404. Agencies which originate or handle classified information shall:

(a) designate a senior agency official to conduct an active oversight program to ensure effective implementation of this Order;

(b) designate a senior agency official to chair an agency committee with authority to act on all suggestions and complaints with respect to the agency's administration of the information security program;

(c) establish a process to decide appeals from denials of declassification requests submitted pursuant to Section 3-5;

(d) establish a program to familiarize agency and other personnel who have access to classified information with the provisions of this Order and implementing directives. This program shall impress upon agency personnel their responsibility to exercise vigilance in complying with this Order. The program shall encourage agency personnel to challenge, through Mandatory Review and other appropriate procedures, those classification decisions they believe to be improper;

(e) promulgate guidelines for systematic review in accordance with Section 3-402;

(f) establish procedures to prevent unnecessary access to classified information, including procedures which require that a demonstrable need for access to classified information is established before initiating administrative clearance procedures, and which ensures that the number of people granted access to classified information is reduced to and maintained at the minimum number that is consistent with operational requirements and needs; and

(g) ensure that practices for safeguarding information are systematically reviewed and that those which are duplicative or unnecessary are eliminated.

5-405. Agencies shall submit to the Information Security Oversight Office such information or reports as the Director of the Office may find necessary to carry out the Office's responsibilities.

5-5. Administrative Sanctions.

5-501. If the Information Security Oversight Office finds that a violation of this Order or any implementing directives may have occurred, it shall make a report to the head of the agency concerned so that corrective steps may be taken.

5-502. Officers and employees of the United States Government shall be subject to appropriate administrative sanctions if they:

(a) knowingly and willfully classify or continue the classification of information in violation of this Order or any implementing directives; or

(b) knowingly, willfully and without authorization disclose information properly classified under this Order or prior Orders or compromise properly classified information through negligence; or

(c) knowingly and willfully violate any other provision of this Order or implementing directive.

5-503. Sanctions may include reprimand, suspension without pay, removal, termination of classification authority, or other sanction in accordance with applicable law and agency regulations.

5-504. Agency heads shall ensure that appropriate and prompt corrective action is taken whenever a violation under Section 5-502 occurs. The Director of the Information Security Oversight Office shall be informed when such violations occur.

5-505. Agency heads shall report to the Attorney General evidence reflected in classified information of possible violations of Federal criminal law by an agency employee and of possible violations by any other person of those Federal criminal laws specified in guidelines adopted by the Attorney General.

SECTION 6. GENERAL PROVISIONS.

6-1. Definitions.

6-101. "Agency" has the meaning defined in 5 U.S.C. 552(e).

6-102. "Classified information" means information or material, herein collectively termed information, that is owned by, produced for or by, or under the control of, the United States Government, and that has been determined pursuant to this Order or prior Orders to require protection against unauthorized disclosure, and that is so designated.

6-103. "Foreign government information" means information that has been provided to the United States in confidence by, or produced by the United States pursuant to a written joint arrangement requiring confidentiality with, a foreign government or international organization of governments.

6-104. "National security" means the national defense and foreign relations of the United States.

6-105. "Declassification event" means an event which would eliminate the need for continued classification.

6-2. General.

6-201. Nothing in this Order shall supersede any requirement made by or under the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended. "Restricted Data" and information designated as "Formerly Restricted Data" shall be handled, protected, classified, downgraded, and declassified in conformity with the provisions of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, and regulations issued pursuant thereto.

6-202. The Attorney General, upon request by the head of an agency, his duly designated representative, or the Director of the Information Security Oversight Office, shall personally or through authorized representatives of the Department of Justice render an interpretation of this Order with respect to any question arising in the course of its administration.

6-203. Executive Order No. 11652 of March 8, 1972, as amended by Executive Order No. 11714 of April 24, 1973, and as further amended by Executive Order No. 11862 of June 11, 1975, and the National Security Council Directive of May 17, 1972 (3 CFR 1085 (1971-75 Comp.)) are revoked.

6-204. This Order shall become effective on December 1, 1978, except that the functions of the Information Security Oversight Office specified in Sections 5-202(d) and 5-202(f) shall be effective immediately and shall be performed in the interim by the Interagency Classification Review Committee established pursuant to Executive Order No. 11652.

National Security Information

Order Designating Certain Officials To Classify Information "Top Secret."
June 28, 1978

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 1-201 of Executive Order 12065 of June 28, 1978, entitled "National Security Information", I hereby designate the following officials within the Executive Office of the President to originally classify information as "Top Secret".

The Vice President

The Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs

The Director, Office of Management and Budget

The Director, Office of Science and Technology Policy

The Special Representative for Trade Negotiations

The Chairman, Intelligence Oversight Board

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 1-202 of said Order, I designate the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers and the President's Personal Representative for Micronesian Status Negotiations to originally classify information as "Secret".

Any delegation of this authority shall be in accordance with Section 1-204 of the Order.

This Order shall be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

Consumer Product Safety Commission

Designation of Susan B. King as Chairman.
June 29, 1978

The President today announced that he will designate Susan Bennett King as Chairman of the Consumer Product Safety Commission. In announcing the designation, the President emphasized that he personally made the decision to support the 3-year reauthorization of the agency and that he backs the OMB budget recommendation for FY 1979.

King, 38, of Washington, D.C., was nominated to be a member of the Commission last January. She has also served as special assistant to the Chairman of the Federal Election Commission, as vice president of the Center for Public Financing of Elections, and as Washington director of the National Committee for an Effective Congress.

Student Loan Marketing Association

Appointment of Five Members of the Board of Directors. June 29, 1978

The President today announced the appointment of five persons as members of the Board of Directors of the Student Loan Marketing Association. They are:

BRENDA L. CATTERTON, of Arnold, Md., director of program development for the National Student Educational Fund;
E. T. DUNLAP, chancellor of the Oklahoma State Regents for Higher Education;
HERMAN E. GALLEGOS, president of the Human Resources Corporation in San Francisco, a management consulting firm;
GREGORY SCOTT NICHOLS, a political science student at Iowa State University;
LOIS D. RICE, of Washington, D.C., vice president of the College Entrance Examination Board.

The Student Loan Marketing Association was established by Congress in 1972. There are 21 members on the Board of Directors, and its purpose is to determine general policies to govern the operation of the Association in the buying, selling, and warehousing of guaranteed student loans.

New York City Financing Legislation

Statement on Senate Action Approving Guarantee Legislation. June 29, 1978

Today's action by the Senate represents an historic point in New York's path to economic recovery and financing self-sufficiency.

Earlier this year, the prevailing view was that the long-term guarantee legislation proposed by the administration could never be enacted. The Senate's action today reflects its awareness of the progress the city has made, as well as its recognition that the city's financing problems require a permanent solution that can restore New York to financing self-sufficiency.

The administration remains committed to working in conference to modify certain provisions in the Senate version which we regard as excessively restrictive.

Inspection of Foreign Assistance Programs

Executive Order 12066. June 29, 1978

By the authority vested in me as President of the United States of America by Section 124 of the International Development and Food Assistance Act of 1977 (Public Law 95-88, 95 Stat. 541) and Section 301 of Title 3 of the United States Code, and in order to assist the Secretary of State in carrying out his responsibilities under Section 622(c) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended (22 U.S.C. 2382(c)), hereafter referred to as the Act, it is hereby ordered as follows:

1-1. Assignment of Duties and Responsibilities.

1-101. I hereby direct the Secretary of State to assign to the Inspector General, Foreign Service, all duties and responsibilities vested in the Inspector General, Foreign Assistance by Section 624(d) of the Act (22 U.S.C. 2384(d)).

1-102. Having determined that all of the authorities vested in the Inspector General, Foreign Assistance, by Section 624(d) of the Act are necessary for the Inspector General, Foreign Service, to carry out the duties and responsibilities assigned to him pursuant to this Order, I hereby authorize the Inspector General, Foreign Service, to exercise all such authorities subject to the provisions of Section 1-2 of this Order.

1-2. Performance of Duties and Responsibilities.

1-201. In carrying out his duties and responsibilities and in exercising his authorities pursuant to this Executive Order, the Inspector General, Foreign Service, shall not duplicate the scope of the audit, investigation and inspection authorities of the other agencies, including those of the Inspectors General of the armed services, and shall concentrate upon matters that have substantial and direct impact upon the responsibilities of the Secretary of State under Section 622(c) of the Act.

1-202. The authority described in Section 624(d) (6) of the Act shall be exercised by the Inspector General, Foreign Service, only with the specific consent of the Secretary of State and in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary of State which, whenever practical, afford the head of any agency whose programs are subject to audit, review or inspection pursuant to such Section a reasonable opportunity to take corrective action before any suspension takes effect.

1-3. Administrative Matters.

1-301. The Secretary of State shall provide for the appropriate transfer of offices, entities, property, and records of the Office of the Inspector General, Foreign Assistance to the Office of the Inspector General, Foreign Service.

1-302. This Executive Order is effective July 1, 1978.

National YMCA Youth Governors Conference

Remarks on Greeting Participants in the Program. June 30, 1978

THE PRESIDENT. Good morning, everybody. I'm very grateful to have you come here to meet with me. When I was in Georgia as Governor, this was one of the exciting things about my life, one of the more pleasant things that I had to do with government. I know that you've enjoyed your visit here to Washington, which is probably your first official visit to our Capital, and this is also my first official visit to the Capital. [Laughter] And we've got another thing in common in the fact that we all either are Governors or have been Governors.

You've had an almost unique opportunity to see the inner workings of our Government in a concentrated way—brief, but concentrated. I know you've met with David Rubenstein and Jim Fallows on my staff. And I hope that was productive for you, to explain what did occur in the White House, at least from their point of view.

And you've had a chance to meet with Members of Congress, to see that branch of Government. You were here when an historic decision was made by the Supreme Court.

One of the things that I would like to mention specifically as a problem of mine is the historical, constitutional delineation among the different branches of Government, and the fact that that distinction is being clouded considerably in recent years, in particular, in recent months. The Executive has to have the right or the prerogative or the authority to execute, to carry out laws of Congress and to do it efficiently and economically and effectively. And more and more, the hands of the executive branch are tied by intrusions from other branches of Government. We have this as a constant problem in the Cabinet.

This is something with which you can help us. I think that in the past, the decisions made by the Youth Governors and your other State officials in the YMCA-Reader's Digest program have been very good influences on State legislatures. I noticed in preparing for this brief visit with you that more than 400 bills that have been introduced by Youth Governors and their cabinet have later been adopted by State legislatures.

Quite often, you have an innovative attitude and a perspective that might lead the way for the regular assistant Governors and State legislatures to carry out. And I think here you might inquire into some of the problems that I face as a President, and through your own initiative decide what ought to be done and keep the momentum going toward resolution of problems that you detect while you're here in Washington.

We're trying to evolve a national energy policy. We've not been successful so far. But the Congress is making some very slow, tedious, but I think steady, progress. We are trying to restrain the threat of world destruction through nuclear explosives with the SALT agreement, a comprehensive test ban agreement. The Congress passed a very good nonproliferation law since I've been in office to try to hold down the spread of atomic weaponry around the world.

We are also trying to deal with some of our social programs. This time last year, the most pressing problem for me was employment. We've had notable success in that. Now, correlated with it, intimately bound to it is the problem of inflation. We are trying to hold down inflationary pressures, and there I think you can help again.

Almost every pressure that I feel on me as President that leads to later inflation comes from a very fine group of people—those who want to build weapons, those who want to build highways, farmers, educators, veterans, and others—all have demands upon the Federal Government that are legitimate. But when you add them all together, it creates an almost impossible financial circumstance, and the budget deficits increase because very fine people press for special attention to their problem, which is very costly.

The last thing I'd like to say to you is that I consider you to be partners of mine, not only as American citizens—which is part of our democratic form of government—but as recognized leaders already at a very young age. And I hope you won't just rest on your laurels. You not only have shown leadership capabilities—you wouldn't be elected—you've not only shown the ability to fight a difficult battle—because every one of you won election as governor in spite of overwhelming odds, apparently at the beginning—but you've shown some political prowess and some knowledge of our country.

I think that you ought to use this early entry into politics in a way that will benefit our whole country and that you will continue to show your interest in your actions through your college years and that you will later come into government service itself, if that's part of your continuing inclination.

I'm grateful to you, honored to have you here. I think this is the most governors I've ever had at once. [Laughter]

If you don't mind, after we get through, if you would really expedite it and not pause for conversations, I'd like to stand down in front and let you come by and get an individual photograph with each one of you rather than just a group photograph.

TERRY HOFFMAN. Mr. President, on behalf of the 17th National YMCA Youth Governors Conference, we'd like to show you our appreciation for taking time out of your busy schedule to come talk to us this morning.

First, I'd like to offer you this Youth Governors Honor Award given to each of our outstanding speakers, a membership in the National Society of YMCA Youth Governors, and this plaque which is a charter given to the National Capital YMCA, the only YMCA ever to receive a charter from Congress, and it is signed by Abe Lincoln.

THE PRESIDENT. Thank you very much for that.

Thank you, Terry. It's a pleasure for me to receive this award from a Youth Governor, particularly the one from Georgia—[laughter]*—*particularly one from very close to my home, and particularly from the home of Georgia's full-time Governor, George Busbee. I appreciate this and will treasure it.

And now, if you would, just kind of in a hurry, come by and let me get a photograph of each one of you. We have a White House photographer.

Federal Maritime Commission

Nomination of Thomas F. Moakley To Be a Commissioner. June 30, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Thomas F. Moakley for reappointment as a Commissioner of the Federal Maritime Commission for a 5-year term.

Moakley, 56, of Whitman, Mass., was appointed to the Commission last September. At the time of his appointment he was port director of the Port of Boston.

Meeting With Helmut Kohl

White House Statement on the Meeting With the West German Political Leader. June 30, 1978

The President met today with Helmut Kohl, the chairman of the Christian Democratic Union/Christian Social Union of the Federal Republic of Germany. Also participating in the meeting were Dr. Zbigniew Brzezinski and Ambassador von Staden of the Federal Republic.

The President and Dr. Kohl discussed a wide range of international issues of interest to their two nations. The President said he looked forward to his forthcoming visit to Germany, and the two men discussed the summit meeting to be held in Bonn during the President's visit. The President expressed again the deep United States commitment to Europe, to the NATO Alliance, and to its relationship with the Federal Republic. Dr. Kohl said he thought the President's dedication to NATO had an important effect, and he stressed the importance of the President's trip, especially his visit to Berlin. Both men reaffirmed that German-American ties are firmly rooted in the common interests of the two countries.

Equal Employment Opportunity Programs

Executive Order 12067. June 30, 1978

PROVIDING FOR COORDINATION OF FEDERAL EQUAL EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITY PROGRAMS

By virtue of the authority vested in me as President of the United States by the Constitution and statutes of the United States, including Section 9 of Reorganization Plan Number 1 of 1978 (43 FR 19807), it is ordered as follows:

1-1. Implementation of Reorganization Plan.

1-101. The transfer to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission of all the functions of the Equal Employment Opportunity Coordinating Council, and the termination of that Council, as provided by Section 6 of Reorganization Plan Number 1 of 1978 (43 FR 19807), shall be effective on July 1, 1978.

1-2. Responsibilities of Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

1-201. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission shall provide leadership and coordination to the efforts of Federal departments and agencies to enforce all Federal statutes, Executive orders, regulations, and policies which require equal employment opportunity without regard to race, color, religion, sex, national origin, age or handicap. It shall strive to maximize effort, promote efficiency, and eliminate conflict, competition, duplication and inconsistency among the operations, functions and jurisdictions of the Federal departments and agencies having responsibility for enforcing such statutes, Executive orders, regulations and policies.

1-202. In carrying out its functions under this order the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission shall consult with and utilize the special expertise of Federal departments and agencies with equal employment opportunity responsibilities. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission shall cooperate with such departments and agencies in the discharge of their equal employment responsibilities.

1-203. All Federal departments and agencies shall cooperate with and assist the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in the performance of its functions under this order and shall furnish the Commission such reports and information as it may request.

1-3. Specific Responsibilities.

1-301. To implement its responsibilities under Section 1-2, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission shall, where feasible:

- (a) develop uniform standards, guidelines, and policies defining the nature of employment discrimination on the ground of race, color, religion, sex, national origin, age or handicap under all Federal statutes, Executive orders, regulations, and policies which require equal employment opportunity;
- (b) develop uniform standards and procedures for investigations and compliance reviews to be conducted by Federal departments and agencies under any Federal statute, Executive order, regulation or policy requiring equal employment opportunity;
- (c) develop procedures with the affected agencies, including the use of memoranda of understanding, to minimize duplicative investigations or compliance reviews of particular employers or classes of employers or others covered by Federal statutes, Executive orders, regulations or policies requiring equal employment opportunity;
- (d) ensure that Federal departments and agencies develop their own standards and procedures for undertaking enforcement actions when compliance with equal employment opportunity requirements of any Federal statute, Executive order, regulation or policy cannot be secured by voluntary means;

- (e) develop uniform record-keeping and reporting requirements concerning employment practices to be utilized by all Federal departments and agencies having equal employment enforcement responsibilities;
- (f) provide for the sharing of compliance records, findings, and supporting documentation among Federal departments and agencies responsible for ensuring equal employment opportunity;
- (g) develop uniform training programs for the staff of Federal departments and agencies with equal employment opportunity responsibilities;
- (h) assist all Federal departments and agencies with equal employment opportunity responsibilities in developing programs to provide appropriate publications and other information for those covered and those protected by Federal equal employment opportunity statutes, Executive orders, regulations, and policies; and
- (i) initiate cooperative programs, including the development of memoranda of understanding between agencies, designed to improve the coordination of equal employment opportunity compliance and enforcement.

1-302. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission shall assist the Civil Service Commission, or its successor, in establishing uniform job-related qualifications and requirements for job classifications and descriptions for Federal employees involved in enforcing all Federal equal employment opportunity provisions.

1-303. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission shall issue such rules, regulations, policies, procedures or orders as it deems necessary to carry out its responsibilities under this order. It shall advise and offer to consult with the affected Federal departments and agencies during the development of any proposed rules, regulations, policies, procedures or orders and shall formally submit such proposed issuances to affected departments and agencies at least 15 working days prior to public announcement. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission shall use its best efforts to reach agreement with the agencies on matters in dispute. Departments and agencies shall comply with all final rules, regulations, policies, procedures or orders of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

1-304. All Federal departments and agencies shall advise and offer to consult with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission during the development of any proposed rules, regulations, policies, procedures or orders concerning equal employment opportunity. Departments and agencies shall formally submit such proposed issuances to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and other interested Federal departments and agencies at least 15 working days prior to public announcement. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission shall review such proposed rules, regulations, policies, procedures or orders to ensure consistency among the operations of the various Federal departments and agencies. Issuances related to internal management and administration are exempt from this clearance process. Case handling procedures unique to a single program also are exempt, although the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission may review such procedures in order to assure maximum consistency within the Federal equal employment opportunity program.

1-305. Before promulgating significant rules, regulations, policies, procedures or orders involving equal employment opportunity, the Commission and affected departments and agencies shall afford the public an opportunity to comment.

1-306. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission may make recommendations concerning staff size and resource needs of the Federal departments and agencies having equal employment opportunity responsibilities to the Office of Management and Budget.

1-307. (a) It is the intent of this order that disputes between or among agencies concerning matters covered by this order shall be resolved through good faith efforts of the affected agencies to reach mutual agreement. Use of the dispute resolution mechanism contained in Subsections (b) and (c) of this Section should be resorted to only in extraordinary circumstances.

(b) Whenever a dispute which cannot be resolved through good faith efforts arises between the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and another Federal department or agency concerning the issuance of an equal employment opportunity rule, regulation, policy, procedure, order or any matter covered by this Order, the Chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission or the head of the affected department or agency may refer the matter to the Executive Office of the President. Such reference must be in writing and may not be made later than 15 working days following receipt of the initiating agency's notice of intent publicly to announce an equal employment opportunity rule, regulation, policy, procedure or order. If no reference is made within the 15 day period, the decision of the agency which initiated the proposed issuance will become effective.

(c) Following reference of a disputed matter to the Executive Office of the President, the Assistant to the President for Domestic Affairs and Policy (or such other officials as the President may designate) shall designate an official within the Executive Office of the President to meet with the affected agencies to resolve the dispute within a reasonable time.

1-4. Annual Report.

1-401. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission shall include in the annual report transmitted to the President and the Congress pursuant to Section 715 of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended (42 U.S.C. 2000e-14), a statement of the progress that has been made in achieving the purpose of this order. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission shall provide Federal departments and agencies an opportunity to comment on the report prior to formal submission.

1-5. General Provisions.

1-501. Nothing in this order shall relieve or lessen the responsibilities or obligations imposed upon any person or entity by Federal equal employment law, Executive order, regulation or policy.

1-502. Nothing in this order shall limit the Attorney General's role as legal adviser to the Executive Branch.

Litigation Against Public Sector Employers

Executive Order 12068. June 30, 1978

PROVIDING FOR TRANSFER TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL OF CERTAIN FUNCTIONS UNDER SECTION 707 OF TITLE VII OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS ACT OF 1964, AS AMENDED

By virtue of the authority vested in me as President of the United States by the Constitution and laws of the United States, including Section 9 of Reorganization Plan Number 1 of 1978 (43 FR 19807), in order to clarify the Attorney General's authority to initiate public sector litigation under Section 707 of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended (42 U.S.C. 2000e-6), it is ordered as follows:

1-1. Section 707 Functions of the Attorney General.

1-101. Section 5 of Reorganization Plan Number 1 of 1978 (43 FR 19807) shall become effective on July 1, 1978.

1-102. The functions transferred to the Attorney General by Section 5 of Reorganization Plan Number 1 of 1978 shall, consistent with Section 707 of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended, be performed in accordance with Department of Justice procedures heretofore followed under Section 707.

American Stainless Steel Table Flatware Industry

Message to the Congress Transmitting a Report. June 30, 1978

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with section 203(b) (2) of the Trade Act of 1974, enclosed is a report to the Congress setting forth my determination that import relief for the U.S. stainless steel table flatware industry is not in the national economic interest, and explaining the reasons for my decision.

JIMMY CARTER

The White House,
June 30, 1978.

IMPORT RELIEF ACTION

STAINLESS STEEL TABLE FLATWARE

As required under section 203(b) (2) of the Trade Act of 1974, I am transmitting this report to Congress setting forth the action I will take with respect to stainless steel table flatware covered by the affirmative finding on May 8, 1978 of the U.S. International Trade Commission (USITC) under section 201(d) (1) of the Trade Act. As my action differs from that recommended by the USITC, I have included the reasons for my decision.

After considering all relevant aspects of the case, including those considerations set forth in section 202(c) of the Trade Act of 1974, I have determined that import relief for the domestic stainless steel table flatware industry would not be in the national economic interest for the following reasons:

1. The imposition of import relief would not be an effective means to promote adjustment in the industry. The dominant firm in the domestic industry now supplies over half of all domestic production (almost three quarters in value terms) and currently utilizes technologically advanced manufacturing equipment. This firm, as well as a number of smaller firms who are operating profitably, should remain profitable.

2. All the major firms in the industry have been increasing their amounts of imports in order to supplement the particular product lines in which they specialize and to improve their overall profitability and this trend is expected to continue.

3. Import relief would discriminate against low-income purchasers and substantially increase costs to consumers. (Under the USITC's recommended remedy, costs are estimated to increase by at least $33 million in the first year.)

These costs may increase even further if the moderating influence that low-price imports have on the prices of domestically produced flatware is eliminated. In a time when we are striving to control inflation, these costs are too high.

4. This industry has had import relief in 13 out of the past 20 years. Providing import relief again would be inconsistent with the internationally accepted concept that import relief in escape clause cases should be of a temporary nature.

5. Employment losses since 1975 have been small and many of the unemployed workers are currently receiving Trade Adjustment Assistance benefits. The USITC estimates gradually increasing domestic production of flatware even in the absence of relief and this should have a stabilizing effect on the number of jobs in the industry.

6. Expedited consideration of adjustment petitions from workers, firms, and communities is still in effect as a result of the Presidential determination on the 1976 import relief case.

American Stainless Steel Table Flatware Industry

Memorandum From the President.
June 30, 1978

Memorandum for the Special Representative for Trade Negotiations

Subject: Determination Under Section 202(b) (1) of the Trade Act; Stainless Steel Table Flatware

Pursuant to section 202(b) (1) of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. 2252(b) (1)), I have determined the action I will take with respect to the report of the United States International Trade Commission (USITC), transmitted to me on May 8, 1978, concerning the results of its investigation of a petition for import relief filed by the Stainless Steel Flatware Manufacturers Association, Washington, D.C., on behalf of the domestic industry producing knives, forks, spoons, and ladles, with stainless steel handles, provided for in items 650.08, 650.09, 650.10, 650.12, 650.38, 650.39, 650.40, 650.42, 650.54, 650.55, and, if included in sets, 651.75 of the Tariff Schedules of the United States.

After considering all relevant aspects of the case, including those considerations set forth in section 202(c) of the Trade Act of 1974, I have determined that provision of import relief is not in the national economic interest.

The imposition of import relief would not be an effective means to promote adjustment in the industry. The dominant firm in the domestic industry currently utilizes the most advanced manufacturing equipment and, along with a number of smaller firms, should remain profitable. Most major domestic producers of flatware currently rely on imports in a substantial and increasing degree to supplement the particular product lines in which they specialize and this trend is expected to continue. Import relief in the form of a tariff rate quota has been in effect for 13 out of the past 20 years in order to facilitate adjustment in this industry and additional relief would be inappropriate. Providing import relief again would be inconsistent with the internationally accepted concept that import relief in escape clause cases should be of a temporary nature.

Import relief would substantially increase costs to consumers, have an adverse impact on consumer demand, and discriminate against low-income purchasers. Consumer costs may increase even further if the moderating influence that low price imports have on the prices of domestically produced flatware is eliminated. In a time when we are striving to control inflation, these added costs are unacceptable.

Employment losses since 1975 have been small and many of the unemployed workers are currently receiving trade adjustment assistance benefits. The USITC estimates that overall domestic production of flatware should gradually increase even in the absence of relief and this should have a stabilizing effect on the number of jobs in the industry. Further, expedited consideration of adjustment assistance petitions from workers, firms, and communities is still in effect as a result of the Presidential determination on the 1976 import relief case.

This determination is to be published in the FEDERAL REGISTER.

International Energy Exposition in Knoxville, Tennessee

Announcement of a Federal Interagency Effort To Assist the City. June 30, 1978

The President has directed Jack Watson, Assistant to the President and Chairman of the Interagency Coordinating Council, to organize an interagency effort to assist Knoxville, Tenn., with its proposed International Energy Exposition.

In announcing the interagency effort, the President said, "It has become apparent that the planning process for Expo 82 has reached the stage that high-level Federal coordination is appropriate. In line with my commitment to the success of this international project and my strong support for interagency cooperation on programs which have national as well as local import, I am urging the Interagency Coordinating Council to begin work immediately on a joint effort with the city of Knoxville, the State of Tennessee, and the private sector to make available appropriate Federal resources in a coordinated fashion. Expo 82 will seek to dramatize the national and international importance of our energy problems and possible solutions to those problems.”

Jack Watson will make this the first specific project of the Council, and the lead agencies involved will be Commerce (including the United States Travel Service), HUD, State, and Energy.

United States Court of Claims

Nomination of Edward S. Smith To Be an Associate Judge. June 30, 1978

The President today announced that he will nominate Edward S. Smith, of Baltimore, Md., to be an Associate Judge of the United States Court of Claims. He would replace Byron Skelton, retired.

Smith was born March 27, 1919, in Birmingham, Ala. He received a B.A. (1941) and LL.B. (1947) from the University of Virginia. He served in the U.S. Navy from 1941 to 1946.

Smith practiced law from 1947 to 1961. From 1961 to 1963, he was a trial attorney with the Tax Division of the Justice Department. Since 1963 he has practiced law in Baltimore.

Joint Chiefs of Staff

Remarks at Ceremonies Honoring the Chairman and Two Members. June 30, 1978

Secretary Brown, other Americans assembled here with a total commitment to defend and preserve our Nation:

It's an honor for me to participate in this ceremony. Secretary Brown said that we come to honor these three men. But they have and will honor us with their superb service and with a very proper balancing between a desire for peace and a willingness to maintain strength.

I taught Sunday school this past weekend, and one of the points I made to my class was that quite often we misjudge others. I asked them to name the group who in their brief encounters with me as President, when the uppermost thought on their mind needs to be imparted very rapidly, which group most often said, "God bless you, Mr. President," or "We're praying for you." And the class guessed all kinds of groups, and the proper answer was the military.

Military families are the first ones who suffer when war comes. At the time of enlistment, their lives are offered for their country. Those offers are not retracted or canceled.

I'm very proud to be able to participate this afternoon in a ceremony to acknowledge the qualities of three men, qualities which exemplify, historically, American military service: superb training, preparation for war in times of peace, experience derived from complicated interrelationships between men and women and the other elements that comprise military capability—personal character, honesty, integrity, reliability, dedication, patriotism—the qualities of leadership to inspire others to emulate the finest qualities among those who head our military forces; and an important but quiet realization of political truths, so that international and national politics in a nonpartisan way can be understood and accommodated and even used.

I have been privileged to work with General David Jones the last 18 months. I know about his background and his experience—300 hours of combat over North Korea, a superb strategist, a man who in both military and political definition is a statesman. He is our new Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

General Lew Allen, who had perhaps the Nation's shortest period of service as a Vice Chief—only 5 days—and his superb qualities were recognized so quickly and instantly—[laughter]—that he was immediately promoted to be the Chief of Staff of the Air Force: a man who has 4,000 hours of experience in the air in strategic bombers, who brings to the Joint Chiefs of Staff a continuation of his superb qualities as a scientist, able to use the resources of our Nation in the most effective way for military strength to prevent war.

Admiral Tom Hayward, a fighter, squadron participant and leader, experienced as a teacher in the Nation's War College, advanced training as a student of international affairs—but I think the characteristic that sticks in my mind is that he is a superb operational commander. I would really have preferred a submariner—[laughter]—but Tom Hayward's qualities are so superior that even the Navy submariners preferred him to be the Chief of Naval Operations.

I would like to say in closing that we are a strong nation. We have strong alliances with other people who themselves represent the traits of character that engender strength. We are able even to withstand, if necessary, a strategic nuclear attack and still have the capability of punishment so severe that other potential adversaries can be completely destroyed. This is the best assurance that this mutual destruction will be avoided and it's necessary that we maintain that strength.

Our conventional force is also strong, tested in combat, interrelated in an effective and superb way, competitive in the finest sense of the word among the forces of our military capability, but still correlating one another's strength in the finest fashion.

We have an ability for self-examination in a nation based upon the consent of the governed, and when one particular element of our security does become in need of change, we recognize it and make those changes.

One example, I think, has been the recent recommitment of the strength of NATO. In the military, in the White House, in the Congress, throughout our Nation, we have said anew that this collection of democratic countries would stand together for mutual defense, and I think our own action has been an inspiration to other members of NATO, and that alliance has been strengthened.

We now face the challenge on the southern flank of NATO. We want to remove the problems with Turkey, remove the embargo against that country. Our military leaders have voices that are strong, and their observations are assessed with great care by the Congress and the people. They can be a great help in telling the truth to the American people. We are able in this country to think, to plan, to design, to perform better than any other nation on Earth.

As I said in the recent speech in Annapolis, we are eager to cooperate with the Soviet Union or any other potential adversary. We are willing to compete, when necessary. We will never shirk our responsibility. We will never permit our military capability to be second to any other, because we know that along with the natural advantages that we enjoy—ideological, political, economic—that all these would be of no avail if we did not maintain a strong, constant, well-recognized defense capability. And we will never permit our Nation to be weak militarily, which guarantees us that we can be strong in every other aspect of life.

So, to summarize my comments, I would like to say that I'm proud to be with these leaders whom we recognize. I think I know our country well. Our people are committed to the principles that I've outlined briefly this afternoon. We want peace. We are determined to maintain peace. But we recognize that peace can only come through strength. And that we will also maintain in the United States of America.

Thank you very much.

NOTE: The President spoke at 3:15 p.m. on the River Entrance Plaza at the Pentagon.

Following his remarks, the President presented certificates of office to Gen. David C. Jones as Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Lew Allen, Jr., as Chief of Staff of the Air Force, and Adm. Thomas B. Hayward as Chief of Naval Operations.

Executive Schedule

Federal Cost-of-Living Allowances

Executive Order 12070. June 30, 1978

ADJUSTMENT OF COST OF LIVING ALLOWANCES

By the authority vested in me as President of the United States of America by Section 5941 of Title 5 of the United States Code, and in order to authorize the temporary restoration of the cost of living allowance to certain employees, it is hereby ordered as follows:

1-1. Suspension of Applicable Requirements.

1-101. The requirement of Section 205 (b) (2) of Executive Order No. 10000, as amended, that consideration be given to quarters or subsistence, commissary or other purchasing privileges, in determining cost of living allowance rates, is suspended except to the extent that such privileges are furnished as a result of Federal civilian employment.

1-102. Quarters or subsistence, commissary or other purchasing privileges, shall not be taken into consideration in determining cost of living allowance rates of employees who are furnished such facilities as a result of Federal civilian employment but who do not use them.

1-2. Administrative Matters.

1-201. This Order shall take effect July 30, 1978 and shall operate prospectively.

1-202. The United States Civil Service Commission shall conduct a study of problems associated with the implementation of Section 5941 of Title 5 of the United States Code. The Commission's findings and recommendations for long-term solutions to problems encountered with respect to the cost of living allowance and differential compensation authorized by that statute shall be submitted to the President.
